Mr. MILLSON. I will say by way of explanation, that this bill has received the unanimous approbation of the committee, as it has twice received the unanimous approval of the popular branch of two Congresses. I have before me the report of the committee made at the last session, and I will send it to the Clerk's table to be read, as it sets forth all the facts in the case.

"That it appears from the facts in the case that the petitioners imported into the port of Norfolk, on or about the 6th of June, 1848, a cargo of sugars, consisting of 192 hogsheads and six tierces, upon which the duties amounted to $1,877 40; that the entire cargo was bonded and warehoused not in the ordinary public stores, as they were considered by the collector of the port unsafe at the time, but in a warehouse selected by the revenue officers of the Government for the especial purpose, having been examined by the surveyor of the port, and approved by the petitioners; that subsequently the said warehouse, together with 121 hogsheads of the aforesaid sugars, was destroyed by fire; that the memorialists immediately paid the duties chargeable upon the remaining 71 hogsheads and six tierces, amounting to $720 30, which were saved from the conflagration, and applied to the Secretary of the Treasury to cancel their bond upon which remained still due the sum of $1,156 50, the amount of duties chargeable upon the sugars destroyed as aforesaid; that failing in this relief, in order to prevent expense of a suit, they also paid the sum of $1,156 50 in full, which they now ask Congress to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to them. Your committee are of the opinion that their request should be granted, and accordingly hereby report for their relief."

Mr. MILLSON resumed. I myself have some personal knowledge of the very disastrous conflagration by which these goods were destroyed. At the time of their destruction the duties had not been paid by the memorialists. They accordingly addressed a memorial to the Thirtieth Congress, requesting that their bond might be canceled. A favorable report was made from the Committee on Commerce; and a bill reported for their relief, directing their bonds to be canceled, was unanimously passed by the House of Representatives, which failed, however, to be considered in the Senate. In the mean time the bond became due, and it was necessary that payment should be made. They discharged the bond, which had not been canceled, and addressed their petition to the last Congress, requesting the return of duties which had been paid. A bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce by Mr. Phoenix, of New York, which again passed the House of Representatives unanimously, at an early period of the session, but a second time, amid the multifarious occupations of the Senate, failed to pass that body, though it passed this body. The petitioners were again under the necessity of coming to Congress for relief. They have again received a favorable report from the committee, and I am very sure that it will again receive the approbation of this House, and be unanimously adopted.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I wish to inquire of the gentleman if the report of this year coincides with the report just read?

Mr. MILLSON. I take it for granted that it does.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. With the leave of the gentleman, I will answer that question. The Committee on Commerce this year adopt as their report that of the Committee on Commerce of the previous year, which has just been read.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I only wish to say this: that it strikes me that it is founded upon a general principle which has long prevailed, of refunding duties upon goods that are thus destroyed. It was adopted in regard to the great fire in the city of New York, and has ever continued from that time down to the present.

Mr. FULLER. The principle dates back to the year 1790.

Mr. MILLSON. It is a principle which has always received the approbation of Congress. It is one which has never been called in question. These goods, as appears from the report of the committee, were in possession of the Government at the time of the destruction of the building. The building was itself selected by the Government as the depository of goods. These persons have paid to the Government duties upon merchandise which never entered into the consumption of the country, and which was destroyed while in the possession of the Government, in a building selected by the officers of the Government themselves. I trust that it will be allowed to pass.

The bill was then laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES FERGUSON.

The next bill in order, No. 90, for the relief of James Ferguson, the surviving partner of Ferguson & Milhado, was then read through.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. This case stands precisely upon the same facts as the case which has just passed from under the consideration of the House. It is for sugars and molasses destroyed in the same fire and precisely under the same circumstances.

Mr. HUNTER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FULLER] what reason there is why the exact amount to be paid cannot be stated in the bill? Why is it, that the precise amount cannot be ascertained now and stated in the bill?

Mr. FULLER. It is stated, I will inform the gentleman.

Mr. HUNTER. It says, not more than so much, which means going up to the highest point.

Mr. FULLER. I will only say, that the evidence before the committee, by the certificate of the collector and the Secretary of the Treasury, shows, that the maximum in the bill was the precise amount paid. As to the form of the bill in that case, which bill I had the honor of presenting as a member of the Committee on Commerce, I only adopted the printed bill of the previous session, to save the trouble of drawing it up.

Mr. MILLSON. I will state to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HUNTER,] that I obtained the certificate of the amount paid.

Mr. HUNTER. Is it the amount named in the bill?

Mr. FULLER. It is the amount named in the bill.

Mr. HUNTER. I only object to it because the precise amount to be paid is not fixed definitely in the bill.

Mr. FULLER. I can see very readily the reasons for having the bill drawn in that form, and it is out of abundant caution. The memorialists in this case have shown to the committee, and to their satisfaction, the amount they paid. The bill in its terms requires them to show to the collector also the amount, up to the maximum in the bill. If by possibility there has been a mistake—if the maximum is too high, the language of the bill gives security on the side of the Government.

Mr. HEBARD. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Maine, who reported this bill, whether there was any proof before the committee that these goods had been burned?

Mr. FULLER. There was clear and satisfactory proof before the committee.

Mr. HEBARD. I wish to inquire, also, why that proof is turned over to the Secretary of the Treasury for examination, before the money can be paid?

Mr. FULLER. I will answer the gentleman, that it was only out of abundant caution, requiring them to furnish to the Department the same proofs, of which the committee has possession, to guard against the possibility of mistake.

Mr. HEBARD. I only inquire, whether it was proved to the satisfaction of the committee, and that will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. FULLER. The original bond and the certificate of cancellation of the collector of the port, were before the committee.

Mr. BELL. I do not rise to object to the principle embraced in the two bills which have been presented to the House, but I think it is at least an injudicious method of arriving at the matter. I suggest to the committee which reported these bills, whether it would not be well to report a general law, embracing the principle contained in these private bills, and leaving it discretionary with the Treasury, to adjust all such cases under the rule prescribed by such general law. Here are two cases precisely alike, and probably there may be fifty more during the session, of a similar character.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The Government has warehouses now.

Mr. BELL. That may be all true, but the principle of this is not different from the general principle, where the property has been destroyed by fire or accident; and I understand that it is for that reason, the remedy is proposed to be given to the applicant here.

Mr. MILLSON. I have only a word to say. Perhaps there may be some constitutional difficulty in the general law proposed. I need not discuss that question at this time, however, though money cannot be paid from the Treasury except in consequence of specific appropriations made by law. This money having once gone into the Treasury, perhaps there will be some difficulty in paying it out again without specific appropriation by law.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The Committee on Commerce have received no instructions from this House to report any such general law. Without such instruction, they cannot report a bill for a general law. We can report upon nothing except that which is referred to us. These particular bills were referred to us. I will state to gentlemen, however, that other nations do refund the duties in all cases similar to this—the result of fire. I think the principle is right, and that this country should refund just as in the case of drawbacks. The gentleman from Virginia, upon reflection, will see there can be no possible objection to it.

Mr. MILLSON. Waiving the question of constitutional objection, I will add, what the gentleman from Georgia has anticipated me in saying, that the committee could only act upon questions before them; and this Committee of the Whole can hardly be interrupted in the duties now devolving upon it, by the consideration of what it may be their duty to do hereafter in similar cases. I trust the bill will pass.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I sincerely hope that the passage of this bill will not be embarrassed by the general considerations which have been suggested in reference to what might be politic as to the passage of a general law which will apply to all such cases. I am fully of the opinion, that such a general law would save a great deal of trouble to individuals, and much time that is devoted to legislation upon this subject. This bill has been prepared in precise conformity with the line of precedents found upon our books since 1790, in form, and carrying out the principles. But if it shall be found expedient, at any future time, to ingraft upon our statute book a general law, as is the case in Great Britain and some other commercial nations of Europe, I think myself, with the gentleman upon the other side, who has alluded to it, that it would be of very great advantage to adopt such a principle. This bill comes here after mature consideration, in conformity with the precedents in such cases, and I hope it will receive the favorable action of the House at this time.

Mr. KUHN. I do not know that I have any objection as to the merits of this claim, but it strikes me that there is an important fact to be determined, whether a fire actually took place, by which this property was destroyed.

Mr. FULLER. If the gentleman had heard the bill read, he would have seen, that it appropriated a specific sum for this purpose. There was the fullest evidence of the fire before the committee, and the phraseology of the bill was only adopted in conformity with precedents; and in order to be upon the safe side, they required the memorialists to furnish proof twice over.

Mr. KUHN. That explanation is satisfactory.

Mr. BELL. I do not rise to object to the bill. My only object is to call the attention of the committee to the subject, whether a general law could not be passed, so as to embrace all these particular cases and save local legislation hereafter.

The bill was then laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

INTEREST TO NEW HAMPSHIRE.

The next bill on the calendar, No. 4, authorizing the payment of interest to the State of New Hampshire, for advances made for the use of the United States, in repelling invasion and suppressing insurrection at Indian Stream, in said State, was read through.

Mr. PEASLEE called for the reading of the report; and it was read, as follows, viz:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill authorizing the allowance of interest money paid out by the State of New Hampshire, upon the advances made by the State for the use of the United States Government in repelling invasion and suppressing insurrection at Indian Stream, in said State, report:

That in consequence of the encroachments of Great Britain upon our northeastern frontier, and the claim of the Canadian Government to a part of the territory of the State of New Hampshire, and the measures threatened and adopted to enforce said claim, the Legislature of that State were unanimously of opinion that a small portion of its military force should be called out for the defence of its territory and the preservation of its citizens and property.

The expenses incurred by the State were exceedingly low for the services rendered, and the result of the measures adopted proved their necessity and propriety.

These advances were not reimbursed the State for about thirteen years after the claim was made, and all the necessary evidence and vouchers furnished the General Government by the State to sustain it, and almost the entire amount of interest paid out by the State has been during this delay.

Uniform precedent, in regard to such claims, shows that the State is entitled to receive the amount she has been compelled to pay out, in the name of interest, for the use and benefit of the General Government, in consequence of these expenditures, up to the time when the principal may have been reimbursed by the United States, if the same measure of justice is to be meted out to her that has been over and over again to her sister States. Similar claims have been repeatedly sanctioned by Congress ever since the organization of the Government.

The committee refer to the several acts, involving precisely the same principle, passed in favor of the State of Virginia, the State of Maryland, of Pennsylvania, New York, South Carolina; the cities of Baltimore and Mobile; and the act of January 26, 1849, for the relief of the State of Alabama, involving the same principle as the bill for the relief of the State of New Hampshire. Also, the act of the last Congress, allowing the payment of interest to the State of Georgia, for advances in the suppression of the Creek and Seminole, and Cherokee Indians, in 1836, 1837, and 1838; and the act of March 3d, 1851, authorizing the payment of interest to the State of Maine, for advances made for the protection of the same northeastern frontier. The committee thereupon recommend the passage of the bill as referred, with the exception of the proviso to the first section, which they recommend to be stricken out, and in that they ask the concurrence of the House.

The CHAIRMAN stated the first question to be upon agreeing to the amendment of the Judiciary Committee, to strike out the following proviso:

"Provided, That said amount shall not exceed six thousand dollars."

Mr. FOWLER. I should like to know what the amount of interest is. It may be that it is more than that sum.

Mr. McLANAHAN. The Committee on the Judiciary reported an amendment to this bill, to strike out the proviso limiting the amount of interest to be allowed. I confess that I did not see the propriety of striking out that proviso, and I think it would be just as well for this committee to reject the amendment of the Judiciary Committee. The object of striking it out is to prevent the accounting officers from coming up to the limit that is fixed by the House in the passage of this bill. My own impression is, that it would be better to reject the amendment and pass the bill in the form in which it was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. VENABLE. I am for striking out the proviso limiting the interest to six thousand dollars. If the debt is due, we ought to pay it all.

If it is not due, then we ought to pay none of it. If, upon the accounting officers looking into this account, it is ascertained that the State of New Hampshire either advanced money for the benefit of the United States, or that she paid interest upon money for the purpose of suppressing insurrection and protecting the territory of the United States, then, whether it amounts to six or to ten thousand dollars, it ought to be paid. I am averse to adopting a system of legislation which, upon its face, indicates a suspicion on our part that our own accounting officers are thieves; it would be by our own legislation, declaring that we are unwilling to trust to the integrity of those who act under our authority, and are our accounting officers. It is therefore that I am disposed to strike out the proviso. If the sum of ten thousand dollars is due to the State of New Hampshire, it ought to be paid; if but one thousand dollars, it ought to be paid; and if nothing at all is due, it ought to be so declared. I can see no reason why the amount should be limited to six thousand dollars. Above all, I protest against our so legislating here as to declare to the world that we have no confidence in those whose official duty it is to settle the accounts of the Government.

Mr. FOWLER. It is very clear that the interest ought to be paid—every cent of it. It may be, as has been well said by the gentleman from North Carolina, that it will amount to seven or eight thousand dollars, and if so it ought to be paid. We can trust our accounting officers to ascertain the amount. I am, therefore, clearly of the opinion that the proviso ought to be stricken out.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to say a word upon this subject, as the claim of the State of Maryland has been referred to in the report. Maryland has never been paid.

Mr. McLANAHAN. The city of Baltimore has.

Mr. WALSH. Baltimore has. I will not charge the accounting officers of the Government with any fraud in regard to matters of this description, but there was a most singular mistake in the mode of payment of the account of Maryland, and there is now due to that State something like seventy thousand dollars. It is necessary to strike out this proviso to prevent a mistake of a similar character in this case.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I have only one remark to submit in reference to this matter. I consider it very immaterial whether the amendment is adopted or rejected by the committee. The data upon which the calculation is to be made are all in the possession of the accounting officers. The amount of interest is to be computed on a certain principle, and whether it exceeds or falls short of $6,000 is to be a matter of calculation. But from the time when the principal was paid up to this time, it is impossible that the interest could come up to the sum of $6,000, and therefore it is of very immaterial importance whether the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary be adopted or rejected.

Mr. HALL. I fully agree with the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE,] and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. FOWLER,] that this interest should be paid to the State of New Hampshire. I have no doubt at all upon that point. But in the course of my experience here I have become satisfied that Congress, when it passes a bill of this sort, should fix definitely the sum which shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Why, it is in the recollection, doubtless, of every gentleman here, that only a few years ago we passed a bill, under which the officers of the Treasury were required to act in the same manner as they are required to act by this bill—I refer to the Galphin claim. We all know what an uproar the allowance made by the officers of the Treasury in that case created throughout the country. And, sir, the history of that bill, and the experience we have had in regard to it, satisfied me that the committees who report these bills ought to adjust the matter, and say what is the precise amount due.

[A message was here received from the President of the United States.]

Mr. H. continued. I am willing to pay the whole amount due to the State of New Hampshire; but I wish to know, when we pass this bill, how much money we are appropriating out of the Treasury. I am not willing to throw open the doors of the Treasury just as wide as the accounting officers—no matter how honest and discreet they may be—shall think proper.

Besides all this, the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. PEASLEE,] who introduced this bill, and who doubtless understands exactly how much is due to the State of New Hampshire, himself proposes this limit of six thousand dollars. He does not ask us to appropriate any more money than that; and why should this House be so anxious to grant to the State of New Hampshire more than her Representatives ask for? They say that six thousand dollars is all they want; but the Judiciary Committee say, we will not put this limit on their claim, but will let the officers of the Treasury allow as much as they, in the adjudication of this matter, may think proper.

I understand gentlemen to say that if you retain this proviso, limiting the amount to six thousand dollars, the officers of the Treasury Department will be sure to allow that sum. Now, most assuredly they will not allow it, if they discharge their duty, unless they become satisfied that it is due. I would just as lief say that six thousand dollars shall be paid to the State of New Hampshire as not, because I suppose it will amount to about that sum.

Mr. HEBARD. I have risen to make a similar suggestion to that made by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HALL,] who has just taken his seat. We have had much experience in this House in reference to this matter, and I think that the committees, in passing upon these claims, should take the trouble to ascertain the amount actually due; should form their own rules of computation, so as to see how much interest ought to be paid, if any, and report a specific sum in the bill.

I will not undertake to anticipate what may be the evils or frauds growing out of any of these sliding scales or sliding rules of ascertaining the amounts to be paid out of the Treasury. We have seen that there has been a great deal of dissatisfaction in the country in consequence of the action of one of the Departments of this Government, on account of a law passed in this way.

I hope, therefore, that this bill will not be laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass, but that it will be referred back to the committee which reported it.

Mr. PEASLEE, (interrupting.) I wish merely to remark, that so far as relates to the State of New Hampshire, we wish for no larger appropriation than the sum mentioned in the bill as that which shall not be exceeded. I cannot conceive that it can make any difference, either to the State of New Hampshire or to the United States, as it is a mere matter of calculation, whether the proviso is in or not; but we prefer that it should be in, as $6,000 is about the amount that is expected to be received.

Mr. HEBARD. I hold that it is a right principle, that when a committee undertake to pass on a claim, and find that something is due, they should ascertain exactly how much is due, and recommend the payment of that amount.

I am not arguing against the allowance of this claim, for I suppose it is a just and equitable one; but I can see no sort of difficulty in the committee fixing on the sum to be paid. I understood the chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. McLANAHAN] to say that there were different rules and modes by which the interest could be computed, and that remark suggested to my mind the very great importance of having the proper rule of computation investigated and laid down by the committee.

Mr. HUNTER, (interposing.) I would suggest to the gentleman, that in almost every instance where a bill of this kind has been passed, it has been found afterwards that the accounting officers of the Treasury have paid too much. Now, why cannot we just as well find out the exact amount that ought to be paid, instead of throwing upon the accounting officers the responsibility that properly attaches to us?

Mr. HEBARD. That is precisely what I was saying. If the House undertake to settle the fact whether anything is due or not, it is their duty at the same time, if there is more than one mode of ascertaining the amount, to fix upon that amount.

I have no objection to this particular case; still, I do not like, any more than other gentlemen do, to see a limit put in the bill beyond which the accounting officers are not to go, because it is saying, by implication, that otherwise they might go beyond what is just and right.

I hope the bill will be referred back to the Judiciary Committee, and that they will take the subject into their own hands, make their own calculations, see what is the exact amount due, and put it into the bill.

I suppose the claim is due. I raise no objection to its merits, although it is true that the State which I in part represent, has a perhaps equally meritorious claim, of which we cannot get even the principal. However, I make no objection to this bill upon that ground. If it can be ascertained what the precise amount of the claim is, I shall have no objection to the passage of the bill, but I hope that it will not pass until a definite sum can be fixed on.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I think that the gentlemen who have spoken upon this subject, and especially the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HALL,] have been a little mistaken in the application of their facts. The reference made by the gentleman from Missouri to the celebrated Galphin claim can certainly have no possible application to this case, because that was not a case in which the officers were directed to pay interest, while this is a case in which it is a simple direction to pay interest. Nor can there be any difficulty, or any different modes of calculating the interest, except in reference to one single point, which is a legal question that has often been decided by the courts of the country, and that is, where payments less than the amount of interest accumulated at the time, have been made. I believe the courts generally—I know the courts of my own State—have decided that the true way of computing interest, is to add the principal and interest together at the time of payment, subtract the payment, and then calculate the interest on the remaining amount. In case the payment was less than the amount of interest accumulated, then the interest will be to a certain extent compounded. Now, you ought to settle the rule whether the interest shall be compounded in that way or not; but when you direct interest to be paid you ought not to limit it; you ought to pay the whole amount of interest due, or else to pay none. I think, therefore, that this proviso ought to be stricken out.

Mr. PEASLEE, (interrupting.) The limitation was put into the bill by its friends, and I will state that $6,000 is the utmost amount that can be received.

Mr. STANTON. Very well; if that is the fact, there is no necessity for the limitation to be in; but it is the principle for which I contend. If this interest is due, it ought to be paid in full. You may, as I said before, settle the rule of computing the interest, but you ought not to say we will pass only so much and leave the balance unpaid, because, if you do, it may be the ground of another claim hereafter for the balance of the interest, if more shall be found to be due than $6,000.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Formerly, it was the practice of this House in all cases of private claims, to ascertain the precise amount, and then order the payment of it; to perform its whole duty and leave nothing to the Department but the simple administration of our laws. After that a different practice prevailed. It was the rule then to lay down certain definite and distinct principles, and direct the Department to pay the claims according to those principles. And recently a still more latitudinous course has been adopted, that of ordering the Department to ascertain the amount due, without any limitation—thus making them the legislators and the administrators of justice.

Now, if we are to attempt to do anything in this House upon correct principles, it would be better to go back at once to its ancient practice of fixing the precise amount in every case, and directing the Department to pay that amount. Let us not throw upon the Department the responsibility that properly belongs to us.

Now, I am in favor of striking out this proviso and of so amending the bill as to put in the precise amount that is to be paid—I care not whether it be five, six, or seven thousand dollars; and so I would do in every case.

I make these remarks in order to call the attention of the House to the looseness of our legislation, which is, in fact, becoming alarming. We are here passing bills without even the responsibility of a report from a committee of the House. We are thrusting our hands into the Treasury, and throwing the public money broadcast over the land. To me it does look alarming; to other gentlemen it may appear different. But I should prefer that we should return to the former practice of the House—perform our own duty distinctly and definitely, and leave it to the Department to perform theirs.

The question was then taken on concurring in the recommendation of the Judiciary Committee, to strike out the proviso from the bill; and it was decided in the negative.

So the proviso was not stricken out.

The bill was then ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

HEIRS OF THOMAS FLETCHER.

The next bill on the calendar was House bill No. 91, for the relief of the executors and heirs of Thomas Fletcher, deceased.

The CLERK read the bill.

Mr. HERARD asked for the reading of the report of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN stated that there was no report accompanying the bill.

Mr. MASON. That bill was reported from the Judiciary Committee. It has frequently been reported on favorably before. Unlike the bill just passed, it asks for no appropriation out of the Treasury. It is simply for the purpose of enabling the heirs and executors of Fletcher to have a settlement.

General Fletcher was security for a paymaster during the late war. The Government, for reasons satisfactory to them, have never proceeded to collect any damages for the non-payment of this bond on the failure of the paymaster for a period of thirty-odd years. General Fletcher died wealthy, all his family were wealthy, and the Government of course had good reasons for not prosecuting this claim. It was said everywhere that the Government could not have collected it, because the parties had a good defence, and that they did not, therefore, choose to incur the expense of a prosecution.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE. I want to ask the gentleman if there is a suit pending now upon that bond?

Mr. MASON. No, because the Attorney General, and all who examined this case, said that it would be impossible for the Government to recover the money. The children and heirs of General Fletcher are, however, kept out of the property left to them by their father, because the executors say that if they settle, they will still be liable to this old claim of the Government upon that bond. It amounts to nothing, in reality, but still it operates as an obstacle to a settlement between the heirs and executors.

The proof in this case was fully and fairly made out, to the satisfaction of the committee. General Fletcher, who was a meritorious officer in the late war, was a member of this House after this bond was held against him. This paymaster failed at a time when the Government was in embarrassed circumstances, and when many of these paymasters failed. The fact is, that this paymaster did pay over the money, but his vouchers were lost. By order of Major General Harrison, he put them on board of a vessel to carry them across the lake, and the vessel was lost; but the parties have now sufficient proof to defend the case, if it should ever be prosecuted. But it never will be prosecuted, and the only effect of holding this bond over the heirs, is to prevent them from obtaining a settlement with the executors. The Government is not interested in this matter; nobody—besides the heirs—is interested in it, except the executors, and they are willing to have a settlement, provided this bill is passed.

Mr. KUHN. What is the date of the bond?

Mr. MASON. 1814.

Mr. KUHN. When did the breach occur in the bond?

Mr. MASON. There was no breach in it. The accounts of this paymaster have never been settled at the Treasury Department. But these parties have a defence which would protect them whenever the Government brought suit against them—which they never have done, and never will.

Mr. KUHN. It seems, then, to be an abandoned claim.

Mr. MASON. It is an abandoned claim.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Kentucky if there has ever been a written report in this case?—if the facts have ever been reported to the House by any committee?

Mr. MASON. I understand that they have been reported twice; but I will now give way to the gentleman who reported this bill.

Mr. BRAGG. The facts of the case are all set forth in the petition of these parties, and if the Clerk will read the petition, the House will see the precise character of the case.

This bill was reported by me under instructions from the Committee on the Judiciary, because the committee thought that there ought to be some limit placed upon the time that this Government should be allowed to bring suit against these parties. This difficulty occurred in the year 1816. The Government instituted suit against the executors of Fletcher, the security on the bond; and when that suit was called, the Government, for reasons satisfactory to the Attorney of the United States, took a nonsuit in the case. That was thirty-five years ago. They have never instituted another suit upon the bond; and the object of this bill is simply to enable the heirs of Fletcher to have a settlement with the executors. The committee were of the opinion that, as the Government instituted a suit upon the bond, and had taken a nonsuit thirty-five years ago, and no proceeding had been taken since that time for the recovery of the claim, that the parties now ought to be released from all claims on the part of the Government.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE. I would like to ask the gentleman if there was any petition brought at the time the suit was instituted?

Mr. BRAGG. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOWE. Well, I will not take up the time of the House further than to say that if this Government will permit any claim to run on for thirty-five years without pressing the suit, and without ascertaining whether it can be collected or not, I am prepared, so far as I am concerned, to release the parties from all further obligations to the Government. If these are the facts of the case, it is all I desire to know in relation to it. I hope the committee will release the parties from the bond.

[Cries of "Question!" "Question!"]

The question was then taken, and the committee ordered the bill to be laid aside and reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES LEWIS.

The committee next proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 92, being a bill for the relief of James Lewis.

The bill was read through.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, that is a case where the claim is manifestly a just one. The facts in relation to it are these: The Government, desiring to have the testimony of this man Lewis; he was taken into custody at the Sandwich Islands; was confined, placed on board a vessel; and brought to Norfolk; and not being able to give security for his appearance at court as a witness, was there kept in confinement until the case was tried, and he had given in his testimony. He simply asks pay as a witness. I will further remark, that this is the third or fourth time—I think the third—that this case has been reported on. It was reported upon favorably by the committee which had it in charge the first session of the last Congress; and again at the last session. I have examined the case minutely, and I have no doubt, in my own mind, that the claim ought to be paid. He was taken, as I remarked, in the Sandwich Islands, by order of the Government of the United States. He was brought here, and detained in confinement until the case in which his testimony was desirable was tried; and upon being discharged, he comes here and asks the same pay that is allowed to any other person under similar circumstances.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I desire to know of the gentleman from North Carolina, whether Lewis asks his pay as a witness, and nothing else?

Mr. VENABLE. Simply as a witness. He brings no claim for anything else.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Has a report ever been made upon the case?

Mr. VENABLE. It has been reported on two or three times, and reported upon favorably.

Mr. MILLSON. I will send to the Clerk's table the report upon this case, which was read last session. I presume it contains all the facts in relation to the case.

Mr. VENABLE. It does. I ask that it may be read.

The report was read by the Clerk.

Mr. VENABLE. I hope there will now be no objection to the passage of the bill. The man is in necessitous circumstances, and ought to have his money.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE. I want to know upon what rule the sum proposed to be appropriated for his relief is ascertained?

Mr. VENABLE. The same as that used in the courts for estimating the payment of witnesses under similar circumstances.

Mr. HEBARD. My opinion is, from hearing that report, that the committee have appropriated a sum sufficiently large, and that is all I desire.

Mr. J. W. HOWE. I would like to know from the gentleman from North Carolina if there will be any further claim for interest on the claim?

Mr. VENABLE. The gentlemen will have to ask the claimant himself. As I have not seen him I cannot answer the inquiry.

[Cries of "Question!" "Question!"]

The question was then taken, and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

G. J. PENDERGRAST.

The committee then proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 93, being a bill for the relief of G. J. Pendergrast.

The bill was read through.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, asked if there was a printed report of the case?

The CHAIRMAN said the report had not been printed.

Mr. STANTON. Then I will state to the committee that the bill was accompanied with a report giving all the facts in relation to the case. Commander Pendergrast was employed at the United States navy-yard at Memphis, where a surgeon is usually employed, and while on duty there he was taken sick, and during his sickness it became necessary for him to employ a physician. He did so; and afterwards applied to the Secretary of the Navy to have his account allowed. The Secretary of the Navy referred the application to Attorney General Toucey, who decided that he was entitled to his pay, because every officer of the Navy, as well as every seaman, contributes a portion of his annual salary for the purpose of furnishing medical assistance to diseased officers and seamen, and because it has been the custom from time immemorial on board ships and at stations, under similar circumstances, to allow these accounts. The accounting officer of the Treasury, however, differed from the Attorney General, and refused to pay it; and there was no alternative left but to come to Congress for relief. The Committee on Naval Affairs concurred with the Attorney General, who gave his opinions and reasons at length, which were embodied in our report, and which I regret has not been printed. Upon these grounds I think the bill is a proper one, and ought to be passed.

Mr. FICKLIN. I desire to inquire of my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. STANTON,] whether there was, at that time, an Army surgeon at that station?

Mr. STANTON. There was not, and it is because there was none that you are called upon to pay this claim. You will observe that, in the estimates for appropriations for the navy-yard at Memphis, an appropriation was always made for the pay of a surgeon, although there was none there; or, at least, there was none up to the time to which this claim relates.

Mr. FICKLIN. Then there was no surgeon on duty at that time?

Mr. STANTON. There was not.

Mr. HUNTER. I move that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do not pass. I do it for the reason that the sum to be appropriated is not specified in the bill. I am well aware that the gentleman who is at the head of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee] is just as competent to ascertain the proper amount to be given as any other gentleman. I want the committees, when they come here and ask me to vote money for any object, to specify the amount which it is proposed to appropriate.

Mr. STANTON. I reported that bill myself, and its phraseology and provisions were made, such as they are, from the fact that I was incapable of determining the amount proper to be inserted. I propose to refer it to the officers of the Treasury to pay, not an exorbitant sum, not what a physician in Memphis thought proper to charge, but his reasonable expenses for necessary medical assistance. It is guarded in every possible way. I do not feel competent to determine whether a physician's bill is correct or not; but I have referred to the proper officer in the Treasury to take proof and determine whether it is or not; and I think that is the proper course.

Mr. HUNTER. The gentleman from the Memphis district [Mr. STANTON] I feel assured is just as capable of ascertaining the correctness of a physician's bill, as is the Secretary of the Treasury; for I am sufficiently well acquainted with that officer to know that he is not a physician, but, like my friend from Tennessee, he is a lawyer; and I know of no other officer in this Government, who is better qualified to ascertain what is the correct amount of a physician's bill, than the committees of this House. We are obliged to pay the money, or to order it to be paid; and it is our duty to ascertain the amount of money which we are to pay. I know of no mode of ascertaining this matter unless we take the physician's bill, or some physician's bill, or regulate the pay according to the amount which your surgeons receive, or in some such manner. I am sure there is some mode by which the committee can ascertain the proper amount to be paid.

Mr. J. W. HOWE. I would inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee, when this sickness occurred?

Mr. STANTON. Some three years ago, I think. I remember the circumstance very well. Commodore Pendergrast was attacked by a very serious indisposition, which required the aid of medical assistance.

Mr. HOWE. I desired to know if it was in the war of 1812?

Mr. STANTON. It was not.

Mr. FICKLIN. There seems to be an indisposition to pass this bill, because the amount to be paid is not specified in it. In order, therefore, to test the sense of the committee upon that question, I will move that the bill be reported back to the House, with the recommendation that it be again referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, in order to ascertain what is the proper amount to be appropriated. I make this motion for the purpose of testing the sense of the committee upon the question.

A MEMBER. Does that motion take precedence of the other motion?

The CHAIRMAN. It does.

Mr. STANTON. I desire to state to the committee, that the amount involved in this case is very small, only, I believe, something like from one to two hundred dollars. I hope the committee will not recommend its reference again to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. GOODENOW. I am satisfied that it is unnecessary to send this bill back to the Committee on Naval Affairs. As stated by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. STANTON,] the amount involved in the bill is very small, and can better be determined at the Treasury Department than in that committee. As a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I do not feel myself competent to determine the proper amount of a physician's fee. I think the bill is sufficiently guarded in its phraseology to prevent anything exorbitant from being allowed. It provides that the accounting officer of the Treasury shall allow what is reasonable and right, and I am sure this committee will not hesitate in granting that to Commodore Pendergrast. The Naval Committee have once had it before them, and I hope, therefore, that the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FICKLIN] will not prevail.

Mr. J. W. HOWE. I desire to inquire if it is in order to offer an amendment to the motion? If it is, I will move that the bill be reported to the House, with the proviso that the amount to be paid shall not exceed $100. I am willing to see this matter disposed of in this manner, but I wish to establish a correct principle in future, in relation to this matter. If it is in order I will move that the bill be laid aside, with the proviso that the amount to be paid shall not exceed $100.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that, pending the motion to report to the House with instructions to recommit, the gentleman's amendment is not in order.

Mr. FICKLIN. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, [Mr. STANTON,] says that the amount involved in this bill is a trifling one. Now, the amount which he has proposed to be appropriated in this bill may be trifling, but does not the honorable chairman, and all the members of that committee, know the fact, that from the phraseology of the bill, the question of the sum to be paid is left entirely open, and that the representations which may have been made to the committee does not in any way bind the physician in the account which he may present to the Treasury in virtue of this claim? He may represent before the committee that $100 or $150 is sufficient, but when the account comes to the Treasury he may demand five times that sum.

Mr. STANTON. If the gentleman will allow me. This is a case for refunding the money which has been actually paid by Commodore Pendergrast, amounting, according to my recollection, to something less than $200, for which he has his receipts.

Mr. FICKLIN. That constitutes a still stronger reason why this bill should not be passed without ascertaining the amount and specifying it in the bill. What are the mail facilities between this city and Memphis, Tennessee? But a few days will be required to enable the chairman of the Naval Committee, who represents so ably that district, and who, I believe, resides in the city of Memphis, to receive the necessary information as to the amount paid to the physician, and report to this House the bill, with that amount incorporated in it. If it has already been settled, what is to be the amount? It seems to me that there can be no excuse for passing this bill and leave it to the Secretary of the Treasury to determine what sum shall be paid.

Mr. STANTON. There can be no difficulty in ascertaining what is the amount to be paid by the Treasury Department. The papers are now in the printer's hands. The Navy Department made no opposition to the application, and the account can be settled much better at the Treasury Department than in the Naval Committee. It is a simple matter to decide. I have, however, no objection that there should be a proviso placed in the bill that the amount appropriated shall not exceed $200.

Mr. FICKLIN. I desire to inquire of my friend from Tennessee when this claim was first presented to Congress?

Mr. STANTON. It was first presented at the last session, but was not acted upon for the want of time.

Mr. FICKLIN. Was there a report made upon it?

Mr. STANTON. There was no report made at the last session.

It is suggested by a friend near me, that I should withdraw my motion to refer, and substitute a motion to insert a proviso limiting the amount to be paid. I will make that motion; but I will here remark, that it is well understood by all the members of this committee, that when a proviso is inserted in a bill limiting the amount to be appropriated—for instance, if you were to insert in this bill a proviso that the amount should not exceed $150, or any given amount for medical services, if the physician has done nothing more than dress the sore toe of the patient—he will receive the $150, or whatever sum may be named in the bill. So with regard to any bill: if you insert a proviso that the amount shall not exceed a certain given sum, they always receive that sum. As it is suggested, however, I will withdraw my motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and move the amendment which I have indicated—that the amount shall not exceed $150.

Mr. DANIEL. I renew the motion first made by my friend who has just taken his seat, [Mr. FICKLIN,] I think this is a bad system of legislation. I have already seen its injurious effects. It is throwing the responsibility off our shoulders and placing it upon the shoulders of the accounting officer of the Treasury. As has been well embarked, whenever there is a proviso inserted in a bill, they are certain to come up to the maximum. There may be some particular cases where it is well enough to leave the whole matter to the accounting officer of the Treasury. There may be cases in which, while the committee are aware that something is due, yet it is impossible for them to determine the amount without a cross examination in the case. It is well in such cases to refer the matter to the accounting officer of the Treasury, with authority to take testimony, so that it can examine witnesses upon the part of the Government as well as upon the part of the individual. But in every case where the facts of the case can be fairly ascertained, I think they ought to be reported to the House. I think the committee should report the amount which they believe to be due, and recommend that it be paid. It seems that in this case the facts were known, but the committee did not take the responsibility of reporting any particular sum to the House. I shall vote for referring this bill back to the Committee on Naval Affairs, to ascertain the amount to be paid; and we can then judge of the propriety of paying it.

Mr. J. W. HOWE. Some minutes since I proposed to offer an amendment, which was ruled out of order on the ground that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FICKLIN] had moved to refer it back to the committee, which motion took precedence. That gentleman has, however, since withdrawn his amendment. I now ask whether it would not be in order to move to insert a proviso in the bill, limiting the amount to $100?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that a motion to recommit takes precedence of a motion to amend.

Mr. HOWE. But the motion to recommit has been withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. It was renewed by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. DANIEL.]

Mr. HOWE. Then, of course, my amendment is not in order.

The question was then taken, and it was ordered that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House, with instructions that it be recommitment to the Committee on Naval Affairs, to ascertain the amount due.

HANNAH SAMPSON.

The next bill on the calendar was House bill No. 94, being a bill for the relief of Hannah Sampson.

The bill was read through by the Clerk.

Mr. GOODENOW. I had the honor of reporting that bill to the House, and I think it is a very meritorious one. Her husband was employed at the navy-yard at Charleston in 1815, and continued in the discharge of his duties at that yard until 1845—a period of nearly thirty years. The evidence in the case shows that he was a sober, industrious, temperate man, frugal in his habits, and faithful in the performance of his duties. In the year 1834, while employed by the Government, he received an injury in one of his eyes; and subsequently, in 1845, in the summer season, while employed under the direction of the officers at the navy-yard, being exposed to the weather and sun, he received what, I believe, is called a sun-stroke, the consequence of which was, he became totally blind. From that period up to July, 1849, he remained in an unfortunate and helpless condition. In 1847 he made application to Congress for relief, and in the month of January, 1848, the Committee on Naval Affairs reported a bill for that purpose. That report was, however, not acted upon. He continued to linger along in that hapless condition until July, 1849, when he died, leaving a widow in deep distress. The little money he had accumulated by his industry had been expended during his inability to labor and his sickness in consequence of the injury he had received. The whole evidence in the case shows that he was a sober, industrious, honest, and faithful man. I presume the records of the House will not show a stronger case of moral worth and fidelity to duty than is evidenced in the case of this man.

Mr. SACKETT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GOODENOW. Certainly.

Mr. SACKETT. I desire to know whether this man was connected with the military establishment, or whether he was a laborer employed in the navy-yard?

Mr. GOODENOW. He was employed as a day laborer, and received a per diem compensation; but he was employed during the whole time at the navy-yard, whenever his services were required by the Government.

Mr. SACKETT. Although, Mr. Chairman, this case may be one recommending itself very strongly to the sympathies of this House, and to the sympathies of the country, it would, I think, open too wide the doors, to begin to grant a man a pension in cases of this character. It seems that the claimant was in the employment of the Government upon day wages; that he remained in that employment a very considerable portion of his life; that misfortune overtook him, and, after a period of suffering for two or three years, he died. Now, if we are to grant a pension in every case of this kind, we shall find the calendar full of such claims. Although this case elicits our sympathies very strongly, yet, it seems to me, that it will not do for the Government to undertake to open its doors to pensioners of this character.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I will say, in reference to this matter, that it is a very peculiar case; and if the granting of pensions were confined to cases only of this character, I do not think it would open the door too wide. Here is a man who was engaged in the service of his country for a great number of years, at a daily compensation. In his old age he was rendered perfectly blind by exposure in that service. The blindness was the consequence of his employment in the public service. Now, sir, you will find many cases on record where Congress has granted pensions to persons overtaken by misfortune while in the public employment, or in consequence of his public employment. To men whose arms have been blown off, although they were in the temporary employment of the Government, pensions have been granted. Why are such cases as this brought before Congress? Because they do not come under any general law; because the party cannot go to the Navy or War Department, or any other Department, and claim a pension under any existing law. But certainly, if there is any case, outside of the general law, in which a pension ought to be granted, it seems to me this is one.

Mr. SACKETT. This case, if it should be allowed, is one of a very numerous class of cases. This Government has constantly in its employ upon wages, and ample and adequate compensation, a very large number of men; and if we are to begin to grant pensions to those whom calamity overtakes among this immense number of employees, I know not where the granting of pensions may end. Now, I do not dispute that this man may have been overtaken by calamity—I do not dispute that his widow may be in necessitous circumstances—but I doubt not that there are hundreds and thousands of other cases of this kind among those who have been in the employment of the Government for the last half century. There is no complaint that the compensation has not been adequate, or that it has not been paid. There is no complaint of suffering other than from the calamity which overtook him as a citizen while employed upon the part of the Government.

There is another consideration in reference to this bill. It proposes to give a pension for life in a case where, if the individual had been in the regular military service of the country, he would have been entitled to a pension for only five years.

Mr. TUCK. I am satisfied that the allowance of this pension will not form a dangerous precedent, to be followed in our action hereafter. This claim, I well remember, was before the Committee on Naval Affairs, four years ago, and received their unanimous approbation. It is a case of peculiar hardship—a case so peculiar, that I should be perfectly willing to grant a pension in all other cases of similar hardship that may be presented. While in that service, he was required to perform varied duties, and he is as meritorious as he would have been had he enlisted in the military service of the United States, and the affliction which he suffered was as severe as if it had been inflicted upon him by the public enemy. He was required, according to my recollection, to be engaged in the laborious service of calking the sides of United States vessels, and while so employed—although at times unconscious of danger, and perhaps those who oversaw his work were likewise unconscious of danger—lost his health and the use of his eyes. He lingered along for years, and four years ago he made his application for a pension, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and by them favorably reported upon, I believe, and received the approbation of the House. He died without receiving any relief. His widow, in poverty, in affliction, now comes here and asks this humble pittance. It is of little consequence to us; it is one of the trifles in our legislation; but be assured, sir, it is a matter of great consequence to this poor woman. I trust we will give it our approbation.

Mr. GIDDINGS. In all the sympathy which the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. TUCK] has manifested for this poor widow, I participate. I would that our ability were sufficient to justify us in extending our sympathies to the relief of all the suffering poor of the land. My benevolence, I hope and trust, is as extensive as is that of the gentleman from New Hampshire; but, Mr. Chairman, do we come here, are we sent here for the purpose of administering the funds of the Government to the relief of the poor of the nation? Is that the principle upon which we come here as American statesmen—to look up the poor, the suffering poor throughout the land, and extend to them relief from the National Treasury? Now, sir, in all our relations of private life, these things address themselves to our sympathies, and to the best feelings of our nature. But we come here, sir, to do and perform the stern duties of statesmen—to legislate for the nation. Now, what is the case presented to the House? A man and a laborer—and who is as worthy as any of us—seeks employment, in the course of his occupation, and prefers that of the United States to any other; and I have no hesitation in saying that every man of his profession in that State, would have sought his place, in preference to that of private employment—for the Government is the very best of paymasters. Well, sir, we permitted him to labor upon our ships because he preferred it to any other, and in the ordinary course of events he was seized with this malady, to which reference has been made, and he falls a victim to it. Now suppose he had been employed upon merchant vessels in that port, and the same malady had overtaken him, would the Government extend to him the relief which the Committee on Naval Affairs now recommend? I think not. And let me say here that this subject of private pensions in drawing from the Treasury of the United States a support to individuals has grown to an alarming extent. It has gone so far, that it seems to me that limits should be set to it. How far does the gentleman intend to extend this system? Will he carry it to civil life? Will he carry it into the Departments of Government, and to the men who are employed there, and who have grown old and decreped in that service? Will you extend to them pensions? Will he extend it to those who have served the public here in this House, and have worn themselves out in that service? Will you give them pensions? Will you give them all relief, to be paid out of the public Treasury? Will you carry it out to the whole of the employees of Government—to postmasters, mail-carriers, and all others? Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to occupy the time of the House upon this occasion. But let me say to the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. TUCK], that he is mistaken when he says we can grant this pension in a passing moment of legislation, never to be heard of again. It is to go down to all coming time, as a precedent to every employee of Government, who falls a victim to any malady, contracted while in the service of the Government. This fact I would impress upon the House, that we are legislating here for all coming time, and establishing precedents, from which we cannot hereafter depart. When we once establish a precedent, other employees will come in and seize upon it, to support similar claims. It is against the establishment of this precedent that I contend, and against which I protest.

Mr. BOGOCK. I do not desire to discuss the bill now under consideration, reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs. I should not have had reason to say one single word in relation to it but from the fact that it is reported from a committee of which I am a member, and that my silence might seem to commit me to this particular bill and to the principles involved in it. I therefore desire to say to the committee, that if the statement of the facts, upon which this bill rests, is a correct statement, I have not given my consent to it, and I am opposed to it. I do not think I was present when this bill was submitted to the committee. I am very sure that if the facts which have been detailed, are the facts upon which this bill rests, they never came to my attention. I agree with the gentlemen who have already spoken upon this bill, that not only is this particular case wrong in itself—having no particular merit—but that it establishes a bad and dangerous precedent, the extent of which, and the effect of which, upon the future legislation of the country we cannot foresee. To establish the principle of pensioning a man for life, simply because he was in the public employment—simply because he was deriving a sum of money for working for the public—not in war, not in any engagement—strikes my mind as dangerous and odious, and I shall record my vote against it, and my voice will always be raised against any such bill.

Mr. McMULLIN. I move that it be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. GOODENOW. I can hardly comprehend that kind of economy which seems to break forth upon a private claim, that comes before this House for the benefit of a meritorious individual, and at the same time measures which involve thousands and tens of thousands of dollars pass with very little debate or objection. I am as much in favor of economy as any man in this House, and I will do all in my power to promote an economical and just administration of the funds of the Government; but I am surprised that gentlemen should rise up in opposition to this bill, which only proposes to relieve the widow of an individual who devoted the greatest portion of his life to the service of his country. He was engaged in the service of this Government, and therefore, in my judgment, entitled to the same compensation that any individual, who has been employed under like circumstances, is entitled to receive. It may be true—

Mr. FICKLIN, (interposing). With the permission of the honorable member who advocates this bill, I would inquire if he is in favor of pensioning those individuals in this District who have held civil office under this Government for life, and of pensioning their widows, their husbands dying poor, and leaving nothing with which to support them?

Mr. GOODENOW. When such a case presents itself to the House I will decide upon its particular merits.

Mr. FICKLIN. It is the same principle entirely.

Mr. GOODENOW. I maintain it is not the same principle. Here was a man employed in a navy-yard, and continued to be employed there for a series of years, receiving a per diem compensation, and, as the facts show, his services were required by the commanding officer of the yard at the time he received his injury. I say, that when his services were being rendered for the benefit of this Government and he received an injury, it should entitle him, and he should receive, a compensation by way of pension; and it is no more than right and just that his widow should receive the same compensation from Congress for those services thus rendered. I do not understand, Mr. Chairman, why it is that gentlemen rise up on all hands and declare that this is establishing a dangerous precedent. I do not understand why the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIBBINS] is so stringent in his objections to this bill. I hope, then, this House will give this bill favorable consideration. I believe it is just and right, and that it commends itself to our consciences.

I have no fear of precedents. Every case brought before this House will be adjusted upon its peculiar merits; and if we pass this bill without precedent, so much the better. We are disposed to do justice, and individually we are acting according to the best dictates of our nature. We are trying to relieve the distresses of the widow of one who suffered in the employment of the Government. I hope this House will not agree to the motion made by the honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. McMULLIN,] and that it will do justice to that widow, by reporting this bill to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE. I hope the committee will take a vote upon this bill immediately, and that they will send it to the House, with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. DANIELS. I am not prepared to introduce into this country a system of civil pensions. I hope, sir, such a system will never be introduced here. We know the extent to which that system has been carried in Great Britain. If it gets a foothold here, we know not how far it may be carried. It is true this bill presents an isolated case, but it may be drawn into a precedent, give rise to similar bills hereafter, and draw after them others, and thus pave the way for a system of civil pensions. I am not aware that any case, in principle like this, has before been established as a precedent, and I would not lend my sanction to make this one a precedent. I hope the motion will prevail.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. McMULLIN, and it was agreed to.

So it was ordered that the bill be reported back to the House, with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move that the committee rise; upon which motion tellers were demanded and ordered, and Messrs. Fowler and Millson appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 58, noes 73.

So the committee refused to rise.

HEIRS OF JOHN JACKSON.

The CHAIRMAN stated that bill 95, reported by Mr. TUCK, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, for the relief of the heirs of John Jackson, deceased, came up next in order.

Mr. CARTTER. Read the report.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no report.

Mr. TUCK. There was a report made upon this claim by the committee, but I suppose it has gone into the hands of the printer. It has been favorably reported upon several times before. The bill only proposes to carry out the pledge of John Paul Jones, and to carry into execution the action of the Continental Congress upon that pledge, which took place upon the 28th of September, 1785. This man, John Jackson, was compelled by John Paul Jones, when he was off the coast of England, in 1779, and just before his engagement with the Serapis, to act as pilot. He was an Englishman, and on board of the Bon Homme Richard during that severe conflict, in which he lost an arm. John Paul Jones then gave him one hundred ducats, and a written stipulation on behalf of the Continental Congress of the Colonies, that he should have the pension of a private for life. That certificate was forwarded to Paris, where it was recognized and approved by Mr. Jefferson and Doctor Franklin. This stipulation, certified by Doctor Franklin and Mr. Jefferson, was sent home to the Government, and acted upon by the Continental Congress, who passed the resolution which this act proposes to carry out. These papers have been lost. John Jackson lived in England until 1815, when he died. His son came here to this city to collect this pension, but the papers could not be found. He entered into the service of the United States, but a few years since died. His widow and his son, now a small boy, reside at present at the navy-yard. She asks for the passage of this act.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE. I am not disposed to take up the time of the House in this matter, but this is an old, stale claim, to which I plead the statute of limitation, and ask that it be laid aside, with a recommendation to the House that it do not pass.

Mr. AVERETT. Mr. Chairman, is a motion that the committee do now rise in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. AVERETT. Then I make that motion. Sir, I am in favor of giving prompt and faithful attention to the bills on the calendar, but I am opposed to acting and voting in the dark. We have no report before us upon this case. It is impossible that we can act understandingly upon it without a report. The developments brought out, in the discussion of the case last disposed of, ought to teach us the necessity, not only of having the report before us in every case, but of investigating that report closely.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order pending the motion to rise.

Mr. CARTTER demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. Fowler and Millson were appointed.

The question being put, the tellers reported there were in the affirmative—ayes 79, noes 50.

So the committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported, that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration in the private calendar, bills Nos. 88, 89, 90, 91, and 92, and recommend that they do pass; also, bill No. 93, which they recommend be recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs, to inquire into the particular amount of the claim; also, bill 94, which they recommend do not pass.

ADJOURNMENT TILL MONDAY.

Mr. BISSELL moved, that when the House adjourn to-day, it be till twelve o'clock on Monday next.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE called for the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The motion being put, it was agreed to.

Mr. SWEETSER moved the House adjourn; which motion was disagreed to.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I suggest that we take a vote upon the entire report of the Committee of the Whole House, except in cases where gentlemen may desire a separate vote to be taken. I move we take the vote upon sustaining the whole recommendations of the committee.

The SPEAKER. That can be done only by unanimous consent.

Mr. CLEVELAND. I object to it.

The SPEAKER stated, that if there was no objection the vote would be taken upon the engrossment and ordering to a third reading of all the bills recommended for passage by the Committee of the Whole House at once, viz:

No. 88, a bill for the relief of Wm. Greer.

No. 89, a bill for the relief of Williams, Staples & Williams.

No. 90, a bill for the relief of James Furguson, surviving partner of Furguson & Milhado.

No. 4, a bill authorizing the payment of interest to the State of New Hampshire for advances made for the use of the United States, in repelling invasion and suppressing insurrection at Indian Stream in said State.

No. 91, a bill for the relief of the executors and heirs of Thomas Fletcher, deceased.

No. 92, a bill for the relief of James Lewis.

The question being put, the above-named bills were ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and having been engrossed, were read a third time and passed.

Mr. HART asked the unanimous consent of the House to grant him leave to withdraw the petition and papers of Bates & Lacon, with the view of having them presented to the Senate.

Objected to.

Mr. WALSH asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill, of which he had given previous notice.

Objected to.

Mr. McMULLIN moved the House adjourn; which motion was disagreed to.

J. G. PENDERGRAST.

The next question was on concurring in the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole that the bill for the relief of J. G. Pendergrast be recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs, with instructions to ascertain and insert in the bill the amount of appropriation necessary.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I believe that in the Committee of the Whole there was no objection to the principle of this bill; and I am perfectly satisfied that it is entirely useless to send it back to the Committee on Naval Affairs. The amount of this little account, as I learn since from the papers, which I thought were in the printer's hands, is $260. The petitioner, J. G. Pendergrast, is probably known to many gentlemen here as an individual who would not impose upon the Government under any circumstances, especially in the trifling amount of a doctor's bill. The legal proof was not before the committee, and I suppose if it goes to the committee in order that they may ascertain the amount of the doctor's bill, they will have to take depositions, or such proof as the accounting officers of the Treasury are in the habit of taking when they pay accounts of this kind, under the same circumstances. I say that, in order to do justice and protect the Government, it is entirely unnecessary to send this little matter back to the committee.

Mr. DANIEL. I trust the recommendation of the committee will be carried out, because I think this mode of legislating is based upon highly improper and incorrect principles. Now I do not intend to cast any imputations upon this gentleman. Far be it from me to cast any imputation upon him, if his character is perfectly proof against any imposition. I think it is wrong to legislate in this way. I think every case which comes before us ought to be brought up to the same standard; and every demand ought to be proved according to rules which will guard the Treasury against imposition. If we take the say-so in this individual case of a man free from suspicion, we will go a little further, and after a little while we will take the statements of somebody else, permit them to make their demands upon the Treasury, and we will pay what they demand.

Mr. STANTON. The gentleman is proceeding upon the supposition that we require the House to take the say-so of this gentleman, because he is respectable, and free from suspicion. I have not asked the House to do any such thing. I have only asked them to refer this matter to the officers of the Treasury, who will proceed only upon regular proof.

Mr. DANIEL. It is much safer, as a general rule, for committees, when they can ascertain the amount they propose to appropriate from the Treasury, to ascertain it, and recommend that the amount be paid. The objection I made is not answered at all. I trust the motion will prevail.

Mr. HEBARD. I believe there was serious objection to this bill upon two grounds, and the third one has presented itself now, since this bill has got back into the House. One objection was—and it was an objection of principle—that the bill did not settle the amount to be paid. It was thought by many that it was the only correct principle, that the committee should ascertain the amount and make the recommendation. I have not heard the chairman of that committee, or any other gentleman upon that committee, express even an opinion in relation to any amount, or that anything was due, further than to recommend the passage of the bill. Another objection was, that there is no report of the facts of the case. It was thought that the amount was between one hundred and two hundred dollars. It seems, since we have got back to the House, that it has increased to between two and three hundred dollars. If we allow this bill to go to the Secretary of the Treasury before the amount is ascertained, and it keeps increasing in that ratio, I do not know what the amount will be. I hope that the recommendation of the committee will be complied with, and the bill be sent back to the Committee on Naval Affairs, for them to obtain such proof as will satisfy them in relation to the equity of the claim and the amount due. Let them fix upon the amount, put it into the bill, and report such a state of facts as will satisfy the House that the claim ought to be paid. Then I will be in favor of it. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs, with instructions to ascertain and place in the bill the amount to be paid; and upon that motion I ask the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was then taken, and it was agreed to.

So the bill was recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs, with instructions.

The SPEAKER. The bill No. 94, for the relief of Hannah Sampson, was reported by the committee to the House, with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move the previous question, and I move that we concur with the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I move to lay the bill upon the table.

The question was put, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLSON moved to reconsider the vote by which bill No. 89, for the relief of Williams, Staples & Williams, was passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. SWEETSER, The House then adjourned.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill granting a quantity of the public lands for the improvement of the navigation of the river Wabash.

Prayer by the Rev. L. F. MORGAN.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the War Department, transmitting, in compliance with acts approved April 20, 1818, and August 26, 1842, and a resolution of the House of Representatives of 13th January, 1846, a list of the clerks and other persons employed in that Department other than officers of the Army, during the year 1851.

On motion by Mr. SHIELDS, it was Ordered, That it lie on the table and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, in pursuance of an act approved April 2d, 1794, containing a statement of the expenses of the national armories, and of the number of arms and appendages made and repaired thereat during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1851.

On motion by Mr. HUNTER, it was Ordered, That it lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. BRIGHT presented a petition of citizens of Oregon Territory, praying the removal of the port of entry from Fort Nesqually to Sleetacour City, and the establishment of a mail route from San Francisco to the head of Puget's Sound; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WALKER presented a petition of citizens of Dunlevy, Ohio, praying that the public lands may be ceded to the States for the purposes of settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FISH. I present the memorial of the New York State Colonization Society, praying the establishment of a line of mail steamers to the western coast of Africa.

The memorial states that a very large trade is now being carried on by Great Britain with that coast, amounting to some twenty-five millions of dollars annually, and it is calculated that England has already received two hundred millions of dollars of gold from that coast. They also urge that the establishment of this line would tend greatly to suppress the slave trade, and render unnecessary the present squadron which this Government maintains on that coast. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GEYER presented the petition of the heirs and legal representatives of Joseph Thompson, deceased, praying the confirmation of their title to a tract of land in the State of Missouri; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Also, the memorial of the administrator of George G. Alford, praying the appointment of a tribunal to review the decisions of the late Board of Commissioners for settling claims of American citizens against Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Also, the memorial of Henry H. Sibley, for and in behalf of the people of Minnesota Territory, praying a grant of land for the construction of a railroad from the western extremity of said Territory to the Mississippi river, with a branch to St. Paul in said Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Also, a memorial of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying a modification of the late bounty land law; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DAVIS presented a petition of citizens of Cambridge, Massachusetts, praying that the bill giving further remedies to patentees may become a law.

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

Mr. DAVIS. I present also the petition of Robert M. Lee, and other citizens of Pennsylvania, in which they represent that the bounty land law makes an unequal provision for the benefit of certain soldiers. In other words, that the soldiers of the war of 1812 are not placed on a footing of equality with the soldiers who served in the Mexican war. They ask that that bounty land law may be so modified as to place those soldiers on a footing of equality with those who served in the Mexican war by granting them a larger quantity of land than they have received. As a bill in relation to the subject is already before the Senate, I move that, without reading, the petition be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, presented a petition of citizens of Tennessee, praying that the expenses incurred by American contributors to the World's Fair at London, may be defrayed by Congress; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. BRODHEAD presented a petition of citizens of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, praying a modification of the late bounty land law.

Ordered, That it lie on the table.

Mr. FELCH presented a preamble and resolution passed by the Legislature of Michigan in relation to the land claims of Joseph Sansfacon and others; which were referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STOCKTON presented a memorial of inventors, praying that the Patent Office building may be completed according to the original design, and kept exclusively for the transaction of the business of that office; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

MEXICAN CLAIMS.

Mr. STOCKTON. I have a memorial in my hand which strikes me as one of very great importance. It is from Jonas P. Levy. It seems from his memorial that he was a merchant doing business in Mexico, on whose property spoiliations were perpetrated. His case was presented to the Board of Commissioners appointed for the adjudication of such claims. He complains that that Board did not do him justice; besides that, he says they have lost his papers, and he prays that Congress will grant him relief. The importance of this memorial would seem to justify a little more attention than is generally paid to such things when they are referred to the ordinary committees of the Senate. I therefore move that a special committee be appointed on this memorial, with power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. HUNTER. I believe occasions are very rare when the Senate creates special committees. It seems to me that this petition ought to go properly to the Committee on Foreign Relations; and I move that it be referred to that Committee.

The PRESIDENT. That being a standing committee, the latter motion will be first put.

Mr. DOWNS. Several memorials of the same kind have been presented by myself and others, which have been laid upon the table. I think this is a very important matter. I would like some time to consider whether it is proper to refer these memorials to the Committee on Foreign Relations. The general impression has been that they ought to be referred to a select committee. These memorials are very similar in some respects to those on the subject of French spoiliations, which have been referred to a select committee. I have some other memorials to present on this subject; I hope, therefore, that this memorial will be laid upon the table for the present until the others can be offered.

Mr. HUNTER. I am willing to accommodate the Senator.

Mr. DOWNS. I move that the memorial be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. DOWNS, it was

NON-INTERVENTION.

Mr. CLARKE, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in joint resolutions reaffirming the doctrine of non-intervention; which were read a first and second time by their titles, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The resolutions are as follows:

JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Congress recognizes and reaffirms these truths, "That governments are instituted among men to secure the inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed: That whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundation upon such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

Resolved, That while we claim for ourselves these comprehensive rights of self-government, and also as a consequence of sovereignty, the right to be exempt from the coercion, control, or interference of others in the management of our internal affairs, we concede to others the same measure of right—the same unqualified independence.

Resolved, That it is upon the sacred principle of independent sovereignty that we recognize, in our intercourse with other nations, governments de facto, without inquiring by what means they have been established, or in what manner they exercise their powers.

Resolved, That this Government has solemnly adopted, and will perseveringly adhere to, as a principle of international action, the advice given by Washington in his Farewell Address: "Observe good faith and justice towards all nations. Cultivate peace and harmony with all." "Give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel an example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence." "Sympathy for a favorite nation betrays itself into a participation into the quarrels and wars of another, without adequate inducement or justification." "Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, for foreign influence is the most baneful foe of republican governments." "The true rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations, is in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible." "Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalry, interest, humor, or caprice?"

Resolved, That while we cherish the liveliest sympathy towards all who strive for freedom of opinion and for free institutions, yet we recognize our true policy in the great fundamental principles given to us by Jefferson: "Equal and exact justice to all men, of whatever State or persuasion—religious or political—peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none."

Resolved, That although we adhere to these essential principles of non-intervention as forming the true and lasting foundation of our prosperity and happiness, yet whenever a prudent foresight shall warn us that our own liberties and institutions are threatened, then a just regard to our own safety will require us to advance to the conflict rather than await the approach of the foes of constitutional freedom and of human liberty.

On motion by Mr. CLARKE, it was Ordered, That they lie on the table and be printed.

SPIRIT RATION IN THE NAVY.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be directed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the spirit ration in the Navy of the United States, and at the same time of increasing the monthly pay of all the enlisted men in this service.

ADDITIONAL COMMITTEE CLERK.

Mr. SEBASTIAN submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be authorized to employ a clerk during the present session of Congress.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. FORNEY, their Clerk:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The House of Representatives have passed the following bills from the Senate:

THE COMPROMISE MEASURES.

The PRESIDENT announced the arrival of the hour for the consideration of the special order, viz: the resolution some time since submitted by Mr. FORTÉ, of Mississippi, declaring the compromise measures a definitive settlement of all questions growing out of the subject of slavery.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope that resolution will be laid upon the table or passed over informally, that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of the bounty land bill. I move that its consideration be postponed until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT. By unanimous consent it may be passed over.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope it will be passed over, for the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. McRAE,] who is desirous to follow the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] on that subject, is prevented by sickness from being in his seat to-day.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection to its being passed over.

The resolution was accordingly passed over.

ASSIGNABILITY OF LAND WARRANTS.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives explanatory of the act passed September 28, 1850, entitled "An act granting bounty lands to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States."

The PRESIDENT. An amendment has been reported to that bill by the Committee on Public Lands, which will be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That all warrants for military bounty lands which have been or may hereafter be issued under any law of the United States, and all valid locations of the same which have been or may hereafter be made, are hereby declared to be assignable, according to such form, and pursuant to such regulations as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, so as to vest the assignee with all the rights of the original owner of the warrant or location.

Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, That the registers and receivers of the land offices shall hereafter be severally authorized to charge and receive for their services in locating all military bounty land warrants issued since the 11th day of February, 1847, the same compensation or percentage to which they are entitled by law for sales of the public lands for cash, at the rate of $1 25 per acre, the said compensation to be hereafter paid by the assignees or holders of such warrants where they have been transferred under the provisions of any act of Congress and the regulations of the General Land Office: and to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States upon the adjustment of the accounts of such officers, where it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office that the warrant was located by the soldier or warrantee, or his next of kin, as provided for by law.

Sec. 3. Be it further enacted, That registers and receivers, whether in or out of office at the passage of this act, or their legal representatives in case of death, shall be entitled to receive from the Treasury of the United States, for services heretofore performed in locating military bounty land warrants, the same rate of compensation provided in the preceding section for services hereafter to be performed, after deducting the amount already received by such officers under the act entitled "An act to require the holders of military land warrants to compensate the land officers of the United States for services in relation to the location of those warrants," approved May 17th, 1848: Provided, That no register or receiver shall receive any compensation out of the Treasury for past services, who has charged and received illegal fees for the location of such warrants: And provided further, That no register or receiver shall receive for his services during any year a greater compensation than the maximum now allowed by law.

Sec. 4. Be it further enacted, That in all cases where the militia or volunteers or State troops of any State were called into the service of the United States, and whose services have been accepted and paid by the United States subsequent the 18th June, 1812, the officers and soldiers of such militia, volunteers or troops shall be entitled to all the benefits of the act entitled "An act granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," approved September 28th, 1850, and shall receive lands for their services according to the provisions of said act, upon proof of length of service as therein required.

Sec. 5. Be it further enacted, That where any company, battalion or regiment, in an organized form, marched more than twenty miles to the place where they were mustered into the service of the United States, or were discharged more than twenty miles from the place where such company, battalion, or regiment was organized; in all such cases, in computing the length of service of the officers and soldiers of any such company, battalion, or regiment, with a view to determine the quantity of land any officer or soldier is entitled to under said act, approved 28th September, 1850, there shall be allowed one day for every twenty miles from the place where the company, battalion, or regiment was organized, to the place where the same was mustered into the service of the United States; and also one day for every twenty miles from the place where such company, battalion, or regiment was discharged, to the place where it was organized, and from whence it marched to enter service.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not propose to make any remarks, by way of a speech, on the subject of the provisions of this bill, unless it shall be assailed by some other Senator, and then I shall reply to any suggestions which may be made against it. I rise now to offer a slight amendment to the amendment which has been sanctioned by the Committee on Public Lands. The original amendment which the committee have offered was introduced by the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] and was referred to the Committee on Public Lands with the bill. The committee modified the amendment to some extent, but in that modification, upon consultation with the gentleman from Maine, and likewise on consultation with members of the committee, it has been thought that the language retained in the amendment which has just been read does not express with sufficient clearness the idea which was intended to be conveyed by the amendment. That part of the fourth section which I propose to amend reads as follows:

"That in all cases where the militia, or volunteers, or State troops of any State were called into the service of the United States, and whose services have been accepted and paid by the United States."

The change which I wish to be made is, to strike out the word "the," before the word "service," and insert in its place the word "military," and to strike out the words "of the United States;" also to strike out the words "accepted and." If the amendment shall prevail, then the language will be:

"That in all cases where the militia or volunteers or State troops of any State were called into military service, and whose services have been paid for by the United States," then they shall have the benefit of this act.

If this amendment shall be adopted, it will make the language very explicit, and show the intention of Congress to grant bounty lands to those troops who were called into service for military purposes by a State, or by an officer of the United States, and whose services were paid for by the United States, thereby showing an acceptance on the part of the Government of the services thus rendered. It will not confine the operations of the act to those troops which were mustered into service according to the provisions of the previous acts. It will, perhaps, enlarge somewhat the bounty of Congress towards those who rendered meritorious services, and it will not require the same particularity to be observed which was required to be observed by former acts, in regard to the manner in which the troops were called into service. If the amendment prevails, the question will be, in regard to any troops, Did they render military service? and was that service so far sanctioned by the Government as to be paid for by it? If they rendered service, and were paid, it is the object of the Committee on Public Lands to give them the benefit of the bounty of Congress. I hope that the amendment of the committee will be amended in the manner I have proposed, as it is more verbal than anything else, and I hope that this amendment may be agreed to, and the bill passed.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I move to amend the amendment, as it has been modified by the motion of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, by inserting after the word "service" the words "in any of the wars mentioned in the act of 28th September, 1850, entitled 'An act granting bounty lands to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States.'"

If that amendment shall be adopted, it will make necessary the adoption of another amendment, which I now offer:

"That the last proviso of the 9th section of the act of the 11th of February, 1847, be and the same is hereby repealed: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall authorize bounty lands to those who have heretofore received or become entitled to the same."

The PRESIDENT. The question will first be taken on the first amendment.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I will offer a few words in explanation of the effect intended to follow the adoption of these amendments. By the original act of 1847, which granted bounty lands to soldiers engaged in the Mexican war, and by the subsequent act of the 28th of September, 1850, proposed to be explained by this act, there were two or three classes of persons omitted from the benefit of those acts. In consequence of a proviso to the ninth section of the act of 1847, all persons engaged in the war with Mexico were excluded from the provisions of that act, who were not actually marched to the seat of war. The act of the 28th of September, 1850, rather improved upon that. It required that all persons who were to receive the bounties of the act, should have been mustered into the service of the United States and performed actual service. The effect of this provision was to exclude the same classes of persons that were excluded by the last proviso of the act of 1847. The Committee on Public Lands, who have had this subject under consideration, have now obviated the requirements of the act of 1850 so far as to embrace the entire class of persons enumerated in the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Kentucky. It dispenses with actual service. It dispenses with the requirement that the person should have been mustered into the services of the United States. The result is; that the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky embraces every person engaged in the different wars mentioned in the act of 1850, whose services inured to the benefit of the United States; without regard to the fact whether they were engaged in the actual conflict of arms, or were mustered into the services of the United States, or were marched to the seat of war.

So far as any policy is indicated in that amendment, I go further. The amendment of the honorable Senator from Kentucky contains nothing more than what is an equitable adjustment of the rights and claims of every person engaged in the military service of the United States to the bounty of the Government. But there was a class of soldiers who served in the Mexican war who come within the description of the amendment of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, but who have been excluded by a technical construction which was, as it was thought, benevolently placed upon the act of 1847. I mean that class of men—and there are many of them—who, though enlisted for the service—although they underwent privations which in other cases have entitled men to the gratitude and bounty of the Government, yet who were excluded by the operation of the proviso of the ninth section of the act of 1847, from the simple fact that they were not marched to the seat of war. It so happens that one half of one of the regiments of Missouri volunteers, who come within the description of the proviso of the act of 1847, have received their bounty. It was, to be sure, by a mistaken view of the operation of the act; but the error was not corrected until one half of the regiment had received their bounty. The operation of the amendments which I have had the honor to offer, will be nothing more than to extend the same measure of justice to the remainder of that regiment which has already been accorded to one half of it by the action of the executive department.

There is another reason why these amendments of mine should be adopted. The act of 1847, in the proviso to which I have just alluded, had a retrospective as well as a prospective operation. It is no doubt in the recollection of all that at that time, during the prosecution of the war with Mexico, the policy of the Government had been suddenly changed. The tactics of the war had been revolutionized, and there had been adopted a more vigorous system for the prosecution of the war. The consequence was that the Government exerted all its energies for the purpose of calling out a sufficient force to conquer peace, in the language of that day. It was thought necessary for that purpose to hold out temptations and inducements—a kind of premium, to men to enlist in the service of the United States. The consequence of this has been that those who enlisted after the passage of the act of 1847, notwithstanding many of them were not marched to the seat of war, have received the bounty of Government, whilst those who performed precisely the same character of services, and underwent the same privations, but whose patriotism had induced them to offer their services at an early period of the war, when the Government was not offering bounties, have been excluded from the benefit of the provisions of that act.

If this were now an original question, it might become necessary to resort to a very different kind of argument. It might be necessary to show the policy and justice of this law. But we are no longer holding forth temptations to men to enlist in our service. We are no more fulfilling faith pledged in the contracts of the Government. But we are remunerating the services of soldiers engaged in our late wars. This is nothing but an act of gratuity—a mere bestowal of the bounty of the Government upon those who have earned its gratitude. Whatever may have been the original policy of these acts, the policy of the Government has now been changed. We are now proposing to extend bounties to men, and we are adjusting a sliding scale by which to measure the gratitude of the Government. I have shown that we have not yet accorded justice according to the equity of the case.

The principle which I now ask to be sanctioned by the adoption of my amendments in reference to the soldiers of the Mexican war, is the introduction of no new principle. It has already been recognized in the amendment which the Senator from Kentucky has offered and which has been adopted. One half of one of the Missouri regiments have already obtained the very bounties which it is now proposed to extend to the other half. All those soldiers who enlisted after the passage of the act of 1847, have, for the same class of services, received the bounty of the Government, whilst those who enlisted previously have been unprovided for. It is necessary, therefore, to equalize and make uniform the bounty of the Government. For that purpose I have offered these amendments.

Mr. BRADBURY. The language employed by the honorable Senator from Arkansas is exceedingly indefinite. If the object of that amendment be to secure bounty land to a certain regiment of troops, or to a portion of a regiment, the other portion having already received the benefits of a former act, it will be very easy to specify in distinct terms the extent to which the Senator desires that the amendment may reach. In other words, we can hardly understand the extent to which it may be construed to reach. It looks so indefinite that it may go much beyond the scope designed by the honorable Senator. If his object is to reach any particular regiment or class of men, he can say so in the amendment. I hope that after the committee have matured the bill, and given attention to the language employed, we shall not hastily adopt an amendment of a character so exceedingly general and indefinite.

Mr. HAMLIN. The original section, as was stated by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] was drawn up by myself, and it was drawn after a consultation with the Pension Bureau. I believe the section was drawn up by myself in that office; and it was to obviate precisely the objection to which the Senator from Arkansas has alluded. If he will look at the section as the committee have reported it, or amended it subsequently, he will find that it will meet precisely the class of cases which he designs to meet, while the amendment which he desires to adopt will leave it somewhat ambiguous; for in all cases where the Government has received and paid for services, the right to the warrant is recognized by the bill as reported.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would remark to my friend from Arkansas that there is in the fourth section an expression to which I will call his attention. It is this:

"That in all cases where the militia or volunteers or State troops of any State were called into the service of the United States, and whose services have been accepted and paid by the United States subsequent to the 18th of June, 1812," &c.

Now, if the Senator from Arkansas will lay a stress upon the expression "subsequent to the 18th of June, 1812," he will find that the section does embrace all that his amendment calls for. I trust, therefore, that he will not insist upon his amendment.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. As my amendment seems to alarm the Senator from Maine, and as he supposes that that amendment embraces a large and undefined additional class of persons, I will withdraw my first amendment and content myself with the repeal of the provision of the act of 1847. The effect of that will be precisely to carry out what the Senator from Maine considers as the effect of this amendment.

The Senator from Kentucky will allow me to remind him that while the provision of the act of 1847 is in force, it excludes, as a class, all persons engaged in that war, and that the most proper way to do would be to construe these acts together. Now, by simply repealing the proviso of the act of 1847, and withdrawing the amendment, which seems to meet with some dissatisfaction on my right, the object we are aiming at will be attained, which is not to disturb the description of the wars in which these soldiers were engaged, but to remove an impediment which has hitherto existed in the way of carrying out what is supposed to be the spirit of the law, and to place a very limited class of persons who were engaged in the Mexican war upon the same footing as those embraced in the amendment suggested by the Committee on Public Lands. I therefore withdraw the first amendment, and submit to the Senate the latter one, which is—"That the last proviso of the ninth section of the act of the 11th of February, 1847, be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall authorize bounty lands to those who have heretofore received or become entitled to the same."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I rise for the purpose of stating to the Senate, that the effect of that proviso in the bill of 1847 was not considered in the committee at all. I have read the proviso at the desk of my friend over the way, and that proviso refuses to give bounty land to those soldiers who enlisted in the Mexican war or who were called to fight in the Mexican war, unless they were marched to the scene of battle. Now, that was not considered in committee; and the only objection to the repeal of that proviso is, that we may be doing something; the effect of which we do not exactly foresee. It would seem equitable that those men should be paid who enlisted, and who remained at home performing military service or in the garrison, and did not go to the frontier. The only objection I have, then, to the amendment is, that it was not considered in committee, and we do not see precisely how far it may go, or why it was that this proviso was originally inserted in the bill, that bounty lands should not be granted unless the soldiers actually marched to the frontier. I do not know the reasons which influenced Congress on that point. If these soldiers were otherwise entitled to bounty lands, I do not see why they should be prohibited from receiving them because they remained at home or in the garrison. I would be willing to vote for the amendment unless it should be thought that it would embarrass the bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. It seems to me that the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas should be adopted. The bill or amendment reported by the Senator from Kentucky, embraces precisely the spirit of the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas. By a technical construction of the law, the Department did not allow bounty lands to that class of men who were not mustered into service under United States officers, and they were excluded under that construction. The original law provided that they must be in the service of the United States, and the Department determined that, to come within the provision of that law, they must have been technically mustered into service. Now, we have reported a bill which goes upon one principle, and draws the distinction in another place, to wit: That where the soldiers have been paid by the Government, it should be assumed that they have been in the service of the Government; and that is the equitable place where the bill draws the line, and where, in my humble judgment, the distinction should be drawn; and if this amendment of the Senator from Arkansas is adopted, it will only be carrying out in words, what this bill carries out in spirit. I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I should like to hear the proviso, which the Senator from Arkansas proposes to repeal, read.

The proviso was accordingly read, as follows:

"Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall be so construed as to give bounty lands to such volunteers as were accepted into service and discharged, without being marched to the seat of war."

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the amendment as reported by the committee.

Mr. HUNTER. I rise to suggest to the Senator from Kentucky, whether this compensation is not higher than it need be. I find a law on the statute-book in relation to this subject, in which the measure of compensation is established for those who enter the warrants given for bounty lands during the Mexican war. It seems to me probable that that would be the best measure, and that it would be better to substitute that rule for the one proposed here. I throw the suggestion out for the consideration of the Senator from Kentucky. Here is a measure already established, providing the price to be paid for registering those land warrants:

"Be it enacted, &c., That for the services which may be rendered after the passage of this act by the registers and receivers of the several land offices of the United States, in carrying out the provisions of the ninth section of the act of the 11th of February, 1847, entitled 'An act to raise for a limited time an additional military force, and for other purposes,' they shall each be entitled to require from the holders of warrants issued under that act for one hundred and sixty acres, the sum of fifty cents for each, and from the holders of warrants issued under the same law for forty acres, the sum of twenty-five cents for each, as full compensation for their services: Provided, That in all cases where a warrant is located by and for the use of the volunteer or soldier to whom such warrant may have issued for services under the act aforesaid, no compensation shall be charged either by the register or receiver for making such location."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to my friend from Virginia, that the committee very thoroughly considered the subject, and came to the conclusion that fifty cents was not an adequate compensation; they therefore enlarged the compensation, and at the same time put in a limit, as you will perceive that the compensation is not to exceed the maximum allowed by law. It may not come up to that.

Mr. HUNTER. What is that maximum?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is three thousand dollars. The statements that came before the committee in our deliberations were, that it gave more trouble to make these entries, and locate these military bounty lands, than to grant a certificate upon cash payments. It was stated that the labor was greatly enhanced, and that fifty cents was not a sufficient compensation. Therefore we gave the compensation which is here stated, and put a limit to it. The committee thought that a sufficient guard to secure the interest of the Government, at the same time that it would allow these officers a sufficient compensation. It was all thoroughly considered in the committee, and I hope it will be allowed to stand as the committee have arranged it.

Mr. WALKER. If the amendment be adopted, will it be in order to move to amend it?

The PRESIDENT. It will not be in order to move to amend it until it is reported to the Senate.

Mr. DOWNS. I have an amendment to offer to meet certain cases, for which I see the bill does not provide. At the last session of Congress there was a clause inserted in the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, which I certainly did not notice at the time, and which, perhaps, no member of the Senate noticed, which operates very injuriously upon a certain class of holders of bounty land warrants. The effect of it is to exclude them from the application of such warrants in payment of their preemption, even where they are the original holders of the warrants. It is operating with very great injustice, as I know. I have known cases where the original holders could not enter upon land on which they resided, in consequence of this proviso. I wish therefore to offer an amendment, which is, merely to repeal this restriction, so as to leave the law as it was before the adoption of this proviso, and allow them to locate on lands which they have settled upon, on payment of their preemption. It certainly is an act of great injustice, to say that the homestead on which they have made many improvements may be taken from them, with the bounty land warrant in their hands, and that they cannot locate upon their own homestead. The proviso which I desire to have repealed is as follows:

"Provided, That no land bounty for military service granted by the act of twenty-eighth September, one thousand eight hundred and fifty, entitled 'An act granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States, or by virtue of any other act of Congress heretofore passed, granting land bounties for military services shall be satisfied out of any public land not heretofore brought into market, and now subject to entry at private sale under existing laws.'"

Now the only object of that proviso is, not to allow the old soldiers, who hold these bounty land warrants, to enter this preemption before the land is subject to public sale; to let it stand and come into competition with other lands. I hope it will be repealed, and for that purpose I offer the following amendment:

Provided, That the proviso in the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill of the year 1850, which restricts the location of bounty land warrants not heretofore brought into market, and now subject to entry at private sale under existing laws, be, and the same is hereby repealed.

That will leave it just as it was before. I would say that the objection which is made, is not valid, in my opinion. If I understand it rightly, the land warrants were not assigned for the payment of the preemption; but while held by the original holders they could be so received. That was the law before this amendment was made. If gentlemen wish to make it more specific, I am willing that it should be limited to the holders or their heirs; but I wish that the holders themselves may have the right to enter their preemption with these bounty land warrants.

Mr. WALKER. I would not have the least objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana, if it were to have only such an effect as he intends or has expressed himself as intending. If he will draw up an amendment which will give to the preëmptor the right to hold the land on which he has settled, I will go with him. But I can tell the Senator what will be the effect of his amendment. He will find that these land warrants will be held in large numbers by persons in anticipation of some new tract of country for which we have just paid the Indians, being opened for sale; and as soon as it is in market you will have them coming in with their warrants to take up the whole of it, and thus prevent the Government from selling a single dollar's worth for money. I am in favor of such an amendment as the Senator appears to intend—that is, to give to the preëmptor the right to obtain his title to his land by this depreciated paper currency, as well as to enable others to get it away from him. Now, if the operation of the proviso in the act to which the Senator has referred is as he has described it, it is only consistent with the whole system. The design is not to facilitate settlements, or to aid those who are disposed to settle to make a location. That is not the object; and if there were an express proviso in the law declaring that no settler should have his title by a land warrant, it would be in perfect keeping with the whole system. The effect of this amendment would only be to enable speculators to buy up these warrants, and the Senator from Louisiana indicates the most unsophisticated innocence if he supposes it would have any other effect. The whole object of the bounty land system is the very contrary of what the Senator would seem to suppose it. It is not to give the land to the settler, but to the speculator. If the Senator from Louisiana saw this matter in its proper light, he would see that the provision of the bill to which he has referred is perfectly consistent with the whole system, and that Senators would be acting very inconsistently if they sought for its repeal.

Mr. DOWNS. The Senator from Wisconsin has attributed to me a good deal of "unsophisticated innocence," [laughter.] There is very little doubt that I am not more innocently unsophisticated than himself. There might, indeed, have been some doubt on that point until the gentleman replied to the proposition which I made, and that was that the practice of the land office before this provision was passed was to prevent all the evil which the gentleman preaches so strongly against, because, as I stated before, they did not allow the assigned warrants to be located in payment of preemption except in the hands of the original owners. It is not because I wished to make any change in the law as formerly existed that I have introduced this amendment. I am not aware of any complaint of the practice under that law, but it is because I have found in my communication with my constituents the actual holder of these bounty lands in danger of having his preemption taken from him unless he could prove it up before public sale. I repeat again, that my only object is to restore the law as it was before, and I do not care whether these transferred warrants can be located on preemptions or not. No, Mr. President, if I was not so "unsophisticated" as the gentleman from Wisconsin seems to suppose, I could readily show how the assignment of land warrants could benefit other men as well as speculators. I understand that the gentleman is a great advocate for homesteads and homestead exemptions, and for giving the public lands to actual settlers. Now it may appear to him very "unsophisticated," but it does not to me, that if you fix the law so that a settler can get land at a little less than the Government price and secure his settlement upon it, it might, peradventure, operate not altogether in favor of the speculator alone, but in favor of those very settlers whom the gentleman has made such a noise about. You wish to give the settlers their rights; and when we wish to make these warrants assignable when we know they will be sold under par, the cry is raised that they are to go into the hands of the speculators. "Oh, no," the gentleman replies, "that is not my thunder; that is not my scheme; and therefore it is very unsophisticated to suppose it."

I go for facilitating, in every possible and legal manner, the entry of their preemption rights by the settlers; and when I see that these warrants may be sold under par, and that the settler may be enabled to get his one hundred and sixty acres of land for less than he would by the payment of cash—and I know that the original holders of the warrants can do it—I am in favor, and if I had the office of an agent myself, I would be in favor of the free payment of these warrants. But does the gentleman oppose the assignability? Does not the original law say that they may be assigned? But the question of their assignability is not now before us. I am not particular about the form, but as that provision did the evil, I thought the most effectual way was to eradicate it; and I think so yet.

Mr. WALKER. I am really very sorry that my manner should have led the honorable Senator from Louisiana to suppose that I meant to speak disrespectfully of him in the least; nor do I know by his words that he deems me as speaking disrespectfully, but I judge so from his manner only. Now, I said to him and to the Senate, that I was with him in his amendment, provided that this bill making land warrants assignable was to pass. And while I am with him in that amendment if the bill is to pass, I want the preëmptor to be on an equal footing with the speculator. Hence I am with him; and what I meant, in speaking of his innocence in regard to this whole system, was intended as a compliment; for I intended to excuse him, as one of those who were not guilty of the scheme which thus favors the speculators.

Mr. DOWNS. I did not so understand the Senator.

Mr. WALKER. It is what I really meant, and I do believe that if there be a man who is really innocent of any design to aid the speculators, the honorable Senator from Louisiana is the one, for I have never seen him operating in any way to favor them. I meant what I said as a sort of satire upon the system of issuing land warrants at all, and not upon the Senator from Louisiana. I will state again that my reason for favoring his amendment is, that the preëmptor may be on an equal footing with the speculator if this bill shall pass. The Senator is right. The bill in its present form will cut out the preëmptor, and will not allow him to get lands for $1 25 per acre, while the speculators will get them under this depreciating system for less than half that sum. I will suggest to the Senator, that he should offer an amendment providing that this provision of the appropriation bill of the last Congress shall not extend to persons who desire to have secure titles to land on preemption. I think the Senator may thus accomplish his object, and secure an end which is desirable.

Mr. GWIN. Although the amendment of the Senator from Louisiana may not be exactly in form, certainly the principle contained in it ought to be adopted. If that provision in the civil and diplomatic bill be not repealed, there is not a single citizen of California who can get any bounty land, because there is not a foot of land surveyed there upon which a location could be made. I presume there is not a State in the Union in which there are more persons entitled to land warrants than in California. Citizens who were in the last war, are living there. They cannot get any land there unless the provision of the civil and diplomatic bill be repealed. I hope it will be repealed.

Mr. ATCHISON. I will make a suggestion which I think will meet the object of the Senator from Louisiana. If I understand the Senator, his object is this: That a person entitled to a preemption right, shall have the privilege of paying for the preemption right to one hundred and sixty acres or eighty acres, as the case may be, with a land warrant. Why not say so at once in direct terms? Why not say that these land warrants shall be receivable at the different land offices in the United States, in payment for preemption rights? By doing that you will get through the difficulties suggested by the Senators from Wisconsin and California, for most assuredly the effect would be to allow the location of land warrants. If this amendment be adopted in its present terms, it will open all the public lands to these land warrants, whether they have or have not been offered heretofore by the Government for sale.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will read an amendment which I have prepared in consequence of the suggestion of the Senator from Louisiana, to see whether it will not reconcile all the difficulties. I concur with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. Atchison,] that it would not do to open the whole of the public lands to these land warrants, all over the country in every direction. Why not? I am asked. Because, if speculation will be carried on, as has been maintained by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. WALKER,] it would give speculators an opportunity of withholding the location of the warrants with the view of entering not only into lands which are now open but which may hereafter be opened. I am not willing to open the public lands thus. I do not think it would be good policy. But I am willing, according to the suggestion of the Senator from Louisiana, to allow the preëmptor to pay for his lands in these warrants, and with that view I have prepared in haste the following amendment. If acceptable it can be used. It is to make an additional section:

Be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any assignee of any land warrant, who is entitled to preemption, to pay for such preemption in whole or part with the warrant or warrants he or she may hold as assignee, anything in a former law to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. DOWNS. That would meet the object, with the exception that there is an omission in it. It gives the assignee power to pay with the warrant, but does not give the original holder that power. By inserting the words "holder or" before assignee, it would meet the purpose.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Make it "warrantee or assignee," then.

Mr. DOWNS. But I have drawn up an amendment, in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri, which I think covers the whole point. It may come in as a proviso to the first section:

Provided, That any actual settler entitled to preemption may enter his preemption or any part thereof with said land warrants.

That confines it either to the original holder or assignee. I therefore withdraw my other amendment and offer this.

Mr. FELCH. It seems to me that it would be better, in carrying out the object the Senator has in view, to provide that any land warrant might be used in paying for any land subject to preemption, at the rate of $1 25 per acre, for the preemption right may attach itself to different subdivisions, and then there will manifestly be a difficulty. If it is less, the balance of the warrant cannot, under the present law, be located elsewhere. I would suggest to the Senator from Louisiana to put his amendment in that shape, that in paying for any land to which a person has a preemption right, he shall be at liberty to use any warrant he may have, at the rate of $1-25 per acre.

I will say one word in reference to the other provision referred to. The difficulty which the Senator from Louisiana wishes to obviate, does not arise from the provision which it was proposed by his first amendment to repeal. It arises from other laws altogether. In the first place, it arises from the law giving preemption right, which requires a person having such a right to pay in money for his land in a specific time; and then from the bounty land law, which specifies the land upon which the location shall be made; so that the repeal of the provision referred to would not effect his object. If the amendment were adopted, it would leave the proviso, which it is proposed to repeal, standing as it does now. I would suggest to the Senator to adopt the following, in place of his amendment:

Provided, That any person entitled to preemption right to any land, shall be entitled to use any such land warrant in payment for the same, at the rate of $1 25 per acre for the quantity of land therein specified.

Mr. DOWNS. I will accept that.

Mr. GWIN. Suppose one of the holders of these warrants is not entitled to preemption, can he locate his land under that proviso?

The PRESIDENT. Upon any land subject to private entry.

Mr. GWIN. Is that all? That cuts off a very large class of persons who are entitled to their warrants, but are in sections of country where there are no lands subject to private entry. There is not an acre on the Pacific coast subject to private entry, and will not be for years.

The amendment to the amendment was adopted. Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I offer an amendment, to come in at the latter part of the bill:

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That if any officer or soldier, entitled under the act of September 23, 1850, shall have died since the passage of said act, the right accruing under said acts to said officer or soldier shall survive to his heir or heirs at law, anything in said act to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. FELCH. I would inquire what particular case that is intended to meet? What effect, in that regard, the laws now existing have?

Mr. DODGE. I will insert in the amendment after "September 28, 1850," the words "or of this act."

Mr. HUNTER. I hope this amendment will not pass. I fear that we are overloading the original bill with amendments, and are exposing it to hazard in sending it back to the other House. This amendment proposes to alter the principle of the original bill—

Mr. DODGE. I will relieve my friend by withdrawing the amendment. It is one in which I have not much interest.

Mr. DAWSON. I have not proposed any amendment to this joint resolution; but I suggest to the friends of this measure—and I profess to be one—an amendment which I think is necessary for the protection of the Government. Under the law granting bounty lands to soldiers who served in the Mexican war, the power of transfer was given. It has often been the case that fraudulent applications have been made to the Pension Office, and evidence so strong been produced that warrants have been issued to the persons presenting them. I have understood that in one case, five different warrants have been issued for one service. These warrants have all gone into the hands of innocent purchasers, transferees, without any knowledge on their part of the fraud committed on the Government. On principles of equity the Government is bound to carry out the contract and issue a patent to each holder of the four fraudulent applications.

Now, can no plan be adopted by which the Government can be protected from this kind of imposition? A warrant is issued. It is transferable. A gets it to-day, and transfers it to B to-morrow, without any knowledge on the part of B that it is fraudulent. B applies for a patent. It is granted to him. How are we to investigate this? Can any amendment be offered to this joint resolution, in order to relieve it from these consequences? If it cannot be done, you see at once that the Government is in a position in which it is liable to be defrauded.

I have a case of the kind of which I have spoken in my mind now. A man by the name of King, of the State of Georgia, enlisted in the service during the Mexican war. He died at Sullivan's Island, in South Carolina. Immediately after the passage of the law authorizing bounty lands to be given, two females in the city of New Orleans applied, as the surviving sisters of this man, for a warrant, and the papers were made out and submitted to the office here. A warrant was issued. It was transferred to a gentleman, I believe a son-in-law of a Senator upon this floor, innocently, and he got a patent. I am now applying in the name of the true representatives of the person that died. I shall get a patent for them, and thus there will be two for the same service. I make these suggestions; and if any gentleman, who has been looking into this matter, can form an amendment by which the Government can be protected, I shall vote for it. For my part, I can at present see no way to avoid the difficulty.

Mr. HUNTER. If I understand the difficulty to which the Senator from Georgia refers, it is this: two persons claim to be the real assignees of the warrant. A patent issues to each of them. Is that the difficulty?

Mr. DAWSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUNTER. It seems to me that it would effect the Senator's object if it was provided that no patent should issue except to the last assignee whose name was upon the face of the warrant. The warrant then would show to whom the patent ought to issue, and the Government would not have to look into the question of the ownership of the warrant.

Mr. DAWSON. That is not the point. It is this: Persons fraudulently representing themselves to be the next of kin of a deceased officer or soldier, impose upon the Government testimony which goes to establish that fact. A warrant issues, and is immediately transferred to an innocent purchaser. The innocent purchaser will be protected, and a patent will have to issue under the warrant thus fraudulently obtained; and yet the rightful person will apply and he will get a proper warrant, and thereby there will be two patents for the same service.

Mr. HUNTER. The only remedy for that is to punish the man who applies fraudulently; and that remedy ought to be provided for in another act, not in this.

Mr. DAWSON. That would not get the land back to the Government.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. This is purely a legal question, and I rise for the purpose of making a few suggestions in response to my friend from Georgia, [Mr. DAWSON.] In all cases of assignment, the general principle is, that the assignee stands precisely in the same condition with the assignor. If that principle is carried out in reference to these land warrants, the assignee will occupy no better condition than the person who fraudulently obtained the warrant. If the Government, therefore, discovers the fraud before it makes the grant, it can suspend the issuing of the grant, because it has the same equity against an assignee that it has against a fraudulent holder of a warrant. In that case, the Government would withhold the grant of the patent, and refuse to allow this fraudulent warrant to be carried into a grant. That is one remedy.

The difficulty would arise in this way. Before making any discovery of the fraud the warrant may be located, and a patent may then issue. If the patent issues, and the Government thereby parts with its title, the title is passed into the hands of an innocent holder by that transfer. But how are you to get clear of that fraud? The innocent holder will say if you attempt to deprive him of his land, that it is your own fault to have brought this title into market whereby it came into his hands innocently, and that he should not be the loser by it. The question is, can you have any remedy for that state of the case? You have but one remedy, and the question is, would it be politic to apply it? What is the remedy? There is but one, and that is to declare that all grants and all warrants issued in fraud of these acts shall be void. You cannot reach it any other way than by declaring, that whenever a warrant is issued in fraud of the law, that the warrant and all subsequent steps taken to perfect it and every subsequent act are wholly and utterly void by law, and passes no title from the Government to the fraudulent holder of the claim. That would be a complete remedy if a proposition of this sort should be offered and adopted.

But then the question is, would it be politic to apply that remedy? Would it be proper to provide by law that the patents which issue upon those warrants shall be void? If that is done, it will embarrass to a very considerable extent the sale of this property in the market; and you are making these land warrants assignable with a view of benefiting the old soldier. When you adopt such a remedy as that, the purchaser of the warrant will say to the soldier, I can give you so much for it, and no more, because I am not sure but that half a dozen other warrants have been issued before this, fraudulently, for this identical service. When a tract of land patented is offered to be sold, the speculator and the purchaser will say to the seller, I can only offer you so much for it, because I have to risk the fact whether half a dozen other patents have not been founded on this same service; five out of which half dozen must be fraudulent. By an attempt to prescribe a remedy in a case of the kind, you embarrass all the titles and all the tracts, and produce the state of things which I have anticipated.

There is no difficulty about this thing if the officers of the Government will only do their duty. And I am sorry to say that from an investigation at the Pension Office where these land warrants are granted, that there are not those alphabets kept which are necessary in order to prevent these frauds being practised upon the Government. There ought to be an alphabet kept and arranged in such a way that whenever an application is made to obtain a warrant, it would be within the power of the officers of the Pension Bureau to turn directly to the record and ascertain whether a warrant has been issued before for that identical claim.

I am sorry to say that I believe this is not the fact; I have had occasion to inquire into matters of this sort, and it is almost impossible to get that direct information which would be easily obtained if these alphabets were kept in such manner as to obtain at once the full information which ought to be had.

Sir, I am inclined to think that we had better let things go on as they are, and make these land warrants assignable without making a provision in this bill to cover the fraudulent cases which my friend from Georgia supposes may exist. That there will be frauds practised on the Government to some extent, we may well imagine from what has already taken place. If the officers of the Government would keep such an alphabet as that to which I have alluded, and would look into that before multiplying warrants, then there would never be two warrants issued upon the same claim.

Mr. BELL. You would have to issue the rightful one whenever it was claimed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It may be as my friend says, that you would have to issue the rightful warrant whenever it was claimed, but it would be done upon full deliberation, and in that way you would find that you had issued one warrant fraudulently, and there would not be more than two issued. But in the case which my honorable friend from Georgia puts, there may be half a dozen, and perhaps a dozen, fraudulent warrants issued, unless officers of the Government will work in the way I have mentioned. I have had occasion before this, to remark that I considered it to be the absolute duty of Congress to have all the executive offices, and the books in those offices, examined from beginning to end, in order that we might know how the executive departments conduct their business and keep their books. We could then see what frauds were permitted. I do not know that this has ever been done. It has not been done since I have been a member of Congress. I do not know that it has been done since the foundation of the Government to this day, but I believe that there is not a State Legislature in the United States that does not do the same thing annually.

I have thrown out these remarks by way of answer to the suggestions of the honorable Senator from Georgia. I do not see that there can be any remedy, unless you will provide, as I have suggested, that everything that does issue without sufficient legal warrant shall be void. That would reach the case, but the question is, whether it would not be impolitic.

The PRESIDENT. No amendment has been proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. DAWSON. None at all. I would have proposed an amendment, such as is suggested by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, but for the fact that I thought it would depreciate the value of the warrants in the market, and thereby injure the old soldier, whereas it is the object of the bill to benefit him.

Mr. DAVIS. I am inclined to think that this difficulty may be met in two ways. It may be met by declaring that a warrant issued on fraudulent evidence shall be void. That might embarrass some people it is true; but if this is not done there will be an innocent holder of every fraudulent warrant that is issued, and you can never reinstate yourself. But if there be one or more fraudulent warrants issued in the name of an individual, you will have to issue the true warrant after all. Now, I apprehend that if you go a little behind this, there must be some defect in the proceedings. I regret that the honorable Senator from Georgia did not tell us by what kind of evidence this heirship of which he spoke was established. The falsity of this thing lies in a person's coming forward and pretending to be heir to a soldier when he is not an heir, and establishing that fact by evidence satisfactory to the bureau. Suppose, now, that you should require that whoever undertakes to establish heirship, shall establish it in the locality by evidence before a judge, and that that judge shall place the seal of the court to it, how is it then to be fabricated? There is no difficulty in requiring that information at all. How, then, is it to be fabricated? Why a man may forge the seal of the court. But that interposes another difficulty, for there is a severe punishment annexed to that crime. I apprehend that by some such provision as that, either adopted voluntarily in the bureau, or if not adopted there made compulsory by law, would put a stop to fraudulent pretensions of this sort. It would not, under such circumstances, be a very easy thing for a person falsely claiming to be heir to establish that fact before a judge in the vicinity who, upon satisfactory evidence, should put his seal of office to the testimony. I do not see a great deal of difficulty in it.

It seems to me an amendment might be easily drawn up which would meet the case.

The substitute reported by the Committee on Public Lands as amended was agreed to.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, as amended in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT stated the question to be on concurring with the amendment made in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WALKER. I suppose this would be the proper time to offer an amendment to the amendment?

The PRESIDENT. It is now open to amendment.

Mr. WALKER. Before the amendment of the committee is adopted by the Senate, I have some amendments which I propose to offer. I look upon this measure as being effectually an abandonment of our present land system, but at the same time, seeing it to be evidently the determination of the Senate to pass it, I wish to offer my amendments, and shall simply ask of the Senate to give me a recorded vote on them, by yeas and nays. The first amendment which I propose to offer is to insert after section 2, as section 3 of the amendment reported by the committee, the following:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That where any person, being a citizen of the United States, or having declared his or her intention to become such according to existing laws, and being of the age of twenty-one years or upwards, or the head of a family, shall settle upon any of the public lands of the United States not reserved for forts, arsenals, dock-yards, navy-yards, or other needful buildings or special purposes, or appropriated for other special uses, except such as are known to contain mines of the precious or gross metals, or precious stones, and shall reside upon and cultivate the same, or a part thereof, for the term of five years, such person shall be allowed to enter, without charge, in legal subdivisions, at the proper land office, the land so settled upon and occupied not exceeding in quantity a quarter section, or one hundred and sixty acres, the said settlement and occupancy to be manifested and proved according to such regulations as shall be adopted and promulgated by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That when the settler shall not be a citizen of the United States, but shall have declared his intention only as aforesaid, he or she shall not be allowed to make the entry aforesaid until he or she shall have perfected his or her naturalization according to the laws of the United States.

Mr. President, the proposition which I have offered does not fully embrace my views in regard to the disposition which should be made of the public lands. I have heretofore submitted a proposition which I believed to be the correct one; and I have heretofore had hope of a favorable vote of the Senate upon it. They have, however, as often as they have voted upon it, voted it down. This amendment is going to some extent in conformity with my own individual view, but not to the whole extent. It will be perceived that this is but simply a proposition to grant to five years' actual settlers one hundred and sixty acres of the public lands without charge. It is a proposition which has been heretofore submitted to the Senate in the form of an original bill. I remember that the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] in the last Congress, offered a proposition of the kind. Mr. Webster, formerly a Senator from Massachusetts, when in this body, offered a resolution embracing a proposition of this kind. There was no final vote taken upon either of those propositions. I now bring forward this proposition; and I offer it not in competition with this bill for the assignability of land warrants, but as additional thereto.

The proposition under consideration, as reported by the committee, is not, it is true, one which proposes to grant land warrants, but one which proposes to make them assignable. However, it does propose to authorize the issue of land warrants to a certain class of soldiers, who have heretofore not been entitled to them. I think it but fair, but just, and but in keeping with the correct policy of the country, that if this class of individuals is to be permitted to have the public lands gratuitously, he who occupies the soil, who cultivates it, who contributes to the wealth of the country by the payment of taxes, should also be permitted to receive lands gratuitously. But I shall make no extended speech on this subject. I shall make no argument in advocacy of it. It is a proposition upon which every Senator must have long reflected; and the mind of every one is probably made up in regard to it. I will merely ask that the vote upon this amendment be taken by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BORLAND. Before the vote is taken, I desire to say that I have no objection to the proposition contained in this amendment, and as a separate proposition, I think I should vote for it, but as an amendment to this bill I shall vote against it; because I think it is presenting a new question, and one which must defeat the passage of the bill. I am very anxious that the bill, in its present form, should pass. For that reason I shall vote against the amendment; but I will say to the Senator, that as a separate proposition I should be favorably disposed towards it.

Mr. FELCH. I merely wish to remark, that this proposition involves a question of very great magnitude, and one which was discussed at some length at the last session of Congress. The proposition contained in this amendment, if I understand it correctly, goes further than any of the propositions which have been heretofore submitted for the attainment of the object of the Senator from Wisconsin. Most of the other propositions have provided for some compensation to the General Government for the amount expended by the General Government in procuring the title to the public domain. According to the statistical accounts upon that subject, if I recollect rightly, the cost of the public domain to the General Government is something like twenty-two cents per acre. These expenditures are constantly going on. That is, we are constantly proceeding with the surveys of the public lands. We are constantly keeping up a system of administering the public lands—land offices, surveyor's offices, &c., so that these expenditures are constantly accumulating. Former propositions proposed to remunerate the Government to a certain extent—some to a greater and some to a less extent for these expenditures. This proposition, however, abandons that entirely, and provides simply for granting a portion of the public domain to every person who shall settle upon it without any compensation therefor. The other bills always provided for carrying out the details of the new system. If I understand the reading of the amendment correctly, we are to require that there shall be five years' occupancy before any title can be acquired by the settler. It is perfectly obvious if we are to provide for a system of that kind, we need further legislation upon that subject.

The Senator from Wisconsin proposes the adoption of a new and complicated system. When I say he proposes a new system, I do not mean by that that we have never had any laws which required a settlement of the lands before certain rights were acquired; but I mean new as applied to the general distribution of the public domain—a great and important interest as every man must see; and so it has ever been regarded. The little experience which we have had in this matter, is that which relates to Florida—to the armed occupation of Florida, as it was called. We required a settlement for a certain length of time to acquire certain rights. The legislation upon that subject is most instructive. From the time we passed a law giving certain rights of this description, and providing for a certain manner of proof to show a compliance with the law, almost up to the present time, there has never been a session of Congress in which there has not been more or less legislation on that subject. I cite this for the purpose of showing that this amendment involves grave and important questions.

If it is the will of the Senate, and of Congress, and of the country to change the administration of the public lands, let us never forget that we are dealing with a great and momentous question; and that there is connected with it, and must be connected with it, a vast machinery, so complicated, that unless our legislation upon the subject shall be carefully matured, unless we shall have recourse to the lights of experience upon the subject, unless we resort to a careful observation of the results of what we have done, we shall never be able to adopt such a system as will accomplish the objects of those who desire to see it carried into effect.

Sir, I have my own views in regard to the administration of the public domain; and whatever others may think of it, I cannot regard it in any other light than as a great and momentous question. For my own part, though I am ready to take up and examine it—and I desire to examine it in a view of liberality and with a wish to afford every facility for the speedy settlement of the public domain which can be afforded—yet I certainly shall regret to see any hasty legislation on the subject. Before a proposition of this kind should be adopted, I would wish again to express my views in regard to it. If they are modified by experience, very well. If they are the same as they were last year, very well. Ought gentlemen, I know, stand in the same position. And to dispose of the matter by an amendment offered to a bill, to the subject-matter of which it has no relation, and to dispose of it by a silent vote in this manner, it seems to me would be asking almost too much. Of course, I am prepared to cast my vote on the subject, if that vote must be cast. But if we are to think of the subject maturely; if we are to act upon it, I think it would be better to take it up in a separate bill, and to act upon it by itself, and let it receive the investigation which it deserves—a full consideration by the Senate. I hope we shall not dispose of the subject in this summary manner. I shall not be in favor of adding it to this bill, nor should I be in favor of it if I agreed in the propriety of the proposition to the fullest extent. I wish to see the details of the new system.

Mr. BADGER. There is great force and wisdom in the observations of the honorable Senator from Michigan, who has just taken his seat. We seem to be complicating this measure with a great variety of things which have no connection whatever with the main scope and purpose of the bill. The object of the bill is to make these land warrants assignable, so as to put them upon the same footing with all other property in this country. That is to say, at the disposal of the owner. I have always been in favor of that object; and for one I am indisposed to add any proposition to the bill which shall not have some reasonable connection with its main object and purpose.

But I confess that so many amendments, and amendments to amendments, have been proposed, that I, for one, am incapable of understanding the operation and effect they are to have upon our general land system to which the honorable Senator from Michigan has referred. I hope, therefore, that this amendment may be allowed to be printed, and that the Senate will adjourn. I move that the amendments be printed.

Mr. BORLAND. I would suggest that the bill as amended, with the proposed amendments, be printed.

Mr. BADGER. I adopt the suggestion and make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FELCH. I understood the Senator from Wisconsin to suggest that there were some other amendments which he wished to offer to the bill. I would suggest that he had better submit them all informally, and let them be printed.

By unanimous consent the amendments were ordered to be printed.

And then the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 19, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

Prayer by the Rev. L. F. MORGAN.

The Journal of Friday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated that the first business in order was the motion made upon Monday last by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ALLISON,] to suspend the rules to enable him to offer the following resolution:

Whereas the Superintendent of the Census has published—in the Globe of January 1st, 1852—a clear and condensed report of the Census, containing a large amount of valuable information:

And whereas that information, now desired by the people, cannot be had, in the ordinary course of printing, for a long time to come, and then in limited and very inadequate quantities; therefore

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to order 100,000 copies of that report for the use of this House, provided the cost shall not exceed one cent per copy.

On this question the yeas and nays had been ordered.

Mr. SWEETSER moved to lay the resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER said that the resolution was not now before the House. The question was upon the motion to suspend the rules to enable the gentleman from Pennsylvania to offer the resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That resolution refers, I believe, to a publication that was made in the Globe. I do not know myself what it is, and I dare say that there are many gentlemen here who are in the same situation. If it is a short article, it might be read by the Clerk.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. We have all read it.

The SPEAKER said that the article could only be read by unanimous consent.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, objected.

The question was then taken, and there were—yeas 132, nays 38; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Charles Allen, Willis Allen, Andrews, John Appleton, William Appleton, Ashe, Ayerett, Bell, Bibbhaus, Bocoock, Bragg, Breckenridge, Brenton, Briggs, Brooks, Albert G. Stephens, St. Martin, Sweetser, Venable, Wallace, Walsh, and Addison White—38.

So the rules were suspended.

Mr. ALLISON then submitted his resolution.

And the question being on its adoption,

Mr. STUART moved the previous question; which was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put, which was upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia, demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. POLK called for the reading of the resolution.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. ORR. Will not this resolution, if adopted, break the contract of the public printer?

The SPEAKER. It is not for the Chair to determine what will be the effect of the resolution.

Mr. ORR. Well, that will be the result of it. If it is adopted, we shall have the public printer coming to this House for compensation.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. ORR moved to lay the resolution on the table, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. DUNCAN. Is the question debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. BOCOOCK. Has the previous question been ordered on the resolution so that it cannot be amended?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

The question was then taken, and there were—yeas 49, nays 127; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Barrere, Bocoock, Brooks, Lewis D. Campbell, Churchwell, Clingman, Colcock, Daniel, John G. Davis, Disney, Dunham, Edgerton, Florence, Hall, Hamilton, Isiah G. Abraham P. Stevens, Stuart, Taylor, Benjamin Thompson, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Townsend, Tuck, Walbridge, Ward, Washburn, Watkins, Welch, Wells, Alex. White, Wilcox, Williams, Woodward, and Yates—127.

So the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

The question being put upon the adoption of the resolution, it was agreed to.

Mr. ORR. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted. I believe that motion is debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is.

[Mr. BARRERE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as correctly enrolled the bill to admit the vessel called the Elitwaft to registry; and it received the signature of the Speaker.]

Mr. ORR. I do not propose to trouble the House with a long speech, but I desire to call their attention to the resolution they have just adopted, with the hope that the vote by which it was adopted will be reconsidered, and then that it will be rejected. Before proceeding I desire to inquire of the gentleman who introduced this resolution if it was not his purpose, if it was not understood that this printing, instead of being executed by the public printer of the House, is to be executed at the Globe office?

Mr. ALLISON. With the consent of the gentleman, I will reply to the interrogatory he has addressed to me. I certainly had no such intention; I had no purpose that the publication should be made at the office of the Globe. The only desire that I had was, that we should be permitted to disseminate the information contained in that publication throughout the country. There was no design to have it published at any particular office, but that the Committee on Printing should have the entire direction of the matter, as it certainly has by the language of the resolution.

Mr. ORR. With the permission of the gentleman, I will ask him another question. Why is it then that reference is made in the preamble to the resolution to the publication in the Globe?

Mr. ALLISON. I shall answer that by saying that I did not know how I should designate the particular matter I desired to have published better than to indicate the time that report was published in the Globe, to wit: the 1st of January, 1852.

Mr. ORR. One other question, if the gentleman will favor me with an answer.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. ORR. It is proposed to give to the Committee on Printing, by virtue of this resolution, the power to contract with any other person than the public printer, if they see proper to do so. Is it intended to confer that authority?

Mr. ALLISON. In answer to the gentleman, I have to say that the authority or direction I intended to give in the language of the resolution was, that the committee should merely contract to have printed one hundred thousand copies of that report—not that they should have power to go to this office or that office, or to divert it from the office to which it rightfully belonged.

Mr. ORR. The effect of it is necessarily to take this printing from the public printer and give it to some one else. The public printer has already entered into a contract by which he obligates himself to do the printing for this House, and has entered into bond for the faithful execution of it. The terms of the resolution, by conferring upon the committee the power to go and make a contract, contemplates the taking away of this printing from the public printer. I do not object to that particularly, but only to the result that will grow out of it; and gentlemen who have any experience here will bear testimony to the fact, when I declare it, that the slightest pretext will be seized upon by the public printer to claim indemnity from this House for an alleged violation of his contract. We have had experience already upon this subject. What will be the result if the printer fail to discharge his duties? A motion will be made to bring him before the House or the Committee on Printing, to whom he will reply, that Congress has violated their contract by voting to another a portion of the public printing which legitimately belonged to him. He will bring in a memorial here claiming indemnity. It has been charged that the public printer has thus far failed to do his duty. I have nothing to say for or against him, until that becomes manifest. Let the Committee on Printing report to the House, and let them abrogate the contract system; but I object to the giving the public printer a pretext to come here and demand compensation from this House for a supposed violation of the contract, and declaring it void. If he has failed to perform his obligations, do not give him the excuse to come here and say "that you have violated the contract as well as I have, and that therefore the right does not exist in you to hold me to a strict accountability." The public printer has already begun to make complaints. I saw, a day or two ago, a memorial of his addressed to the Senate in reference to the census printing. He states that he has made large outlays, that he has purchased some five or six presses, brought hands here and a large amount of type, for the purpose of doing the printing. In my own opinion he has taken the contract at less prices than the work can be executed for. It will, I think, result in a failure; and if you give him the least pretext to come here and demand compensation by the passage of this or a similar resolution, you will settle upon yourselves the necessity of paying for the breach of contract $40,000 $50,000 or $100,000.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask the gentleman from South Carolina, whether it is within his knowledge that, if this matter goes to the Committee on Printing, they will give it to some other office than that to which it properly belongs?

Mr. ORR. My reason for assuming it to be so, is based upon the preamble of the resolution, to which I desire to call the attention of the gentleman. It reads:

Whereas the Superintendent of the Census has published—in the Globe of January 1st, 1852—a clear and condensed report of the Census, containing a large amount of valuable information:

And whereas that information, now desired by the people, cannot be had, in the ordinary course of printing, for a long time to come, and then in limited and very inadequate quantities: therefore, &c.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I understand there is a condensed report published in the Globe, and that there is also an elaborate report to be published hereafter. It is proposed by this resolution inasmuch as there is a condensed report, and that it will take a long time to print the elaborate report, that the report as contained in the Globe be published. It does not seem to me that the resolution indicates that the printing shall be done by the Globe office.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR,] if the motion to reconsider prevail, whether the resolution could not be amended so as to authorize the purchase of one hundred thousand copies of the Globe, and thus obviate all the difficulty suggested by the gentleman?

The SPEAKER. If the vote be reconsidered, it would bring the resolution back under the previous question.

Mr. ORR. I was about to remark, that by adopting the course suggested, it would obviate the objection I have stated. I am opposed myself to printing any of these copies at all, but there is evidently a majority of the House in favor of it. If the vote be reconsidered, and the resolution reached, gentlemen may move to amend it by ordering the purchasing of one hundred thousand copies of the Congressional Globe. Then it would not interfere with the public printing at all.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Printing, I will make a statement in reference to this matter, so that the House may understand the provision in the contract. Some time ago there was a resolution introduced into the Senate, directing the printing of the census to be given to the editors of the Union. That resolution was referred to the joint Committee on Printing of the two Houses. The committee met, took the matter into consideration, sent for the public printer, received from him a statement of his claim to that particular portion of the printing, which he presented in writing. That claim was examined attentively by the committee of the two Houses, together with his contract; and they came to the conclusion, I believe, unanimously, that both by the terms of the contract itself and by the law of Congress which directed the census to be taken, the public printer was not entitled to this printing. The contract itself excluded it, and the law reserved to Congress the right to print this matter as they should think proper.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32d CONGRESS, 1st Session.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 21, 1852.

NEW SERIES....No. 20.

Mr. ORR. That was altogether a different matter, I suspect, from what is contemplated in this resolution. It is an abstract of the census, as I understand it, and a contract is to be made for its printing. The very fact that the resolution contemplates the necessity of making a contract, shows that it is to be taken from the public printer, and as such I think it gives to him the right to come to this House and claim damages from the House for a violation of the contract with him, inasmuch as they contracted to give him the public printing.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I will ask the gentleman a question: I believe he is on the Committee of Printing?

Mr. ORR. I am not.

Mr. STEPHENS. I will not then put the question to him I intended. I will wait until he gets through.

Mr. ORR. I am through.

Mr. STEPHENS. The public printing of this House, Mr. Speaker, is now regulated by law. We have got a joint resolution of the two Houses passed some years ago, providing for the letting out of all the public printing to be done for the Senate and House by contract. Here is the resolution. I will not detain the House by reading it. The different kinds of printing are specifically provided for: the reports of committees at particular rates; the acts of Congress at particular rates; printed bills at particular rates; and then "all other kinds of printing ordered by either House" are provided for in a general clause. This is a public law of the land, passed by the Senate and House. In pursuance of this law, all the various classifications of printing have, at certain rates set out in the contract, been let out by contract. Now, I ask this House, how can we go and make a contract with anybody else touching any printing that we may want done, and how can we ask the present contractor to do it for less than the rates set forth in his contract? This resolution (the one now before the House) says, "provided we can get the work done for one cent per copy." The public printer has already got your bond that he shall have all the printing, classed and specified at fixed rates. That is his contract.

One word on another view, presented by the gentleman from South Carolina. He says that it would not violate our existing contract with the public printer for the House to purchase a certain number of the copies of the Globe containing this census matter from Mr. Rives. If the gentleman will look at it, I think he will see that such a course would be as much a violation of the contract as the one now under consideration, because how can you get the printing from Mr. Rives but by a bargain or contract with him to furnish you with so much printed matter of a particular kind which you want? and that is just what the present public printer has already contracted to do.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. Suppose Congress order a number of extra copies of the life of John Adams and Alexander Hamilton to be printed: does that come within the contract for the printing?

Mr. STEPHENS. I am not prepared to answer that question of the gentleman at this moment. If Congress were to make such an order, it would have to be done by law—by the joint action of the two Houses and by bill or joint resolution. Not being on the Committee on Printing, and not very familiar with all the limitations of the present contract, I am not prepared, this moment, to give an answer to the gentleman, and to say whether the present contractor would be legally entitled to the execution of such an order or not. But he must know, when we order an extra number of any document in this House, or any printing for the use of this House, the contractor for the printing is certainly entitled to it. That is the very object of the contract. It is by throwing all the work into the same hands to get it done at the lowest rates. And if we were to give any of this printing to any other person, the contractor might justly complain. That is all I have to say to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FULLER.] I consider that it would be a violation of our contract with the public printer, as it now exists, for us to order any number of any document from Mr. Rives or anybody else but the contractor. I am entirely opposed to this House taking the initiative in the violation of that contract. I am for holding these contractors to their bond. Both Houses of Congress have been very much imposed upon in the public printing.

Besides this, sir, I am opposed to sending out this abstract of the census at this time. I want such a compendium of the census as we intend to publish as soon as possible. I want it printed as soon as possible. And I trust the Committee on Printing will look to it, and if there is unnecessary delay, that they will bring the subject before the House, so as to give us an opportunity to apply the proper remedy. If we print this abstract, we shall have to reprint it in the compendium. I want but one job of printing; and I want nothing but a succinct and complete compendium.

I am utterly opposed to the publication of this large work which they are now discussing in the Senate, for it will cost us six or seven hundred thousand dollars. I believe we have already spent for the printing pertaining to this census near half a million of dollars. The exact amount I do not know, but the sum is large. How much more are you going to spend? Let us not send out these partial returns or abstracts. Let us get an accurate compendium of the whole and make one business of it. Let us wait until what we want is finished, and then have as many copies of it printed as we may think proper. I am for a reconsideration of the vote by which the resolution was passed.

Mr. DUNCAN. I am entirely at a loss to account for the sensitiveness of many gentlemen upon this floor in regard to the publishing of this very useful document. I hope the House will not be alarmed by any bugbears about the public printing or printing from ordering this publication. The resolution does not propose to take it from the public printer, if it belongs to him. It places the matter at the disposal of the Committee on Printing, who are to judge in relation to it. If they decide that this printing belongs to the public printer, they will give it to him. They are limited to be sure in the price, and if the public printer cannot print it under the limitation—one cent per copy—the committee will so report to the House, and the House will take due order upon the subject. For myself I have no great solicitude about the House being so particular to live up to their contracts with the public printer. Ever since I have been here the public printers have been violating their contracts from day to day.

Mr. ORR. The gentleman first says that this matter is to be intrusted to the Committee on Printing, and if they decide that it belongs to him, they will make the contract. Have we not a contract with the public printer which embraces this and every other description of work? How will you set aside that contract and make a new one?

Mr. DUNCAN. The answer will be this: By the resolution the cost is limited to one cent per copy. If the committee decide that the job belongs to the public printer, and he will not execute it at the price stipulated in the resolution, they come to the House for instructions. It cannot be the cost of the printing of this document that alarms the gentleman. The whole cost of the one hundred thousand copies, if my arithmetic is right, is but $1,000. I recommend it as a measure of economy, because, in my humble judgment, it will prevent the necessity of printing one thousand copies of the full returns of the census. I think that no gentleman who has read this document, will hesitate to order its publication. It is a very lucid abstract and compendium of the results of the census. The census is completed, and the whole country are desirous to learn the results. Our constituents are addressing inquiries to us every day, and from present indications no order will be taken for printing the returns of the census in full until near the close of this session. We will be fortunate if we receive them by the close of the present Congress. This compendium will furnish all the information in regard to the census which nine tenths of the people of this country require.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Let me ask the gentleman if it gives the white population of each State?

Mr. DUNCAN. I believe it does.

Mr. STEPHENS. It does not.

Mr. DUNCAN. Then I am greatly mistaken. So far as it goes, it seems to me to be a very lucid abstract of the returns of the census, and furnishes precisely that information which will be satisfactory to nine tenths of the people of this country. I hope, therefore, the House will not hesitate to order the printing.

Mr. CARTER. I voted for the suspension of the rules for the introduction of this resolution. I so voted with the distinct appreciation of the fact that in the act of doing so, we might be, or we might not be, trampling upon the nominal terms of the contract. It is suggested here, as a matter of serious apprehension to the opponents of this resolution, that the contractor with the Government for the printing of Congress may demur to this diversion of the printing of the House to the hands of other printers. He would be a pretty subject to do it—a man who has day by day and hour by hour since his undertaking lived in a series of violations of his contract.

Mr. ORR, (interposing.) I do not propose to defend the public printer. I do not know him at all. I do not know how he has discharged his duty. But I will call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to this fact, that of the public printer has failed thus far to discharge his duty, the Committee on Printing have not discharged their duty, by reporting that fact to the House.

Mr. CARTER. I am not a member of that committee, and will not hold myself responsible for their short-comings of duty. But this I do know, and this fact is known to every gentleman upon this floor, that from the opening to the close of the last Congress, and from the opening of this Congress down to the present time, this contractor has lived in violation of his contract and existed upon the mercy of this House. I hesitate not to declare that upon every occasion I will vote to send the printing where it can be had.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, (interrupting.) I desire to say, in response to the inquiry made a few moments ago by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR,] that the Committee on Printing have had this matter under consideration, and that no later than last Friday we sent for the public printer and had a long interview with him. We inquired of him how far he was prepared to go, in the faithful and honest execution of his contract; and he gave us to understand distinctly that he could not comply with his contract, and did not expect to do it, in this respect, that he was not prepared to furnish such a description of paper as the contract required. The contract requires a description of paper which weighs fifty pounds to the ream, while the paper now used weighs only from thirty-eight to fifty pounds per ream. He says that the reason is, that he cannot purchase the paper required by the contract, because he has no money to pay cash for it and cannot get it on credit. In reference to the manner of executing the work already ordered, he says that the President's message cannot possibly be ready in less than two weeks, but that nearly all the bills and reports sent to him have been printed and furnished to the House.

Mr. STUART. While the gentleman from the Committee on Printing is explaining this matter to the House, I would be glad to learn what measure is in contemplation for the relief of the contractor?

Mr. ORR. And how long it will be before they submit a report on the subject?

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I mentioned that matter to the committee, and they thought it was necessary to have some direct action on the part of the House. The honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means was appealed to, to offer a resolution instructing the Committee on Printing to take this matter into consideration and make a report upon the subject. We were ready to act, and would have acted that very day, if the resolution had been adopted, but when the honorable gentleman presented his resolution it was objected to all over the House. Whenever the House shall authorize the committee to take the subject into consideration, we shall be ready to act, and to act promptly.

Mr. CARTTER. I am very glad to learn that this public printer had honestly enough to confess to the Committee on Printing, the truth which I was stating when I was interrupted—that he never has complied with his contract, and the history of his connection with this House, has been a continued and living violation of his contract. I care nothing about it so far as he is concerned individually, but inasmuch as it encumbers, and embarrasses, and arrests the proceedings of this House, we have a right to complain. The remedy must consist either in a report from the Committee on Printing, or in the direct action of this House, in procuring the publication of the matter that it sends forth. The power to do it is here; the will to do it is here; and the duty to do it is also here. I am indisposed to await the crooked, tortuous delay experienced by the last Congress through the action of the Committee on Printing. In the first place, we are encumbered by a set of rules, under which we can do nothing except out of order; and in the second place, we are encumbered with an insolvent contractor, who holds back the printing that we order, under the pretext that he cannot do it, and then this very insolvency of the contractor is held up by honorable gentlemen as a solemn obstacle to the publication of our documents.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, (interrupting.) I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio, that if we have an insolvent contractor, it would be well for us immediately to impeach those officers who made the contract with him. Let us be bound by our laws. The law requires that those who make the contract, shall take good security for the faithful fulfillment of it. Now if it be true that this has not been done—and I do not know whether it is true or not—let us commence rightly, by bringing those who made the contract to judgment and punishment.

Mr. CARTTER. The gentleman from Georgia differs from me in an important particular. He proposes to stay the hand of Congress, to delay the action of the House, and deprive us of this printing until we can try a collateral question, and impeach collateral officers. Now, I am for impeaching these officers, if they have been guilty of a dereliction of duty, but I would disregard the contract too.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The gentleman would not do it without a hearing.

Mr. CARTTER. Not at all. I would give them from now till the day of judgment, but I would have the printing done in the mean time.

Mr. STEPHENS. Let me make another suggestion. Would it not be better for us this day to instruct the Committee on Printing to inquire into the condition of the public printing before we violate the contract?

Mr. CARTTER. I think not. It is against my whole view of the subject to do any such thing. According to my understanding of the legal obligation of a contract, when one party finds the other in default, and especially in default in a precedent undertaking, he is at liberty to disregard the obligation, and the laches on the part of the precedent obligee furnishes a legal foundation for his doing it. Now, this contractor has, in conversation with our committee, acknowledged himself to be in that position, and still the gentleman from Georgia suggests that we had better delay.

Mr. STEPHENS. The joint Committee on Public Printing have made no such report.

Mr. CARTTER. That is very well understood by the House.

Mr. STEPHENS. Let us call for a full report. Let the committee announce to this House, in pursuance of law, that the contract has been forfeited, and then I will assist the gentleman to provide a remedy.

Mr. CARTTER. The only difference between the honorable member and myself is, that he proposes to travel through the formula of a report, instead of taking a confessed fact and acknowledging truth.

Mr. KING, of New York. There is one point which has not been alluded to in this discussion, to which I desire to call the attention of the House for my own information, and for theirs.

I understand that in case of the refusal or neglect of the public printer to do the work suitably and conveniently for the House, there is authority by the contract itself to procure the printing to be done elsewhere.

Mr. TAYLOR. Who is authorized to do it?

Mr. KING. Why, the parties who made the contract under the authority of the House—the clerks, I suppose. I ask that the Committee on Printing should communicate to the House whether what I have stated is the fact or not. I understand that it is so.

Mr. CARTTER. My view of the subject presupposes that there is no such express alternate in the contract, but that the House has the alternative that every party to a contract that has been violated has, in virtue of the violation itself, and that is clearly our condition. This printer has neither conformed to his contract in time, ink, paper, or any of the essential elements of his undertaking; this has been a confessed truth through two long years; and here we are now, starting off in a new Congress with the same promises of infidelity to the contract, and yet we are arrested when we attempt to pick up a little abstract of the census, with the plea that we are endangering the integrity of our contract with this party. For one, I am prepared to do it. The result of this census, if dependent on the administration of this contract and the disposition of the Census Department or Bureau—whichever you call it—will not be published until we are called upon to take another Census. The Census Office is assuming the character of a permanent bureau, and all the agencies and appliances about that office have in their tendencies the object of making it a fixed Department of the Government. And, therefore, instead of having a prompt and punctual publication of the results of the census, which is only valuable for present purposes, except as an historic document, it is being delayed for years. It is an abuse of the Government to tolerate it. It is an abuse of the public mind to tolerate it. What with this printer and the tendency of the Department to protract its action in connection with the census, you will drag along through this Congress without enlightening the public in reference to the results of the last census.

One of the important designs of the last Congress, in giving the details of statistics embodied in that census, was to enlighten the citizens of the United States and our public officers with regard to the resources and current condition of the country. That object—which was the primary object in relation to the statistics—is completely voided and defeated by this delay. I am in favor of compensating for it as far as we are able; and this bungle about violating the contract of this man, whose very existence is a violation of his contract, will not deter me from giving such votes as I think proper. I now move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered—ayes 27, noes 84.

A MEMBER. What is the state of the question?

The SPEAKER. The proposition was made by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORA] to reconsider the vote by which the House has just ordered 100,000 copies of a census document to be printed. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARTTER,] moves to lay that motion on the table. Upon the latter motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was then taken, and there were—yeas 112, nays 57; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Charles Allen, Allison, Andrews, John Appleton, William Appleton, Ayer, Babcock, Bartlett, Bibbians, Bragg, Brenton, Briggs, Albert G. Brown, Buell, Burrows, Busby, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Thompson Campbell, Chandler, Chapman, Chastain, Clark, Cleveland, Cobb, Conger, Cullom, George T. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dimmick, Dockery, Duncan, Durkee, Fitch, Fowler, Freeman, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Giddings, Gilmore, Goodnow, Green, Grey, Grow, Harper, Hart, Hawes, Hascall, Haven, Hebard, Hendricks, Henn, Hibbard, Hillyer, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Hunter, Ives, Jenkins, Andrew Johnson, John Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kuhns, Kurtz, Lockhart, Martin, McNair, Meade, Miller, Miner, Molony, Henry D. Moore, Murray, Nabers, Newton, Andrew Parker, Samuel W. Parker, Peaslee, Penn, Porter, Price, Rantoul, Robinson, Ross, Russell, Savage, Schermerhorn, Seudder, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smith, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stevens, Stone, Stuart Benjamin Thompson, Thurston, Townshend, Walbridge, Ward, Washburn, Watkins, Welch, Wells, Wilcox, Williams, and Yates—112.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Barrere, Bell, Bocock, Brooks, Churchwell, Clingman, Colcock, Daniel, John G. Davis, Disney, Doty, Dunham, Edgerton, Ewing, Ficklin, Florence, Hamilton, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Houston, Howard, Thomas Y. How, Jackson, James Johnson, George W. Jones, Letcher, Mason, McLanahan, McMullin, Milson, John Moore, Murphy, Olds, Orr, Outlaw, Phelps, Peck, Richardson, Robbins, Sackett, Schoolcraft, Schoonmaker, David L. Seymour, Stanly, Alexander H. Stephens, St. Martin, Strother, Sweetser, Taylor, George W. Thompson, Venable, Wallace, Walsh, Addison White, Alexander White, and Woodward—57.

So the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

THE ELECTION OF THE DELEGATE FROM UTAH.

Mr. BRIGGS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be instructed to inquire into the election of John M. Bernhisel, the present Delegate from the Territory of Utah—whether said election was held according to law, and whether any bribery, corruption, or other illegal means were made use of by said Bernhisel, with Brigham Young, or any other persons, to secure the said election and return; with power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I shall not vote for that resolution, unless some member will rise in his place and say there are good grounds for such an investigation.

Mr. PHELPS. Is not the question upon the suspension of the rules in order to allow of the introduction of the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that it is a question of privilege.

Mr. BRIGGS. The resolution has been offered by me with the best of motives—for the purpose of investigating the legality of the election of the present Delegate from that Territory.

I have reason to believe—and I think this House must have come to the same conclusion, from evidence laid before them recently by the returned officers from that Territory—that the gentleman now occupying a seat here, as a Delegate from that Territory, holds it with no shadow of right by law; and that I might not prejudice the case, I have offered this simple resolution to have the subject referred to the Committee of Election, for investigation. I do not desire to prejudice the case by any remarks upon the resolution. I prefer to await patiently the action of the Committee of Election. I firmly believe that the gentleman has no more right to that seat than a subject of a foreign country.

Mr. KING, of New York. The Delegate from Utah is not in his seat at this time. It will be recollected by the Chair, and by the House, that when the communication from the returned officers was made to the House the other day, a committee of investigation was asked for by that Delegate. The reading of the communication at that time was refused by the House. I do not know of any facts—neither does my colleague [Mr. Briggs] state any particular facts—upon which to ground a suspicion against the right of that gentleman to a seat in this House. As that gentleman is not here, I suggest to my colleague that this matter lie over until he shall be in his seat.

Mr. BRIGGS. Inasmuch as the gentleman from Utah is not in his seat, I propose to permit the resolution to go over until to-morrow.

No objection being made, the resolution accordingly went over.

COLONIZATION SOCIETY MEETING.

Mr. DISNEY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution which I send to the Clerk's table.

It was read by the Clerk, as follows:

Resolved, That the use of the Hall be granted to the Colonization Society for its meeting on the 20th instant.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. DISNEY. I move a suspension of the rules for that purpose.

Mr. JONES called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will state that the last time they had the Hall all the curtains around the bars were torn down, and many of the windows were broken.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The question was then taken, and there were—yeas 94, nays 69; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Wm. Appleton, Barrere, Bell, Breckenridge, Briggs, Buell, Burrows, Busby, Thompson Campbell, Chandler, Chapman, Clark, Cleveland, Conger, George T. Davis, Dawson, Dimmick, Disney, Dockery, Doty, Duncan, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Fowler, Gaylord, Gentry, Gilmore, Goodenow, Green, Grow, Harper, Hart, Haws, Hascall, Haven, Hebard, Hendricks, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Ingersoll, Ives, John Johnson, J. Glancy Jones, Preston King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Lockhart, Edward C. Marshall, Martin, Mason, McLanahan, McNair, Miller, Miner, Molony, Henry D. Moore, Morehead, Morrison, Murray, Newton, Olds, Outlaw, Andrew Parker, Samuel W. Parker, Peaslee, Pennington, Porter, Rantoul, Richardson, Robbins, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Schoonmaker, Scudder, Origen S. Seymour, Stanley, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stevens, Sweetser, Taylor, Benjamin Thompson, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Walbridge, Walsh, Washburn, Welch, Wells, Williams, and Yates—94.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, Willis Allen, Allison, Andrews, Averett, Babcock, Bartlett, Bocoek, Bragg, Brenton, Albert G. Brown, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Carter, Chastain, Churchwell, Clingman, Cobb, Colecock, Cullom, Curtis, John G. Davis, Dean, Dunham, Edgerton, Ewing, Freeman, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Grey, Hall, Hamilton, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Henn, Hebard, Hillyer, Holladay, Howard, Thomas Y. How, Jackson, Jenkins, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, George W. Jones, McCorkle, McMullin, Meade, Millson, Murphy, Nabers, Orr, Penn, Phelps, Powell, Ross, Savage, Smith, Alexander H. Stephens, St. Martin, Stuart, Townshend, Venable, Wallace, Ward, Watkins, Alexander White, Wilcox, and Woodward—69.

So the rules were not suspended.

RIGHT OF STATES TO EXCLUDE NEGROES.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask the unanimous consent to offer a resolution; and if there be objection, I will move a suspension of the rules.

The resolution was then read for information, as follows:

Whereas some of the States of the Union have in their constitutions provided for the absolute exclusion of free negroes from their several territories, while others have sought to attain the same object by legislation: And whereas complaints have at times been made of these things by other States and Nations: Therefore,

Resolved, That in the opinion of the House of Representatives, it is the unquestionable right of each one of the States of the Union to exclude, either wholly or partially, from her territory negroes, whether free or slaves, and that the exercise of this right affords no just ground of complaint to any other Nation or State.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE objected.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then I move a suspension of the rules, and upon that motion demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken, and there were—yeas 69, nays 85, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, William Appleton, Thomas H. Bayly, Bibbians, Bocoek, Bragg, Breckenridge, Albert G. Brown, Busby, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Chastain, Clingman, Cobb, Colecock, Cullom, Curtis, Dimmick, Disney, Dockery, Ewing, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Gaylord, Gentry, Gilmore, Grey, Hall, Hamilton, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Hart, Henn, Hillyer, Holliday, Houston, Howard, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kurtz, Letcher, Lockhart, Mason, McCorkle, McMullin, McNair, Meade, Miller, Morehead, Murphy, Nabers, Orr, Outlaw, Penn, Phelps, Polk, Porter, Powell, Robinson, Savage, Smith, Stanley, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Strother, Stuart, Venable, Wallace, Walsh, Ward, Watkins, Addison White, Alexander White, Wilcox, and Woodward—69.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Willis Allen, Allison, John Appleton, Averett, Babcock, Barrere, Bartlett, Bell, Bissell, Brenton, Briggs, Buell, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Chandler, Chapman, Churchwell, Clark, Cleveland, Conger, George T. Davis, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Doty, Duncan, Dunham, Edgerton, Fowler, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Goodenow, Grow, Harper, Haws, Hascall, Haven, Hebard, Hillyer, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Ingersoll, Ives, James Johnson, John Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, Preston King, Kuhns, Martin, McLanahan, Miner, Henry D. Moore, Morrison, Murray, Newton, Andrew Parker, Peaslee, Pennington, Rantoul, Robbins, Ross, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Schoonmaker, Scudder, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Benjamin Stanton, Albin P. Stevens, Alexander H. Stephens, Sutherland, Sweetser, Taylor, Benjamin Thompson, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Townshend, Tuck, Walbridge, Washburn, Welch, Wells, and Wilham—85.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

Before the vote was announced,

Mr. HAMILTON said that he was requested to state that Mr. SMART was absent from the House in consequence of indisposition.

Mr. CLEVELAND also, when his name was called, said that he was opposed to agitation, and, therefore, voted no.

[A message was here received from the President of the United States, by the hand of MILLARD P. FILLMORE, his Private Secretary.]

CLAIMS ALLOWED BY THE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine, asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution, which was read for information, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of War, and the Postmaster General be, and hereby are, instructed to cause to be reported to this House, as soon as may be practicable, full and complete lists of all claims, if any, (including principal and interest, and designating each separately,) allowed and paid by the respective Departments, or any Bureau thereof, since the 4th day of March, A. D. 1849, which had been previously presented, suspended, or disallowed, in whole or in part; and specifying the character of such claims; and also, that they cause to be reported the names of all persons who at any time acted as the agents or solicitors for said claims, and the persons who received any portion thereof, or were interested therein.

A MEMBER objected.

Mr. FULLER. I move that the rules be suspended, in order to enable me to introduce the resolution; and upon that motion I ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. GOODENOW. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CARTTER demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered, and tellers upon the yeas and nays were also refused.

The question now being on the motion to adjourn,

Mr. ROBINSON demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. ROBINSON and CLINGMAN were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—yeas 87, nays 47.

So the motion prevailed, and

The House adjourned till twelve o'clock tomorrow.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. SMITH gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill to establish the following post roads in Alabama, to wit: From Tuscaloosa, via Hardy Clement's Cotton Factory, to Scottville, in Bibb county.

From Fayette Court-House, via Newtonville, to Reform, in Richens county.

From Fayette Court-House, via Big Pond and Mud Creek and Olinda, to Columbus, Mississippi.

Mr. DOTY gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill with the following title:

"A bill to establish a Bureau of Printing in the Department of the Interior; and providing for the execution of all printing required by Congress, and by the executive Departments."

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. DAWSON: The petition of David Tate, a private in the war of 1812, praying for a pension on account of injuries received.

Also, the petition of Peter Lane, praying for a grant of land for services rendered during the war with Great Britain.

CLERKS TO COMMITTEES.

On the motion of Mr. SEBASTIAN, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by him yesterday, in the following words:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be authorized to employ a clerk during the present session of Congress."

Mr. DAWSON. I move to amend by adding, "and the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office."

Mr. HALE. I move to amend the amendment by adding, "and the Committee on Engrossed Bills."

Mr. CASS. I would like to know whether these applications are made by order of the committees. I wish to know whether these committees deem the employment of these clerks necessary.

Mr. HALE. I will answer the honorable Senator so far as the Committee on Engrossed Bills is concerned. That committee has not considered this matter, because there has been no room assigned where they might meet for consultation.

Mr. CASS. That is enough.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question then recurred on the amendment.

Mr. DAWSON. If there is any committee besides the Committee on Finance and the Committee on Pensions which needs a clerk, it is the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office. There are numerous applications for extensions of patents made to that committee, which require a great deal of investigation, and a great deal of running to the Patent Office. Every member belonging to that committee would be relieved of a great deal of trouble by the appointment of a clerk. I think it due to that committee that it may be thus relieved, and I have therefore offered this amendment.

Mr. CASS. Did I understand the honorable Senator to say that the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office have applied for this clerk?

Mr. DAWSON. We have not made an order to that effect, but there was an informal agreement by the majority of the committee, that a clerk was necessary for the transaction of their business, if a clerk was necessary for any other committee.

Mr. RUSK. If it be at the request of the committee, and they say that they desire the service of a clerk, and need his services, I shall be willing to vote them a clerk very cheerfully. But this proposition might embarrass the original resolution to give a clerk to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DAWSON. I can appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Patents to say whether this clerk is not necessary.

Mr. JAMES. I can only answer as a member of that committee, that the duties brought before the committee are very arduous, and that it is highly necessary we should have a clerk at an early day.

Mr. CASS. If we are to hold the committees responsible for the employment of these clerks, we should require some formal action from the committees; we should have their approbation of the measure and hold them responsible for it.

Mr. BADGER. I suppose the only thing necessary is to be satisfied that the committee deems a clerk necessary, and desires to have a clerk. Whether that desire is manifested by individual members or by any particular member under the instruction of the committee, it seems to me that it makes no kind of difference in the practical result. These gentlemen say their committee needs a clerk, and that they desire a clerk; therefore I am for giving them one.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. So far as there is any necessity for the appointment of a clerk to the Committee on Indian Affairs, I have the authority of the committee. I was instructed by them to report this resolution. It was a subject considered by them. We have felt not only at this session but at the last session the necessity of a clerk. We forbore, however, at the last session to urge a motion of this kind, in consequence of what was understood to be a very general opposition, on the part of the Senate, to extend that kind of relief to the duties of the committees. Since then, however, the Senate is aware of a great accumulation of business upon the hands of that committee. Constituted, as it is, with some of its members disqualified, from ill health and other reasons, for attending upon the committee, I will say that it is totally impossible to discharge the duties incumbent upon the members of the committee as such, in addition to the ordinary legislative duties required of them in their capacity as members of this body.

There has been a vast accumulation of business upon the hands of this committee. I believe that something like fifty treaties negotiated by the Government are now before the committee for consideration. It must be borne in mind, also, that our relations and our policy in reference to the Indian tribes constitute probably the most variegated piece of patchwork, in defiance of our general regulations of the system, of all the legislation of this Government in reference to any subject whatever.

I have felt it necessary to make these explanations in view of what I saw was evidently a misapprehension on the part of some gentlemen here. The committee ask for this clerk, not as a personal exemption from duties, but as something which they deem absolutely indispensable to a proper discharge of those duties.

Mr. DAWSON. I do not feel at all inclined to embarrass the action of the Senate; and as the idea has been suggested to me, that the amendment which I have proposed might injure the direct application of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I will withdraw the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. BRIGHT. I have no idea that any objection I can make will influence the Senate to vote down this proposition; nevertheless this consideration shall not deter me from an effort to correct that which I regard as an abuse; for every proposition that adds a clerk to the committees of the Senate, I regard as an abuse, and it cannot have my vote. Heretofore the Committee on Finance have had a clerk, and I am willing to admit there was a propriety in this, during the actual sessions of Congress, for the labors of this committee are of a kind, that a competent man can make himself useful as clerk. But there are reasons, operating in favor of the employment of a clerk by this committee, that do not exist with any other of the body. I need not waste time on this point. Senators all know to what I refer.

A few days since we ordered clerks for the committees on Naval Affairs and Commerce, now we are asked to order clerks for the Indian and Committee on Patents, and if the order is made (as I presume it will be, judging from the past, and in view of the great facility with which we act affirmatively on all such matters,) we will be asked to grant clerks to every standing committee of this body. Why the Committee on Naval Affairs should ask a clerk, is a matter of astonishment to me. What duty will the clerk of that committee perform. Will he make up a brief in each case presented for the decision of the committee, and decide the merits of the case? If so, we will have only the opinion of the clerk, and not the majority opinion of the committee, founded on an actual examination of the case. While, as a general rule, I might be willing to act upon the opinion of a Senator, expressed after a full examination of the report presented by him, I would not be thus willing to adopt and act upon the opinion of a clerk of whom I know nothing, and who has no legislative responsibility. I was for several years a member of the Naval Committee, and therefore I have singled out and remarked upon what I considered the claims of this committee, and have no hesitation in saying, that while I had the honor of a place on that committee, I should have opposed the employment of a clerk, on the ground he would have been a useless piece of furniture, so far as the proper legitimate business of the committee was concerned. It would be a source of convenience to every Senator to have the services of a competent gentleman, about his general business affairs, transacting business at Departments, and keeping up his correspondence; and I do not say there would be anything wrong in thus employing an employee of the committee; but if this abuse (for as such, I can only characterize it) is to exist, and grow into a practice, let it be general—give all the committees of the body clerks, and then we will all be upon an equal footing. If this resolution be adopted, as a matter of course we will expect to order a clerk for each standing committee.

Mr. BADGER. I do not know how my honorable friend from Indiana undertakes so confidently to determine upon what is and what is not required by all the committees of this body. I think it would be much better for us to rely upon the determinations of the committees themselves; to allow them to speak for their own committees, and to confine ourselves, as a former Senator from Missouri [Mr. Benton] used to say, to our own bailiwicks.

The Senator from Indiana has referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and supposes that that committee cannot have any need of a clerk. This is but an instance to show the hazard which any gentleman undertakes, in pronouncing an opinion upon the condition of other committees than his own. Sir, we have very great need of a clerk. In the condition of affairs before the Naval Committee at this time, we have need of an active and intelligent clerk. We have need of him to facilitate our transactions in the business which the Senate has committed to us. We have need of him, to enable us to carry on the necessary intercourse between us and the Department, and the various bureaus of the Department; for the purpose of collecting the information which is required to facilitate those inquiries which the Senate has demanded of us to make, and how we are to report our own judgment. We do not want a clerk to communicate his judgment to us. We want him there to get together such materials as we may require, in order to enable us to form our own judgments. The honorable Senator says that the Committee on Naval Affairs has nothing for a clerk to do; and he supposes this to be the case with regard to every committee of the Senate, except the Committee on Finance. He says that it is, nevertheless, very convenient to have a clerk, in order that he may attend to the private business of members of the committee. Do I understand the Senator to mean by that, that clerks are asked for by committees here when they have no use for them, with regard to the discharge of their Senatorial duties; but that they are actually practising an imposition upon this body, by asking for officers to be employed at the public expense, to attend to the private business of members? I am sure that the honorable Senator should not make such an imputation as this, unless he could produce some evidence to sustain it. It impeaches the honor—the personal honor, the official honor—it impeaches the respectability of honorable gentlemen as members of this body, if there be any individual upon any committee who is supposed to be influenced by any such low, groveling, personal purpose, in asking for a clerk.

With regard to myself I can say that when I wished a clerk to be appointed by the naval committee I had no personal business of my own for him to do. My own business I do myself. Whether well or ill done, it is done by myself, and without the assistance of others. I feel very well satisfied that no gentleman associated with me upon the Committee on Naval Affairs wishes a clerk for any such indirect personal object. But how does it happen that the honorable Senator admits that the Committee on Finance have need of a clerk? Why has the Committee on Finance need of a clerk? Is it on account of the peculiar nature of the business which that committee has to do? Or is it on account of the amount of business which that committee is called upon to perform? I presume that other committees of this body need a clerk as well as the Committee on Finance. There is nothing in the name of that committee which makes a distinction and shows it should have such assistance, and that other committees should not have it. I have no doubt that the Committee on Finance eminently needs a clerk. The Senate has been in the habit of furnishing a clerk to that committee, and I have always been glad to see it done. But when honorable members upon this floor announce to me that, in their judgment, the convenient dispatch of the public business committed to them requires that they should be furnished with a clerk, I shall always feel it to be my duty to presume that they are actuated by public considerations, and are not asking to obtain any private advantage.

Now, with regard to this committee, after what has been said by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, [Mr. SEBASTIAN,] it seems to me that it would be difficult for us to furnish a satisfactory reason why we should refuse to this committee what we have granted to other committees. We have granted a clerk to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, at the head of which is my honorable friend from Texas, [Mr. Rusk.] Every one well knows why it is necessary that that committee should have a clerk. My friend from Texas said on a former occasion that that committee did need a clerk: I am satisfied that he said so because he believed it, and that nothing would have induced him to say it if he had not believed it. So it is with regard to the Committee on Military Affairs, of whose business I have had some experience; and I have known the business of that committee to suffer for want of such assistance.

With regard to the expenditure involved in this, permit me to say that it is a little of "penny wisdom and pound folly," while we are ready to pour out the public money at the bung, to be so carefully engaged in stopping a little spigot-hole out of which but a small portion of the public treasure oozes; and especially when it is expended for the purpose of enabling committees more satisfactorily to themselves, and more beneficially to the country, to discharge the duties imposed upon them.

The honorable Senator from Indiana thinks that members of committees ought to take this labor upon themselves; and he says he is willing to do it. I believe he is. He is a young man; a man in vigorous health, and is fond of labor. He is pleased with a kind of investigation, which to me is absolutely repulsive. Let him go on then, and devote those powers which he possesses to the service of the Senate, in the honorable and efficient manner that he now does; but do not let him deny to those of us who have not the same capacity, and that kind of business facility which our age, or indisposition, or any other cause may render necessary, to enable us to come at a practical and beneficial result of our operations.

Mr. HUNTER. I move to postpone the further consideration of this subject until to-morrow, in order that we may get at the special order of the day, which is the bounty land bill.

Mr. BRIGHT. This is rather an unimportant matter; but since the remarks of the honorable Senator from North Carolina, I must be indulged with a short reply. I employed no such language in my previous remarks as that Senator attributes to me, nor did anything which I said justify the construction which that honorable Senator sought in his remarks to put upon mine. I said not a word which could, by implication even, be regarded as reflecting upon the honor or integrity of any Senator, and I venture the assertion that the honorable Senator from North Carolina stands alone in this misconception of that which I did say. I said in general terms that I believe clerks to committees of this body useless appendages, as far as the legitimate business of this body was concerned, and their employment an abuse of our privileges here; and this I again repeat, not by way of censure to others who may take a different view of this subject, but by way of expressing my decided condemnation of thus summarily fastening on to the Treasury a new batch of pensioners; for mark, sir, every one of the individuals provided to be employed under this and similar resolutions, will be continued over at the end of this to the opening of the next Congress, and so on from year to year, adding another and another to the long list of abuses that are daily creeping into every department of this Capitol. And again mark, at the end of this session, about the last day or night thereof, you will have a resolution offered by some kindly-disposed Senator, giving, in addition to the $1,500 per annum now paid clerks, a gratification of $250 more; and this will not only be done at the long, but unless a new practice obtains, these very clerks, that are now employed only for present use, will be continued over to the short session, and the same salary be given for three months work, and the $250 extra pay again added. I am speaking of the probable future, having my eye on the past; and I have on this point only said what I feel quite sure will be realized, unless a great change takes place in our mode of legislation.

The honorable Senator from North Carolina feels at liberty to read me a lecture on account of my notice of the Naval Committee. I spoke in the most respectful terms of that important committee, and remarked that when I was a member of it, as I had been for two or three sessions past, the chairman and members of it had experienced no inconvenience for the want of a clerk, and that I was not aware of any greater necessity for a clerk now than then. And now, notwithstanding the opinions of the honorable Senator from North Carolina, expressed in a very authoritative manner, I beg leave again to say, that I do not believe the Naval Committee can find employment for a clerk; and I will go further and add, that there is not a committee of this body, unless it be the Committee on Finance, that can profitably employ one, so far as the interests of the public are concerned. Whether while I was a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs I contributed in the least degree to lighten the labors of the honorable Senator from North Carolina, who was never known to shrink from any responsibility or the performance of any duties, is a matter of very little consequence at this time. The question now is, whether the public interest will be promoted by this loose system of creating a new set of useless officers. I think not, and have plainly given some of my reasons, without intending to offend in the slightest degree any Senator. Knowing, however, what I do, as to the manner such propositions as this are generally disposed of here, I cannot say that I have the least idea it will be defeated, and consider all I have or might say in opposition to the resolution as labor lost. I am content to affix my mark of opposition upon it, and let it go.

Mr. BADGER. I wish to remind the honorable Senator from Indiana of two things with regard to the Naval Committee, which seem to have escaped his recollection. In the first place, while he was a member of that committee, he was a member of one or two other committees, furnishing so much occupation for his time that it was very seldom that we could get on that committee the assistance which his labors and his counsel would have afforded. Hence, with my friend from New Jersey, [Mr. MILLER,] at that time a member of the committee; and the then Senator from Florida, [Mr. YULEE,] who was at the head of the committee, we had thrown upon us an amount of labor and responsibility under which we were borne and pressed down, and in which the honorable Senator from Indiana shared very little, and of the oppressive character of which he knew nothing. That is the first fact.

Then I wonder that the honorable Senator has not thought of the other fact; and that is, we now have the State of California in the Union, and it would require a clerk to attend to the business of that State, while the members of the committee were able to attend to the rest of the United States.

Mr. HALE. I did not intend to mingle in this debate, but as the honorable Senator from North Carolina says he has been oppressed, and as I feel myself bound to advocate the cause of the oppressed, I want to say a word or two. It strikes me that we are making mistakes in the discussion of this matter. That is, we are going too much into detail. We are not taking a national view of the thing. I want to suggest a national view of this matter. We are not only doing what we are doing for to-day, but we are making precedents, and they will stick and be followed hereafter. I wish now to suggest a possible state of things which may exist hereafter. It may be that in the coming years that are before us, there will be an administration of the General Government in power, and a majority of the Senate in opposition. Well, then, we that are in opposition will have some friends; our friends will come here and want places. We cannot give them places unless we make some neat little places in the committees, where we shall not have a President to interfere to nominate. We want places where we can confirm without a nomination. I think, in view of what may possibly occur hereafter, an arrangement of this sort will be very convenient. Although I have but very few friends, they are enough to be troublesome, especially to a man who has no sort of influence with the Administration; and it is exceedingly convenient, when all these places are filled by our enemies, to say, at least, there is a little clerkship in our committee which the Senate, for their own purposes, hold in their own hands. In that way we would be doing a great public good—granting relief to those who are oppressed by that labor under which the honorable Senator from North Carolina has suffered until the marks of premature age are creeping upon him. I say, that while the Senate would be doing a great public good, they would be relieving themselves from this oppressive labor by the establishing of a precedent which we are this day setting. I trust that the honorable Senator from Indiana will take a national view of the thing, and look into the coming future. As the eulogist of General Jackson once said, I hope the Senator will listen to the footsteps of coming generations, and legislate for all time, so that when it does happen, as I have no doubt it some time will happen, when the majority will be in opposition to the Administration, we shall have some little patronage of our own about which we need not consult the President.

This is what I consider taking a national view of the thing. I consider this as rising above such little picayune things as the writing of reports, and as going to establish the character and policy of the Government. In this view, it seems to me if the Senate had listened and attended to this, I am certain they would not have refused to give the Committee on Engrossed Bills a clerk. I have been frequently called out when my friend from North Carolina was making a speech, to examine an engrossed bill, and to certify to its correctness. This requires deliberation.

I shall vote for the motion of the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] to postpone this resolution until to-morrow, for I think that a thing of this sort should not be done in a hurry. I hope that this resolution may be postponed to a day certain, so that we may give it that due deliberation which it deserves.

Mr. HUNTER. As the time has arrived for the consideration of the special order, I withdraw the motion I made a while ago, and move that the subject be laid upon the table.

Mr. BADGER and others. Let us vote on the resolution.

Mr. HUNTER. As it is suggested that the resolution may now be voted upon, I withdraw that motion.

The resolution was then adopted.

FOREIGN INTERVENTION.

Mr. CASS. I desire to lay upon the table, with the view of having it printed, a resolution which I intend to offer as a substitute for the resolution offered by the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. CLARKE,] yesterday. I was not present when the Senator offered his resolution, and I merely wish now that the paper I offer may be printed, and to give notice that when the resolution comes up, I will move this as a substitute.

The substitute proposed is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That while the people of the United States sympathize with all nations who are striving to establish free governments, yet they recognize the great principle of the law of nations which assures to each of them the right to manage its own internal affairs in its own way, and to establish, alter, or abolish its government at pleasure, without the interference of any other Power; and they have not seen, nor could they again see, without deep concern, the violation of this principle of national independence.

The PRESIDENT. This can only be received informally.

Mr. CASS. I merely wish that this resolution may be printed, so that when the resolution of the honorable Senator from Rhode Island comes up I may be able to offer this as a substitute.

The resolution was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEWARD submitted the following informally, that it might be printed. It is an amendment which he will offer to the joint resolutions offered by Mr. CLARKE:

Strike out all after the second resolution, and insert the following as a substitute:

Resolved, That while the United States, in consideration of the exigencies of society, habitually recognize governments de facto in other States, yet that they are nevertheless by no means indifferent when such a government is established against the consent of any people by usurpation or by armed intervention of foreign states or nations.

Resolved, That considering that the people of Hungary, in the exercise of the rights secured to them by the laws of nations in a solemn and legitimate manner, asserted their national independence and established a government by their own voluntary act, and successfully maintained it against all opposition by parties lawfully interested in the question, and that the Emperor of Russia, without just or lawful right, invaded Hungary, and by fraud and armed force subverted the national independence and political constitution thus established, and thereby reduced that country to the condition of a province, ruled by a foreign absolute power: The United States, in defence of their own interests and of the common interests of mankind, do solemnly protest against the conduct of Russia on that occasion, as a wanton and tyrannical infraction of the laws of nations. And the United States do further declare, that they will not hereafter be indifferent to similar acts of national injustice, oppression, and usurpation, whenever or wherever they may occur.

ASSIGNABILITY OF LAND WARRANTS.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being a bill to authorize the transfer of land warrants issued under the act of September 28, 1850, granting bounty land to the officers and privates of the American army since 1790.

The PRESIDENT. The joint resolution was considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and was amended. It was then reported to the Senate, and the question now is on an amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. WALKER.]

Mr. WALKER. After the yeas and nays were ordered on this proposition yesterday, there were some observations made by the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. BORLAND,] and others by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FELCH,] to which I wish to offer a few words in reply. The objection of the Senator from Arkansas is to the proposition on account of its connection with the main subject under consideration; and he seemed to intimate that if my amendment were offered as an independent proposition, he would vote for it. His objection to it appeared to be its connection with this joint resolution.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to interrupt him for the purpose of making a single remark? and perhaps I can thereby save him the necessity of making the observation he was about to make in reply.

Mr. WALKER. I give way to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BORLAND. I desire to correct, to some extent, a short remark which I made yesterday. Upon looking over the report of my remarks in the paper this morning, as well as adverting to my recollection of what I said at the time, I find that I took a position which I would not be able fully to stand upon. That, however, arises from the fact that I misconceived, to some extent, the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin. The subject of preemption was under consideration when he made his proposition; and the impression made upon my mind was, that his proposition referred to preemption rights, and not to an absolute donation of land to actual settlers, without any compensation being given by them to the Government. I desire to say now, that I would not be willing to go for such a proposition. My understanding of it was, that it included only preemption rights, and to that extent I would be willing to go. I make this observation with the view of correcting my remark yesterday, and by way of explaining what I intended.

Mr. WALKER. The correction of the Senator from Arkansas will not change the course of observation which I was going to make, for the objection which he yesterday made to my amendment was one which is almost universally made to any amendment proposed in the Senate that embraces in itself the principal subject. That objection is, that the amendment is not offered in the proper place. That as a separate proposition it might or might not be supported. Now I think the amendment which I proposed yesterday is perfectly relevant to the subject under consideration. The subject in reality in its substance and intention, embraces a method of getting rid of the public lands. It cannot be contended that it is anything more or anything less. It is true that on its face it professes to be a proposition legalizing the assignment of land warrants; but we all know perfectly well that the operation of these assignments will be to open a new method of acquiring public lands by individuals, and a new method by which the General Government shall dispose of them. Now what I propose is an addition to this method of disposing of the public lands, so that we may give a free grant of a hundred and sixty acres of land to every person who will demonstrate in good faith his intention of becoming a resident upon the land, by dwelling upon it and cultivating it for five years. This is the proposition.

The objection of the Senator from Michigan, who is chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, was of a similar character to the objection urged by the Senator from Arkansas, but with this additional objection, that the proposition was sprung upon the Senate suddenly, and that it did not give the Senate proper time to deliberate upon it and to frame the necessary machinery by which to carry out the object. Now I regret that the Senator from Michigan has made this objection, for, during the last Congress, I had before the Senate a bill for the purpose of relieving the General Government of all the burdens of the land system; to vest these lands in the governments of the several States in which they may lie, and then going on to provide the machinery by which these provisions in favor of actual settlers should be carried out; and after long and mature deliberation and much debate, a majority of the Senate voted against it. The same principle was offered as an amendment to other bills, and it was still voted down. At this session I have again renewed the bill. It has been before the Committee on Public Lands since the commencement of the session. I have not heard from it since.

I do not wish to be understood as censuring the committee if they have not reported. It is an important committee, and has great and important duties to discharge, and it discharges them faithfully. But still I am not censurable for any delay in regard to this matter, for I have been industrious in bringing this proposition in all its details before the Senate. While that bill, introduced at the last session of Congress, and again introduced at this session, and at both sessions referred to the Committee on Public Lands, embraces my own peculiar views—if gentlemen see proper to consider them peculiar—yet I think I ought not to be amenable to the language used by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. Downs,] that I objected to every other proposition because it was not my thunder. Now, this proposition is in character with that which I have been urging upon the attention of the Senate. I am not tenacious with regard to who may avail himself of the proprietorship of the thunder, so that I can accomplish the end I desire. I am not very particular whether the proposition which I first suggested be carried out or not; I would prefer it, but I do not adhere very tenaciously to it in the proposition which I now offer. I would relieve myself, if I had the power, from the duty of urging these views upon the Senate; for I am aware that I urge them upon unwilling ears. But let any one live in a new State, and have the experience and opportunity to make the observations that I have, and he would not wonder that I wish to see this system of granting the public lands adopted by the Government so far as it applies to actual settlers.

Why, sir, take the State in which I live, which is not yet four years old as a State, and which as a Territory does not exceed fifteen years, and yet for the earth upon which our log-cabins are built, where our hearth-stones are erected, and where our homes are placed, in that new country, laboring under all the embarrassments which we have had to contend against, we have paid into the Treasury of the United States upwards of seven millions of dollars; and that, too, from a State in which we have no public works constituting a great source of revenue to us, where it has been a constant struggle to get our public roads where we best can, to establish schools, and build mills and bridges, and establish the other conveniences of society. While all this has been the case, and every improvement has been a drain upon the energies of the settlers, we have had a continual drain from us of everything—every substantial footing on which we could rest. This was not the case with the old States. They were the proprietors of their own lands; and if they charged anything for the lands upon which the settlers located, the money received went into the treasury of their own State, and was disbursed among their own people. But we have made improvements which render the lands of the State valuable, and yet when sold the money is not disbursed from our State treasury, but it goes into the Treasury of the United States; and when we ask for a little to be returned to protect life or property, or even enough to facilitate the construction of railroads or to improve the Fox or Wisconsin rivers, there seems to be the most astonishing opposition on the part of Senators to any such grant. And yet no State has paid so large an amount in the same time into the Post Office Department, and no State in the Union has paid so large an amount into the Treasury from the sale of public lands, and no State has been so little embarrassing to the Treasury of the United States.

I am honest in the belief that we have already aid for our homes as much as we should pay, and I believe that it would be the best policy for the Government to allow the new settler to have his home, that he may contribute more in what he pays for articles imported into the country and thus increase the revenue from that source. I believe it to be the best policy, and I do not urge it for the purpose of clap-trap, or as an item of thunder for myself. I am honest and sincere, and I shall continue to urge it so long as I believe it will be the best policy both for the States and for the Government. Then I do hope I may not be looked upon with a prejudiced eye when I urge this doctrine of giving the public lands to actual settlers. I am not peculiar in this. Some of the greatest minds in the country have believed it. As far back as the time of General Jackson he recommended it in four successive messages; Mr. Webster has also introduced a proposition of this nature here; and the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. Douglas,] and also the honorable Senator from Texas, [Mr. Houston,] have introduced similar propositions; and it seems to me it is about time that the country should begin to look at the matter in its true light, in place of setting itself, through its representatives, against those who may urge its claims upon the Senate.

I do not wish to detain the Senate, but I look upon it as bidding a final farewell to the present land system with the prospect of the most melancholy results. Sir, here are most of the States manifesting a belief that we should no longer seek a revenue from that quarter, but that these lands should be ceded for purposes of internal improvement. But what is the course pursued now? You are making large grants for purposes of internal improvements, and when you throw into circulation this immense amount of paper currency in the shape of land warrants which you propose to do by this bill, what is likely to be the real value of the lands you grant for the building of railroads? Why, sir, these grants will be in a measure valueless; they will become, as nothing. You will derive no benefit by those grants, even when they are made for the purpose of aiding the States in the construction of railroads. But it may be said that this is a matter of no consequence to the old States and those in which no public lands lie. I deny it; I do not think so. I regard it as a matter of the highest importance to all the States, whether old or new. I say that so long as the old States command the passes to the Atlantic ocean they are most deeply interested in all that affects the facilities of transportation of the various products of the Western country and of the Mississippi valley; and they are acting on a very short-sighted policy when they withhold these grants, or do anything which could lead to the frustration of the beneficial results to be derived from them. Sir, I believe that, whatever may be the determination of the Senate eventually, it is bad policy to pass this measure at the present time. I think that, if it is to be passed, we had better wait till the end of the session—until we can see what the States are likely to make of their several improvements, or what price they are likely to obtain for the lands through which these improvements are to be located; and not be making grants of land and then taking them back again because they will afford no revenue to the projectors of these improvements, owing to the immense number of land warrants thus thrown into the market. I believe that it would be much better to postpone the bill for the present, even if it should ultimately be passed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. This is a very important amendment, and I ask that it may be read.

The amendment was read, as published in the Congressional Globe, page 303.

Mr. WALKER. Before anything further is said, I wish to state, that the proviso which is attached to that amendment, is one which is brought in, in view of opinions of other Senators, and not of my own. If I had brought in a proposition, embodying my own views only, the restriction in the proviso to the amendment would not have been inserted.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not rise for the purpose of entering into any argument with my friend from Wisconsin upon the propriety of his amendment. If we were to discuss the propriety of granting lands to those who have declared their intentions of becoming citizens of the United States, and thereby invite the foreign population of all the world to our shores, I think there would be matter enough in that subject to occupy perhaps a month; we might say a great deal for and against such a proposition. Now, it seems to me it is too large a subject to be introduced here as an amendment, to encumber this bill which I had the honor of introducing, and I hope the bill may not be encumbered by it. The bill which I had the honor of originating simply designs to perfect a system in reference to grants of land to those who fought the battles of our country, and my friend's amendment proposes to introduce an unbounded grant of lands to those who have performed no civil service, much less military service, for the country. His amendment looks to the improvement of the land by the clearing of the forests and cultivating the soil, as an inducement upon which the grant is to be made. The policy which we have settled by past legislation, and that policy which my bill proposes to perfect, is to show a favor, to show a kindness, to make a gratuity in behalf of those who have rendered the country some military service, and thereby to encourage the whole country, whenever there shall be a war prevailing, whenever there is any necessity for military service, to run to the standard of the country. My little bill is to perfect that system which has been already adopted, while the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin, is to cover the whole country with unbounded grants, not for civil or military service rendered to the country, but merely to improve the land.

I have already stated that it is a large theme to be connected with this bill, and if we attempt to do it, we shall be here for weeks, discussing this question. I hope those who have this little bill at heart, and who think we have perfected it by the amendments adopted yesterday, will not allow any other amendment to be attached to it, but just vote for the bill, and pass it as it is. If we can do this, we shall get clear of this proposition which has been pending for weeks, and can then go to the consideration of something else; and in the course of the session, I suppose my friend will have it in his power to go lengthily into the propriety of giving the grants which he proposes. I will not discuss this subject further, because I know that my example may operate as an inducement to others to do the same, and thereby there will be a consumption of the time of the Senate. I have ventured to make these few remarks in the hope that we might be allowed to have a vote taken upon the bill as it was perfected yesterday, without further discussion.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I wish to say that I concur in the remarks just made by the Senator from Kentucky. The measure now before the Senate is one of justice to persons already provided for. I made a pretty early struggle when that bill was up, to get rid of the clause which prevented the grantees from enjoying that property which we were to give, and which violates a principle which is usually conceded to persons holding property, to wit: the right of disposing of it in their own way. I foresaw the great inconvenience which they would labor under; I foresaw that it would be impossible for them to go into the enjoyment of the benefit which Congress was disposed to grant to them, provided it was trammelled in the way which the bill indicated. I believe that Congress has come at last to see that it is but just that these warrants should be made assignable, because it is very evident that those who live at a distance from these lands do not intend to go and occupy them, and cannot avail themselves of the benefit of the grant, unless the warrants are made assignable. It seems to me right that they should be made so. And now, I entreat the honorable Senator from Wisconsin not to interfere with a measure which is large enough to stand upon its own merits, and is comprehensive enough to command the attention of this body, and require a great deal of discussion before it can be matured. I entreat him not to embarrass this bill by the measure which he proposes. I hope he will withdraw his proposition, and that we may be allowed to pass the bill, so that the old soldier may have the benefit of the act.

I will say further, that I am rather inclined to favor the settlers when a suitable measure can be adopted, whenever it can be prudently and wisely done. I am not unwilling to extend benefits to that class of our fellow-citizens; but at the same time, I shall be obliged to vote against it if it is proposed as an amendment here.

Whatever my sentiments and opinions may be in regard to the merits of the proposition contained in the amendment, he will compel me, if it is offered here, to vote against it. I hope, therefore, he will see that he places us in a false position, and withdraw his amendment.

Mr. WALKER. I would if it were in my power; that is, if I could do so without violating my duty to those whom I represent, I would accede to the request made by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. But I am not at liberty to do it; I feel myself under the fullest obligations to urge this subject upon every suitable occasion. But if we take the argument submitted by the Senator from Kentucky, and that submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts, and compare them with each other, I think we shall see that they are a most singular and astonishing fallacy. The honorable Senator from Kentucky says that this proposition, of which he claims to be the father, is one to give a mere gratuity to those who have fought the battles of the country. Why, sir, that gratuity was given in the bill which this proposes to explain; and that gratuity, it turns out, was a gratuity which the old soldiers do not want. It provides for a class of people who have fought the battles of their country, and now it turns out that they do not want the grant; and then the Senator from Kentucky makes a great merit of it, that when he has given what they do not want, he provides a way by which those who wish to speculate in the land can obtain it at one half or one third of its real value. That is the argument. A gratuity is given, and when it turns out that it is a failure, the actual settler must be injured in order that the speculator may be benefited. And there is so much merit in that, in the estimation of the Senator from Massachusetts, that it must be held up before the Senate as a preëminent matter of consideration, and we must exclude all other classes of mankind, and all other classes of grants of land, and suffer nothing to be interposed between it and the consideration of the object which he has in view. I believe there is more merit in the amendment than in the proposition before the Senate. There are vast numbers who would like to have a piece of land on which to settle; and if there be those of the old soldiers who will not go to occupy these lands which are granted to them, it is no good reason why those who desire to have a home should not have one; it is no reason because they will not go and avail themselves of the home which is offered to them, that nobody else shall go. It is said that the old soldier does not need the land himself. But what does he want? The Senator from Kentucky proposes to give him, after he refuses to take the land, what will be worth to him perhaps fifty dollars. You then give him the privilege of selling his warrant for fifty dollars, by which the holder of the warrant will get land worth, at the Government price, $200, and the Government will be wronged out of $150. The speculator will be indefinitely benefited by imposing upon the holders of warrants in this way.

Now it was urged here yesterday that the assignment of land warrants would operate beneficially to the actual settler, and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Downs,] asked "if the settler is to buy his land and pay for it, and can buy it with a warrant for which he has paid only a hundred dollars, will not that be reducing the price of land to actual settlers?" It would indeed, if it could be done so; but whatever may be the case in other States, this practice has not obtained in Wisconsin. Land warrants are chiefly purchased at the agency offices in New York, and Philadelphia, and Buffalo, and in Washington and other places. These warrants, when thus purchased, are sent in large numbers to Milwaukee and other places in Wisconsin, and are located. Now if the settler whose preëmption is about to expire, goes to the agent to purchase a warrant for the purpose of securing his title to his land by payment with the warrant, the chances are a hundred to one if the agent will sell him one. The agent will reply, "I have no warrants for sale. What do you want with a warrant?" And the applicant will reply, "I desire to save my preëmption." "Well," says the agent, "I'll tell you what I'll do: I'll locate your land and improvements in my own name, or in the name of the company who own the warrants, and I will give you an instrument, providing that you shall have your farm clear in two years, provided you can then pay me two hundred dollars for the warrant, with twelve per cent. interest." Well, in very many instances the two years pass over, and the settlers are without the ability to pay according to their bargain; and thus the man who has located the warrant allegedly for the benefit of the settler, gets not only his land, but the benefit of all the labor which he has bestowed upon it for years. That is the operation which the production of these land warrants has produced in the Western country; and it is not a fact, that in that region they furnish any facility for the location of lands. It is rarely that they do otherwise than result in injury when they get amongst us. It is true, that sometimes a solitary individual from the West, when in New York, may purchase a land warrant for a little less than the Government price of the land, and may, when he reaches home, go and locate it; but these cases are by no means common. If, therefore, you seek to make this bill a facility for the location of lands, you will fail, and the result will be that the settler will not only lose his location, but his improvements also. I think, then, that there are reasons why Western men should make the most strenuous opposition to the assignability of these warrants. A gratuity to the soldier is not the thing that is wanted. The design, indeed, may be good, but the result is not so. You give him an assignable warrant which he sells for half or one third of its value, and which finds its way into the hands of speculators. These speculators locate the warrants, and, as I have shown, by flattering prospects held out, frequently possess themselves of improvements which are the result of years of labor. The whole system, in all its operations, is prejudicial to the interests of those who are professedly most to be benefited; and as the representative of one of the Western States, it is a plan which I cannot support.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. When I was up before, I did not intend to utter an expression which could elicit debate. I merely remarked that this amendment was to perfect the system which Government had pursued toward these old soldiers. I did not intend to be driven into a discussion. Time is valuable, and I think voting is better than discussion. If I were to consume time in debate, I think I could demonstrate, beyond the possibility of a doubt, that the policy of my friend from Wisconsin, in refusing to make these warrants assignable, helps the speculator, and enables him to double and treble his profits, and make the whole out of the pockets of the old soldiers. Those who now purchase these warrants, make the fact that they are not assignable a pretext for a reduction of the price to be paid for them. I could demonstrate that the system which the gentleman advocates, while it ruins the old soldier does not benefit the country, and operates in favor of the speculator. He is the speculator's friend on this floor, giving him a profit daily and hourly. But I have said I will not be driven into a discussion on this subject. I merely wish to say that I disclaim much that the gentleman has imputed to me.

Mr. DAWSON. I wish to say a few words in reply to my friend from Wisconsin. What is his proposition? Here we have a bill proposing to give one hundred and sixty, or eighty, or forty acres of land, as the case may be, to the old soldiers for their toil, trouble, and dangers in the service of the country; and by the amendment proposed, we say to every foreigner in all the world, "You may just step over into the United States and settle on one hundred and sixty acres, and you will have all the rights and privileges with the old soldiers who have fought the battles of the country."

Mr. WALKER. I knew that would be the argument of the Senator from Georgia, if he spoke at all; for it is the fourth or fifth time he has introduced it when he has spoken on this subject. But I wish to reply to the honorable Senator from Kentucky, and say to him that I am not the speculator's friend either in the operation of my amendment or in intention.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not say it is his intention to befriend the speculator, but his arguments lead to it.

Mr. WALKER. I will ask the Senator from Kentucky if he knows of an office in any city for the purchase of these new land warrants? I know there are agencies in every city in the country for the purchase of the warrants given to the soldiers in the Mexican war; but the gentleman cannot find an agency for the purchase of this new batch of land warrants; there is too much risk in it. They cannot become a circulating medium at present.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will allow me, I will give him facts, as he inquires for them.

Mr. WALKER. I yield the floor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In my section of country, I know a young man to have been employed to go out and locate these warrants. He makes his contracts in this manner: "You give me so much for my trouble in visiting the States where the public lands are to be found, and locating your warrants"—making a handsome profit upon that—"and then I will pay you so much, if you will convey your claim to me when the patent is obtained." That is the way in which the bargain is made, and the sum which is received by the original holder of the warrant is not half of what he will get if you will make the warrants assignable at once.

Mr. WALKER. That is the case given by the Senator from Kentucky of a young man who contracted to locate these land warrants, and with the prospect of securing a title to the land. That is very indefinite. I do not know what he is to get, neither what he is to receive for his compensation, nor what he is to pay for the land. But I will make this assertion, that if you make these land warrants assignable, without affixing to them a given cash value, they will come down to a price which will be merely nominal. Sir, I know of agencies established, not to purchase these warrants, but to locate them in the best places for the benefit of the large holders. There is an agent in the city in which I live who will agree to locate a hundred and sixty acres for ten, and eighty or forty acres for five dollars, and who will guaranty its quality. And, sir, if any land is worth $1 25 an acre to the General Government, that land is worth that much to the proprietor when the warrant is located. I am quite aware that in many instances land warrants have brought their full value; but if you make all this new batch assignable, there will be so much competition that the price will come down to a mere fraction of what it ought to be, as was the case with the Mexican lands. If the soldiers, in whose favor these land warrants were issued, would employ men who would honestly discharge the duty of locating the warrants, they would obtain the full value of them, and we should hear nothing more of the clamor about this gratuity of the Government to the soldiers having gone into the hands of others than those for whose benefit it was exclusively designed. I know an instance in this city of a man who had two warrants which he offered for $210, and the man to whom they were offered refused to take them at the price; but he located them for the individual, and since that time he has sold this land—the whole of the three hundred and twenty acres—for $4 an acre, thus realizing $1,280 for what, a short time before, he had offered for $210. Now, that is an instance that I know of, and yet it is urged by those who are interested in speculating in these warrants, that they cannot be made available to the holders at this time. That is an argument which has been urged out of doors, and Senators are made to believe that there is no way of benefiting the soldier but by making the warrants assignable. It is, however, a false argument—one which is made to bear upon those who control the newspaper press, and is echoed here by Senators who do not, I admit, intend to reflect the interests of men engaged in these speculations, but who do it completely in effect. That is, however, the effect; and I repeat that it is an argument which is unsound and false, to say that the warrants cannot be made to benefit the holder to the full extent, if they would take the proper means to avail themselves of such benefit. I will venture to say, that if the holders of the warrants will locate them for themselves, or will employ proper persons to do it for them, the lands will be worth double the price which they will get for them if they are made assignable. My opposition, then, to the assignability of land warrants is friendly to the holders.

It is not because I am inimical to the interest of the old soldier that I oppose this bill; but I believe that, when the warrants are made assignable, his interests will be sacrificed sooner and with more certainly than by any other system. But you may say that is his own business: he is a freeman, and can do as he pleases with his own property. I know there is some force in the objection that we give lands and then tie it up in the hands of the holders of the warrants. But that you should have considered in the first place, and not have taken a course to throw away the benefit which you propose to bestow. Now, when it turns out, according to this outside argument which we hear, that the soldier does not want the land, it is taken for granted that the only other manner in which you can benefit him, is to make the warrants assignable. It is not so; and the holders of the warrants will see that it is not so, if they will take into consideration their true interest, and they will locate their warrants themselves when they understand that the assignment of them will be of very small pecuniary benefit to them.

Mr. DAWSON. I have been somewhat surprised at the observation of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. WALKER,] as to his having heard the argument that I made, used before by me. I recollect that when the subject of the distribution of the public lands was before us heretofore, the Senator erected a platform, and presented himself upon it in such a manner that no one could fail to have his attention drawn to it. Since that time it has been understood that his mode and manner of disposing of the public lands formed a sort of platform for some purpose or other, which I cannot say now. If I were so unkind or ungenerous as to retort upon him, I might say, how often have I heard the same argument from him, not only in the Senate, but in other places, which he has used on this occasion? But I have nothing to say against his doing that. It is the principle advocated which I oppose, and the manner which he assumes to himself to control the action of this body, and express his views, somewhat indignantly, against the views of all others.

He says that these public lands ought to go—to whom? To the people. What people? I agree with him that they should go to the people of the United States; that they should be the property of the country upon certain terms; and whenever we make donations to them it should be according to the bill of my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] giving them to the old soldier. But when, Mr. President, I see propositions made to favor people who are not now within the limits of our country; who never paid a dollar of tax into the Treasury; who never shouldered a gun in defence of the country, and to place them on a footing with the citizens and soldiers of our country, it looks a little strange to me at least. Because I draw a distinction between men who served the country in every capacity, and men who never served it at all, it is presented here as a strange and extraordinary argument. Shall I say to the Senator from Wisconsin that his course of policy is just of a character to cause the whole country to be settled by a foreign population? His plan is to make a gratuity to every man who will come from any section of the world, and settle on the public lands. At whose expense is this to be done? Who paid for the extinguishment of the title of the aborigines of the country to the soil upon which you reside? The whole people of the United States paid for it in and through taxation. And who gave you the power of taxing? The men who fought the battles of your country and sustained your Government. Yet they are to be disregarded, and cannot get any of these advantages upon the same terms as those who may have fought against us. Because I expressed an opinion of that kind, the Senator says he expected to hear it again. Why hear it again? Because it is founded in truth, in justice, in principle, and in patriotism. It is not advanced as a mere scheme to gain public applause, or to throw myself upon an elevated platform by which to gain the applause of parts of the community. The plan of my legislation is to act upon principles of equality and justice; to do justice to every section and to every man belonging to the country, according to his service. And because I express my opposition to giving the public lands, which my constituents assisted to pay for, to men who never paid a dollar into the Treasury, it is looked upon as something exceedingly strange. If ours was a Government not subject to the principle of the elective franchise, if it was governed differently, it might be done.

From our local positions, and from other circumstances, we are led to adopt certain views, and become attached to them. I do not blame the Senator from Wisconsin for holding his views. But the lands in Alabama and Mississippi have been disposed of, and the proceeds have gone into the Treasury; and now because there are lands in other sections of the country, the people who go there are not to be subjected to the same proceeding, and are not to pay the same money into the Treasury as others did. There is a want of justice, of equity, and equality, in that. There is no principle about it at all. Why should we pass a law here to seduce our people to leave the old States and settle in the limits of other States? At whose expense will you be doing this? The States of Georgia and Kentucky are called upon to vote for a measure which will induce their population to go off and settle elsewhere, because by it property in other States will be given to them. Is it wise and politic—is it to be expected that the old States will give their support to a measure which will lead their population to leave them, and thereby diminish their own strength? The Senator from Wisconsin will in a moment see the impropriety of it. How is this to be done? Not by the money of the General Government merely, for it is the money of the people. And if the money of the people, which is now in the Treasury, or which has gone into the public lands under your control, is to be divided, to whom should it go? To the people who paid and fought for the land, and not to those who never gave a dollar or an hour of service to the Government. The principle advocated by the Senator from Wisconsin would give the lands to those who never advanced a dollar to the country; while mine is to give them to men who fought our battles and paid taxes into the Treasury.

I was not desirous of going into this matter. Whenever the time will come to rally for the rights of the citizens of this country, native and adopted, against this plan of giving land away, or any other analogous to it, you will find that the people will rally for them. It is right that they should do so; and because I referred to it, I am held up here as repeating an argument. No better argument can be made. When I suggested the condensed argument, it was because a mere repetition of it supplies the whole argument, and there was no necessity of going into an extension of it. Every man comprehends it. I would not have made a reply to the Senator, but for what I consider an unkind and unnecessary remark, that he expected the argument from the Senator from Georgia, for he had heard it from him the fourth or fifth time. I have seen my friend more than four or five times standing upon the platform which he erected two years ago; and when he stood up so high, because I paid my respects to him, he ought to have felt grateful, instead of being excited, at what I said. These are my views.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. President—

Mr. CLEMENS. I rise to a point of order. I believe the Senator from Wisconsin has spoken on this subject more times than the rules allow, and I have the preference for the floor.

Mr. WALKER. I will give way with great cheerfulness.

Mr. CLEMENS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

The PRESIDENT. The motion cannot be received while this question is under consideration.

Mr. CLEMENS. As I think it important that we should proceed to the consideration of Executive business, I move to postpone this subject until we have more time to hear speeches upon it.

At the suggestion of Senators, the motion was withdrawn.

Mr. WALKER. I hope no one will suppose that I am going into an extended argument—

The PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama make his point of order?

Mr. CLEMENS. I do not make any motion, as there seems to be a desire to vote upon the question. But I want to get into Executive session. I will not press my point of order.

Mr. WALKER. I will detain the Senate only while I make a single observation, in reply to the Senator from Georgia. When I said that I expected to hear the argument from the Senator, if he said anything, I spoke entirely of his reference to the foreign population who might be embraced in this bill. It was the Native American tendency of the argument to which I intended to make a reply. I said that I expected, if I heard anything from him upon that branch of the amendment, that it would be just what he had said. Upon a previous occasion I offered a proposition in the Senate, to the bill authorizing the issue of land warrants, which amendment proposed to give to those who had declared their intention to become citizens, the rights and benefits resulting from it; and then the Senator objected to this feature of my proposition. He objects to it again. But now, will not the Senator allow me to pay him a compliment? It was that very argument that he thus made, objecting to that feature in my amendment, and a similar argument made by the Senator from Kentucky, that induced me to make the change which is made in the proposition which I have brought before the Senate—to require citizenship before an entry should be permitted. I intended to compliment the views of the Senators from Georgia and Kentucky, by the change which I have made in the proposition since I offered it upon a previous occasion. The Senator will perceive that naturalization must be perfected before the entry is permitted, according to the amendment.

I have no disposition to keep off this vote. I know that the joint resolution will be adopted, but I still wish to discharge my duty. It is what every Senator desires to do when he knows that his constituents feel anxious that he should make head against it if possible, and when he feels a reciprocal interest and anxiety to discharge faithfully his duty and meet the wishes of his constituents. I hope I have done nothing more. I do not wish to force my peculiar views upon the Senate. I wish not to tire the patience of any. I wish not to be offensive. If you wish to pass the measure, pass it. I can see the evil consequences which will result from it. My constituents see them, and they wish me to resist the measure to the last. They wish me to resist this last measure of oppression to them in their young settlements. I do believe it will result in that. Take your vote and pass it; and if the consequences to the Western States which I have prophesied and pointed out do result, and if hereafter Western members see that I did point them out, let them thank themselves and bear in mind that I warned them upon the present occasion.

The question being taken on the amendment to the amendment by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 8, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Dodge of Wisconsin, Douglas, Gwin, Seward, Sumner, Wade, Walker, and Whitcomb—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bayard, Bell, Brien, Burland, Bradbury, Bright, Brodhead, Clarke, Clemens, Davis, Dawson, Dodge of Iowa, Felch, Foot, Geyer, Hamlin, Houston, Hunter, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, King, McLaure, Mallory, Mangum, Miller, Norris, Rusk, Sebastian, Smith, Spruance, Stockton, Underwood, and Upham—35.

So it was rejected.

Mr. WALKER. I have another amendment, which I shall offer as a proviso to the first section of the amendment, as follows:

Provided, That not more than two land warrants of the denomination of one hundred and sixty acres each, or the equivalent thereof in warrants of a less denomination, shall be located by or in the name of the same individual upon any of the public lands.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. WALKER. I will have completed my duty when I shall have offered the following as a proviso to the first section of the amendment:

Provided, That no land warrant shall be located within six miles of any proposed railroad line or route, unless such location be intended for purposes of actual settlement, to be ascertained by the oath of the party proposing to make the location.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. GEYER. I have an amendment which I wish to offer to the first section of the amendment. It is to insert after the words "are hereby declared to be assignable," the words "by deed or instrument of writing made and executed after the taking effect of this act." I will explain in a few words the object of it. It is to prevent past assignments, that are prohibited by law, from being set up in any form. There are many instances in which assignments have been made by individuals holding these warrants, and of course they have been subject to large deductions on account of the risk. The design of this amendment is twofold:

to afford an opportunity to those individuals to reexamine the subject before they make a new assignment, before they transfer their warrants; and also to prevent parties setting up a prohibited assignment.

The PRESIDENT. The first section as proposed to be amended will read—

"That all warrants for military bounty lands which have been, or may hereafter be, issued under any law of the United States, and all valid locations of the same which have been or may hereafter be made, are hereby declared to be assignable by deed or instrument of writing made and executed after the taking effect of this act, according to such form," &c.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Perhaps it is due to the committee to say that, in their deliberations on this subject, nothing occurred which would sanction the idea that we intended to ratify past assignments and contracts in reference to these warrants, made in violation of the law. I suppose that the object of my friend from Missouri is to prevent any such inference from being drawn, and to make it positive that those contracts which were illegally made before, can only be legalized by an instrument of writing made after the taking effect of this law. I have no objection to that; I suppose no member of the committee will object to it. It was not the intention either of any member of the committee or myself to ratify any such illegal warrants.

Mr. DOWNS. I have no objection to the object of the amendment. I think it a very good one; but I have some doubts whether perhaps a different construction might not be put upon it. Could it not be more simply expressed? I suppose the Senator means by his amendment transfers made in the ordinary way. But the public officers might understand it differently. Some States may give a different interpretation to the words "deed or act."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The word "act" is not used. It is "instrument of writing."

Mr. GEYER. The words which follow in the bill explain it. The deed or instrument of writing is to be made "according to such form, and pursuant to such regulations, as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That shows it. The amendment to the amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I have an amendment which I wish to offer to the amendment. It is to insert in the 4th section, after the words "of any State," the words "or Territory," so that the section may read: "That in all cases where the militia or volunteers or State troops of any State or Territory were called into military service, and whose services have been paid for by the United States," &c., I presume there will be no objection to it.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GWIN. I have an amendment to propose as an additional section:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That every actual settler, being an American citizen or having filed a declaration of intention to become such, whether the warrantee or assignee of a military bounty land warrant, shall be allowed to locate the same upon any public land inhabited and improved by such settler (provided the same be not mineral land) not exceeding in quantity one hundred and sixty acres, whether such land be subject to private entry or not, upon making proof to the satisfaction of the register and receiver, of actual inhabitation and cultivation of the tract or tracts thus sought to be entered: Provided, That such locations shall not be permitted upon any land the price of which exceeds $1 25 per acre, unless the difference in cash be first paid.

Mr. GWIN. I will briefly give the reasons why I think this additional section should be incorporated in the bill. There are a great many persons in the State which I represent entitled to bounty land warrants who could not claim a preemption on the lands upon which they are living, because they have left their farms in the States from which they emigrated. These parties cannot use these warrants. They are now settlers there on the public lands. They cannot claim the privileges of preemption because the law limits and excludes certain persons, and they are of that class. But they are the parties to whom these warrants are to be issued. All I wish is, that they may be permitted to locate them on the lands upon which they have settled. There is another important matter which seems to have been overlooked in this bill, and it is this: In extending the location of these bounty land warrants the mineral lands of California have not been excluded. They should be excluded from location in express terms in this bill. There should be a clause in it by which none of its provisions should be extended to the mineral lands of California. At present there is no guard of that kind in the bill, and is an additional reason why my amendment should be adopted.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I really think that there is no necessity for the amendment of my friend from California. The original bill nor the prior legislation upon the subject does not open any portion of the lands in California to these land warrants. The public lands in California have not yet been opened by any legislation of Congress so far as I know.

Mr. GWIN. Oh, yes! There is a Surveyor General for California, and the lands are being surveyed, and are open to preemption claims.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That may be; but the public lands in California have not yet been brought into market by proclamation of the President of the United States. No sales have yet been made. Steps have been taken, I know, to have the public lands in California surveyed, but none of these warrants can be located on lands unless they are subject to entry by private individuals; and they cannot be subject to entry by private individuals until they have been offered for sale in the market, under the proclamation of the President of the United States. That is the operation of the law as it now stands. So far as relates to the use of these land warrants in securing the home of the settler, we made provision for that by an amendment which we adopted when the bill was up yesterday. It does, therefore, seem to me, that the amendment of my friend from California cannot have a beneficial, but must have an injurious effect. I hope it will not be adopted. It is merely providing for that which is already provided for. If the Senator intends to enlarge the use of land warrants for settlers, so as to allow the settlers who have them to enter on the public lands, and locate them before the lands have been offered at public sale under proclamation of the President of the United States, I think it would be a bad policy to adopt any such provision. I hope, therefore, that on reflection, my friend from California will see the propriety of not pressing his amendment.

Mr. GWIN. In reply to what the Senator from Kentucky has stated, I will say that these lands are now being surveyed, and unless we legislate on this subject during this session of Congress, before the next they may be offered for sale, or open to entries under the preemption laws; and therefore the very same process that exists in other States in regard to the public lands will be in operation there. Whenever the public lands in California are surveyed, a settler can claim a preemption right in that State, under existing laws; and if a settler on the public lands, there or elsewhere, has served in the war, and is entitled to a bounty land warrant, I propose that he shall have the privilege of locating his warrant on the land upon which he lives, whether he is or is not entitled to a preemption. That is the whole point of the case.

There is, however, another provision in my amendment which I think a very important one, and that is, that none of the mineral lands in California shall be subjected to the provisions of this law. I consider that as of the very highest importance. The public lands in that State are being surveyed, and I have no doubt will be speedily offered at public sale, because the wants of that country require that they should be soon disposed of. Hence I think that this is of very great importance, for before we can pass another law upon this subject, these lands may be brought into market. All that I wish is, that every individual who has a bounty land warrant in his own right, now living on and cultivating the public lands in California, or any other State, when those lands shall be surveyed and brought into market, shall have the privilege of locating his warrant, instead of going to somebody else to sell it. Many of the citizens of California, emigrating from other States, have left a quantity of land undisposed of, that excludes them from the advantages of the preemption laws, and these individuals will be forced to sell their warrants, although they are now living on the public lands. I wish that every person in California, to whom a warrant is issued, shall have the privilege of locating it on the land on which he resides.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would say to my friend from California, that he proposes the introduction on the spur of the occasion, of a very important matter, which has not been deliberated upon by the Committee on Public Lands; and it strikes me that it will lead to consequences which we are not perhaps prepared to meet. I am not certain that there is any law granting preemption rights in California.

Mr. GWIN. The general land laws have been extended there.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The chairman of the Committee on Public Lands [Mr. FELCH] is much more familiar with this subject than I am; for, for the last two years I have not been a member of that committee, and I would defer to his superior information on this subject. I do not know that there is any law in force in reference to the public lands in California which grants preemption rights there, or states how much land the settler can have. I recollect very well that provisions have been made in regard to the public lands in the Territory of Oregon, but I have no recollection now of any specific legislation which embraces the public lands in California; and I doubt whether the public laws in reference to the preemption rights in force in the rest of the United States before the acquisition of that territory will apply, unless they have been expressly extended there. These matters are sprung upon me just upon the spur of the occasion, without having any opportunity of examining the statutes, without any opportunity of ascertaining whether my ideas upon the subject are right or wrong. I am not prepared to adopt any amendment of this kind in such a hurry, without its having gone through an investigation by the Committee on Public Lands. I would like to hear from the chairman of that committee on this subject.

Mr. GWIN. At the last session of Congress a clause was inserted in one of the appropriation bills extending the land laws to California, providing for the appointment of a surveyor general, and making appropriations for the purpose of surveying the public lands in that State. The Committee on Public Lands had reported a land bill for California, which was elaborately prepared, and debated in the Senate; but owing to the discussion which arose upon the river and harbor bill it was not acted on. In order that the State which I represent should have the benefit of the land laws, and for the purpose of commencing the surveys of the public lands, an amendment was made to an appropriation bill of the character I have described. Under it a surveyor general has been appointed, and is now actively engaged in the performance of his duty. The Secretary of the Interior has estimated for a large amount to be appropriated for the survey of the public lands in California—an appropriation of some three hundred thousand dollars. The preemption law, as well as the general land laws, has been extended to California, as well as to other States where the lands are surveyed and brought into market, as the lands in California will very soon be. But here is the point in this case: There are persons in that State who, technically, are not entitled to the benefits of this general preemption law, because they have emigrated without having disposed of the lands they lived on. They are entitled to bounty land warrants as soldiers in the Mexican war, but cannot locate their warrants on the lands upon which they now reside. I simply wish that they shall have the privilege, if they are actual settlers and cultivators, of locating their own warrants to include their present homes and improvements—provided those locations shall not be made on mineral lands. That is the whole case.

Mr. FELCH. It is perfectly manifest that this provision cannot be adopted and carried out without breaking in upon the whole system of the Government with regard to the public lands. The lands in California are not yet in the market; and although an appropriation was made for a surveyor to commence the surveys there, yet the system, as a system, is not to be extended in its practical operation to that portion of the country. The provision of law, under which the Surveyor General of California was appointed, makes an appropriation for the surveys in the ordinary manner, and under the general law of the United States; but there is not one acre of land in California which can be purchased by anybody for money or in any way. There can be no purchasers of land there, and no entries of land, by land warrants or anything else, unless there be established land offices. There is neither land office nor land district in that portion of the country.

Further provision of this kind, therefore, at the present time, is entirely inapplicable to the state of the case. It does not appear, as yet, what may be done in regard to the lands in that country. What we have hitherto done is this: We have provided for settling claims of all Spanish and Mexican settlers, who claim by virtue of grants from Spanish or Mexican governments. We have done nothing more. There was a bill before the Senate, to which the Senator from California has referred, extending the general system of the land laws to California, and granting certain preemption rights and donation rights; but the bill did not become a law. We have, therefore, scarcely started upon the system of disposing of the public lands in that country. All we have done is to send a surveyor there, who may or may not have commenced the surveys. I am not informed upon that point.

Mr. GWIN. He has commenced the surveys.

Mr. FELCH. If this provision should be adopted, it will be impossible, under the bill, to commence proceedings in favor of any one man having a warrant there. He cannot locate it there, as there is no land office where he can locate it. There is no authority to allow him to locate. That is the state of the case at the present time.

Preemption rights cannot, of course, apply to California, because the preemption right applies only to cases where the lands have been surveyed and are ready to be brought into market. Formerly those rights did not attach until the land was offered for sale. A more liberal law now prevails; and after the surveys are made with a view to sale, within the land districts where purchases can be made, there preemption rights may accrue. But settlers who have gone on the public lands in California, even if they have land warrants, are precisely in the same condition as men who have money in their pockets. Neither of them can take up lands there. They stand precisely on the same footing.

Unless we are disposed to go beyond the principles which have heretofore been adopted, it does not seem to me that this provision could be of any practical effect, even if incorporated into the bill. Certainly it does not seem to me to be wise, at the present time, to adopt it.

Mr. GWIN. From the statement which has just been made by the Senator from Michigan, it is perfectly evident that this bill is to have no bearing at all in California. That State is to be entirely excluded from its operations. I am astonished that when we are legislating upon so important a question as this, that there is no provision in this bill applicable to such a vast amount of lands as there is contained in the State of California. We all know that registers and receivers will very soon be appointed for that country; and then the general law of preemption will certainly be in operation. All I wish is, that the land laws may be extended, in every particular, to the people of California as they are to other sections of the Union. If we adopt this amendment now, it will not be necessary to legislate upon this subject again when the California land bill comes up for consideration. I am opposed to the passage of this or another law that will have to be altered hereafter, and adapted to laws to be enacted for California; for I know the difficulty of getting any special legislation for that State. I wish this to be a general law, and when we do adopt a land system for California, and carry it out by the appointment of proper officers, the citizens of that State will have the same rights as the citizens of other States under the same land laws. It is evident that in a short time we shall extend the land system into California, and appoint registers and receivers. Then why not have a provision in this law giving to the citizens of that State the same rights which citizens of other States are to have?

Mr. FELCH. It is not California alone to which the principle applies which the Senator states. It applies to Oregon, where we have sold no lands; it applies to New Mexico; it applies to Utah; it applies to most of the new States; it applies to a portion of my own State; it applies to all the unsurveyed lands. It has never been the policy of the Government to induce persons to come and settle on the land before it is ready to be brought into the market under any circumstances. We throw into the market every year a much larger amount of the public lands than is demanded for the ordinary sales of the year.

As I remarked before, formerly we restricted preemption rights to a very small portion of territory. Now, we have extended them; and a person may go to any portion of the public lands where surveys have been made and acquire a preemption right. This proposition is to allow persons not only to go on the lands after the surveys are made, and the boundaries are understood, and the monuments affixed, and the locations are defined, so that a man can know on what land he is; but it is proposed to allow people to settle on the lands and acquire preemption rights before anything is done to make the landmarks, before anything is done to fix the locations. There is great liberality in the law which now prevails in reference to the granting of preemption rights; and I heartily concur in the principle which has been adopted. But it seems to me that we could scarcely carry it further without doing it great injustice, and at the same time making great confusion in the administration of the public domain.

Mr. GWIN. We know perfectly well that in all of the new States settlements are made on the public lands before they are surveyed; and when the lands are surveyed, the settlers have the rights and privileges of preemptors. The public lands are now being surveyed in California. We have asked for a large appropriation for their survey. Surveys in that country are made with great rapidity if ample means are placed at the disposal of the Surveyor General. It is expected that in twelve months there will be a large quantity of our public lands open to the preemption laws.

With regard to Oregon, it is true the preemption laws have not been extended there—but why? Because you give the lands away there. You give them donation privileges, and they do not want preemption rights. In regard to New Mexico and Utah, I know that the preemption laws have not been extended there. No Surveyor General has been appointed for these Territories. They need legislation, and they need it badly. But it is my duty to endeavor to bring into active operation in California the provisions of the preemption laws, and to give every person entitled to a bounty land warrant, and an actual settler and cultivator of the public domain other than mineral lands, the right of locating his warrant on his own home. This is the only object I have in view.

Mr. SHIELDS. I would suggest to the Senator from California, that when the land system shall be extended to his State, this law will apply to that State. I am for the general principle of our preemption law. I understand the matter perfectly; and I say that the gentleman, by his amendment, will accomplish nothing whatever.

Mr. GWIN. The amendment will accomplish this: it will permit an individual living on the public lands in California, after the lands shall have been surveyed and opened to preemption, to locate his own warrant on the land on which he resides and cultivates. That is certainly a new principle, and a very important one. Citizens of every State in the Union, who served in the war with Mexico, have emigrated to California, and I want to give them the privilege of locating their own warrants to include their new homes, whenever the public lands shall come into market.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected. The amendment made in Committee of the Whole as amended, was agreed to.

THE PRESIDENT. The question now is: Shall the amendment be engrossed, and the bill be read a third time?

Mr. WALKER. On that question I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken resulted—yeas 35, nays 3; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bell, Berrien, Borland, Bradbury, Brodhead, Clarke, Davis, Dawson, Dodge of Wisconsin, Douglas, Downs, Fish, Foot, Geyer, Hale, Hamlin, Hunter, James, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, McKee, Mallory, Mangum, Miller, Norris, Pearce, Sebastian, Seward, Shields, Soule, Spruance, Stockton, Sumner, and Underwood—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Gwin, Wade, and Walker—3.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

On motion, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 20, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. Mr. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ASSIGNABILITY OF LAND WARRANTS.

THE SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of the joint resolution No. 1, heretofore reported from the select committee, to which the same was referred, with an amendment explanatory of the act of 1850 granting to certain officers and soldiers bounty land, &c.; the pending question being on the motion submitted by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DUNHAM], to commit the said joint resolution and pending amendments to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and on which question the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FITCH] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. I should like the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union this morning, and take up the Mexican indemnity bill, if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FITCH] would yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. FITCH. I am not particular as to the time of resuming the consideration of this joint resolution, but my object is, that whenever it does come up—and upon which I have the floor—to make my objections to it known. If occupying the morning hour in the consideration of that report will interfere with the business of the Committee of Ways and Means, I have no objection, so far as I am concerned, to give way to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON].

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to state to the House, though I do not know it, other than from rumors, aside from the fact that the House possesses the knowledge, that there is a strong necessity for acting upon this bill at an early period. I understand there is a communication upon the Speaker's table from the President of the United States, urging that we shall act upon it speedily. I will, therefore, move that the communication be first read, and then I will propose to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

AFFAIRS OF UTAH.

THE SPEAKER (there being no objection) proceeded to lay before the House a communication from the President of the United States, in regard to the affairs of Utah.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That is not the message referred to.

Mr. HOUSTON. Never mind. Let it be read, and I will move that it be laid upon the table and printed.

The communication was accordingly read, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit a copy of a letter which has been addressed to me by the Secretary of the Territory of Utah since my recent message to the House of Representatives, in answer to its resolution requesting information in regard to the affairs of that Territory. MILLARD FILLMORE.

WASHINGTON, 16th January, 1852.

To the President of the United States:

Sir: Among the official papers relating to affairs in the Territory of Utah, as published in "The Daily Globe" of the 10th instant, is a letter from Governor Brigham Young to the President of the United States, dated September 29th, 1851. In this letter the following paragraph occurs, to wit:

"Mr. Harris informed me, in a conversation which I had with him, that he had private instructions, designed for 'no eye but his own,' to watch every movement, and not pay out any funds, unless the same should be strictly legal, according to his own judgment."

I beg leave to say, that the statement contained in this paragraph, to the effect that I said to Governor Young that I "had private instructions, designed for no eye but my own, to watch every movement," &c., has no foundation in truth, and is so very improbable in itself as to excite astonishment that Governor Young should have made it. I had but one conversation with Governor Young, within my recollection, in which official instructions were mentioned at all, and that conversation was in substance as follows:

Governor Young was striving to induce me, by argument and persuasion, to disburse the public money then in my possession, in payment of the mileage and per diem, and the contingent expenses of the last Legislature of the provisional government of the State of Deseret. I informed him that I could not comply with his wishes. "But," said he, "suppose the Territorial Legislature, about to assemble, should so appropriate the money, and direct you to pay it; you would of course comply?" I replied "that I could not; that I had instructions from the Treasury Department to guide me as disbursing agent, and that I would not be permitted to plead an act of the Legislature in excuse for the illegal disbursement of the money in my hands."

I had no other conversation with Governor Young which could possibly have suggested to his mind the idea of making such a charge against me.

There are other misstatements in the letters of Governor Young and Mr. Bernhisel equally gross and untrue; but as they do not relate to me alone, I do not deem it proper to refer to them more particularly in this communication.

I have the honor to be, with the highest regard, your most obedient servant,
B. D. HARRIS.

Secretary of Utah Territory.

WASHINGTON, January 12th, 1852.

On motion by Mr. HOUSTON, the communication was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

MEXICAN INDEMNITY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the President of the United States, covering a letter from the contractors for paying the installment of Mexican indemnity due on the 31st of May next.

On motion by Mr. HOUSTON, the communication was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The first business before the committee is the annual message of the President of the United States.

Mr. HOUSTON, (interrupting.) But I think that under the rules of the House governing the committee, I have the right to move to take up any appropriation bill, or any bill for the purpose of executing a treaty.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the rule.

MEXICAN INDEMNITY BILL.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move, therefore, to take up the bill to provide for carrying into execution, in further part, the twelfth article of the treaty with Mexico, concluded at Guadalupe Hidalgo.

The bill is as follows, viz:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $3,180,000 be, and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of the installment and interest which fall due on the 30th of May, 1852, under the twelfth article of the treaty between the United States and Mexico, made and concluded at Guadalupe Hidalgo, on the 2d of February, 1848.

Mr. McMULLIN. It is, perhaps, unfortunate for me that I am entitled to the floor, particularly as I have not given this subject that consideration which its importance demands; and I shall not occupy the time of the House but a very few moments. I have already effected the object with which I originally set out—that of calling the attention of the House and of the country to this particular case. At the last Congress this subject, or rather a bill providing for the payment of the Mexican indemnity, was before the House. It was my misfortune then to differ with several gentlemen, and with my honorable colleague, [Mr. BAYLY,] who was then the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and with whom it is at all times painful to me to differ. I am sure I need not say one word to my colleague with a view to reconcile him to the course which I have taken in reference to this matter. That gentleman knows full well that there are but few men, if any, upon this floor, whose capacity and efficiency as a legislator I appreciate more highly than his. But I thought then, as I think now, that there was something wrong in relation to the payment of this Mexican indemnity. I understand, sir, that this subject will be discussed at some length, and my object is simply to call the attention of the House to the fact, that in the payment of the last Mexican indemnity, there was a loss to this Government of some sixty or eighty or one hundred thousand dollars, because of the manner in which that payment was made; in other words, if the payment had been differently made—made by agents who proposed to make it, other than Corcoran & Riggs, and those British bankers, there would have been a saving to the American Government of some sixty or eighty thousand dollars. Now, it is not my purpose to reflect upon the Committee of Ways and Means of the Thirty-first Congress, nor is it my purpose to cast any reflections whatever upon the Committee of Ways and Means of this Congress. But I wish to say, sir, that it is a subject worthy of the consideration of the Committee of Ways and Means, and of their investigation, to see whether or not a saving could be made to this Government in the manner of payment of this indemnity.

But, Mr. Chairman, I hold also, that if it is practicable to negotiate this payment, so as to save the sum, which I presume can be saved to the Government, and at the same time accommodate Mexico, it is the bounden duty of this Government to do it. My understanding was, during the last Congress, that the Mexican Government desired the payment to be made to them otherwise than through this channel by which it was proposed to be made. I presume, if you look into the facts of the case, you will find that the Mexican Minister, then in the city of Washington, protested against the payment of the indemnity in the manner proposed. I shall not stop, sir, to inquire into the amount which was made heretofore by these British bankers and Corcoran & Riggs. That is a matter with which I have nothing to do; but there is one point of view in which I desire to examine this subject. It was contended by the Committee of Ways and Means of the last Congress, and by you, sir, as one of that committee, and also by my honorable colleague, [Mr. BAYLY,] then chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and perhaps by others, that Congress had no right thus to negotiate the payment, without another treaty. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not profess to be versed in constitutional law, nor do I profess to be versed in laws growing out of treaty obligations and stipulations. But I do profess to know a little something about ordinary and common-place transactions. Sir, will you tell me, or will my honorable colleague, or any other member upon this floor, tell me, and stake his reputation upon that issue, that if the Mexican Government, through her duly-constituted agent in the city of Washington, indicates her purpose to receive the payment of the indemnity, or the amount due to her, from the legally-constituted agent of the American Government, and that a payment thus made at the instance of the Mexican Government, through the agency and instrumentality of the Mexican Minister, would not be valid in law? I know that such an opinion is entertained. Now, with due regard to the opinion of my colleague, [Mr. BAYLY,] and others, who differ with me upon this subject, I undertake to say that if you submit this question to the American people, as a practical, plain, common-sense people—and this being a common-sense view of this question—they would decide that if the payment had been thus made, there would have been the end of it. In reference to the assaults made upon my colleague [Mr. BAYLY] through the newspapers, I have nothing to do.

I now desire, Mr. Chairman, to address myself more particularly to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. HOUSTON.] I desire that gentleman and his committee to investigate this point in the case. Has the American Congress the authority, by the sanction of the Mexican Government, and her legal agent and representative here, the right to direct how this payment shall be made? In the investigation of this subject we are met by my honorable colleague [Mr. BAYLY] and others with this view of the case: If you undertake to direct the payment of this indemnity otherwise than as provided for by the treaty stipulations, you will throw a responsibility upon an irresponsible source. In other words, it was contended, as it is contended now, that the Executive Department of this Government, as the treaty-making power, must see to the payment of this money. Now, I ask the gentleman at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means, if the Mexican Government shall agree to receive this indemnity by means of any other agent or agents than Corcoran & Riggs, and those British bankers, by which the Mexican Government shall save one or two hundred thousand dollars, and the American Government some sixty or eighty thousand dollars, whether it is not competent, without calling for another treaty, thus to provide for the payment of the money? To my mind it is competent for the Government to pay off that indemnity in the manner suggested, without any other treaty.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will give the gentleman my opinion. I have no question of the power of Congress, if they shall see proper, to instruct as to the mode and manner of making this payment. I have no question but Congress has the power to direct the President in the manner the payment shall be made, if they shall see fit so to act. The position I took was, that unless some gentleman will say that the President of the United States, or the authority making the payment, has done so improperly, corruptly, or fraudulently, we have nothing to do with the manner of payment. We ought to do our duty by passing the appropriation, and leave to the Executive the responsibility which, under the law, rests upon him, in executing fairly the laws passed by Congress. I have no doubt about the power of Congress. Charges are talked about without there being anything brought forward, anything tangible. If the gentleman will say that the President or Secretary of State are guilty of fraud or corruption, then it is not only in the power of Congress, but the duty of Congress, to control their action.

Mr. McMULLIN. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has conceded a little more than I expected he would have done, but still he desires that some gentleman shall come forward and do—what? Charge that there is corruption or impropriety on the part of the Executive Department of the Government. Can the chairman of Ways and Means tell me that that is the duty of every member of this House, unless they are satisfied that corruption really exists? No, sir; but any member of this House has the right to ask that payment of the indemnity shall be made differently than that proposed by the Executive, if it shall go to the saving to the Government of the United States of a large amount of money, without charging corruption.

Mr. HOUSTON. With the permission of the gentleman from Virginia, I will say this much further in illustration of the position I have taken—that if the President of the United States, in the execution of the law which we may pass for appropriation, shall fail to protect the Government of the United States and all its interests in making that payment, or if he shall put it into the power, by the manner in which the indemnity is paid, of the bankers of this country, of England, or of France, or anywhere else, to impose upon Mexico, then I say he has not acted properly in the discharge of his duty. That is what I mean. If the case is presented, that the President of the United States could have saved by a different mode of payment, or that he could now save any amount of money to the Treasury which he otherwise would let go into the hands of private individuals or companies, or has made his arrangements understandingly so as to enable Mexico to be fleeced by American citizens or others, then the President of the United States has not discharged his duty.

Mr. McMULLIN. Well, Mr. Chairman, such have been the charges preferred against the President of the United States outside of this House through the papers, and also against the Cabinet, who are concerned in this matter. It demands investigation.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. I will ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] to state by whom these charges have been made here to justify the action of this House.

Mr. McMULLIN. I did not state that they had been made upon the floor of the House of Representatives, but I stated they have been preferred in the newspapers.

Mr. DISNEY. With the permission of the gentleman from Virginia, I would like to address a word to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. HOUSTON.]

Mr. McMULLIN. Certainly, sir.

Mr. DISNEY. As I understand it, this whole affair is simple in its character and easily to be arrived at. Charges have been made in the public prints of this city, that while the Mexican Government, through its accredited Minister here, expressed its willingness and desire to have this money paid here upon the draft of the Mexican Government, and thus to consult at once the wishes, interest, and policy of the Mexican Government, as well as the pecuniary interest of the United States; it was the pleasure of the Executive Department to make different arrangements. Now, nothing could be easier than to arrive at correct information in reference to the truth or falsity of these charges; and I now suggest it to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that without the adoption of a formal resolution by the House, that upon his own motion he go to the Secretary of State, and inquire into the actual facts connected with this matter, and then, being possessed of all information, he can stand upon the floor of the House, and meet all of these statements with official and authoritative information. It will, perhaps, be said, as it in point of fact has been stated, that Mr. Webster has already made the statement. I do not so understand it. By a careful reading of the reply of Mr. Webster in connection with the allegation, you will find that it does not meet the charge. If the charges be true, that written reply and formal communication of the Secretary of State was an evasion of the inquiry. I repeat, then, that it is easy to find out the truth of all these matters. Do not let gentlemen stand up without any authority or information of the actual facts. But, as I have said, let the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means go and possess himself directly, immediately, and personally, with regard to them. I make the suggestion.

Mr. HOUSTON. The suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] is so very singular it is proper that I should respond to it. That gentleman, as I understand, was a member of the last Congress when this difficulty grew up. I am sure that he is too observant a member and too intelligent a gentleman to let anything pass of this kind without himself knowing as much in regard to it as any other member of this body. Then I ask, Mr. Chairman, why it is that he has not presented to the House of Representatives a resolution calling for this information? It cannot be expected, because such has not been the custom—such is in conflict with the usages of this House—that I should go, upon my own mere motion, and privately obtain information which this House was desirous of possessing—information which was to sustain or defeat the grave charges or insinuations against a high public functionary of the Government. The universal rule has been to make your call for it. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] states that the call has been made and answered; and my friend from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] says that it is a practical evasion. Then, if it be true that it was an evasion upon the part of the Secretary of State, that he did not fairly and frankly respond to the call of the House at the last session of Congress, how easy would it be for my friend from Ohio, or for any other member who believes that corruption exists, or that impropriety has been practiced upon the part of the President of the United States, or his Secretary, to frame a resolution to meet the evasions, and to get the information in that way? In order to obtain official information in a different way, I must go upon my own mere private responsibility, and then make a statement to the House of my recollection of what the Secretary of State might tell me. It might be that I would misunderstand him, or it might be that he would misunderstand me, and in that way discrepancies would arise. Now the House have the authority to call upon any Department of the Government for that knowledge; and if the information is called for in the right manner, the President of the United States and the Secretary of State are bound to respond to the call. In that way the information touching this most important subject can be officially laid before the House. If the gentleman chooses to present a resolution of that sort, or any other gentleman, I shall go for its adoption.

Mr. DISNEY. The honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means talks about the singular suggestion I made to him. Now, one word by way of explanation, in order to ascertain upon which side the singularity is. Why, sir, that gentleman is chairman of a committee in this House, whose bounden duty it is to report no appropriation for the action and sanction of this House until, as the chairman of that committee, he satisfies himself that the appropriation is just and proper, and should be made in the manner desired. Who, then, is singular—the chairman, for evading the charge imposed upon him by our organization and the rules, the practice and usage of the House; or me, for suggesting to him that he should conform to his duty upon the present occasion? Why does the gentleman make this particular case an exception to the general rule which governs him in regard to all of the items of appropriation which he reports to the House in the various appropriation bills? Why not inquire into this in the same way that he inquires into all the other items of appropriation he presents and asks this House to sanction, that he may be enabled to stand up before the House and satisfy it that the appropriation is right? Who, then, is singular in this regard? He says you can, and why do you not, offer a resolution calling this information particularly before the House? I have heretofore endeavored to obtain information on this subject. I stated in my remarks a few moments ago that there was no necessity for a resolution—no need for any formal thing of the kind, but that the chairman could go to the Secretary of State, upon his own motion, and obtain a correct statement of the facts. It is his bounden duty to inquire into these matters. There was no impropriety in the suggestion that I made. In the regular discharge of his duty he would have obtained the information, dispensing with the necessity of the adoption of any resolution by the action of this House. It is a duty imposed upon him to ask for that information, and also to post himself up in regard to everything connected with it. Outside rumor is sufficiently plausible to give reasonable cause for inquiry. The gentleman has doubtless read the charges in the public prints of the city, and yet we are asked to pass that bill, without making any inquiry at all. But I will come back to the general question—to the advice which I suggested to the gentleman. He asks why do not I offer a resolution? To satisfy the gentleman, I will offer a resolution. If he cannot discharge the duty without a resolution, he shall have it. He says that I was a member of the last Congress, when this matter was up. So I was. I acted then as I do now. I endeavored then to have the matter inquired into, and the requisite information brought before the House, but from some cause I failed.

The facts are as I have stated. Enough has been said out of doors about this matter to put this House upon the inquiry; and this House and the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will not be true to themselves and the interests of the country, unless they make this inquiry, no matter how high the name or the authority of those who will stand in opposition to it. Now let me say here, that the gentleman misunderstood me when he says I make charges or express any belief in regard to the matter. I make none. I know not whether they are true or false; but this I do know, that these charges have been made so publicly—have been stated, iterated, and reiterated through the city, until the time has come when a regard for the character of the House and the interests of the country, and for the character of the persons interested in these charges, demand that an inquiry should be made. And I trust, if it cannot be arrived at in any other way, that this House will, by a formal resolution, direct the inquiry to be made and the facts to be laid before it. I repeat, let the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means be induced to make the inquiry, without the formal action of the House instructing him to do it. It is his bounden duty to do it, without the special direction of the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] seems to have received the impression that I gave him advice, or attempted to do so. Why, sir, he is greatly mistaken. I never considered myself competent, and I shall not be so presumptuous as to undertake a task of that sort. The gentleman forgot himself—he gave me that advice. He told me that I did not possess the information, and he also told me how I ought to get it. The gentleman says that I ought to have a knowledge of the correctness of the appropriation I propose to make and the manner in which it should be made, before I ask the House to vote the appropriation. Let us see whether I possess the proper knowledge upon that subject. Here I ask the House to appropriate $3,180,000 to pay an installment due to Mexico in May next. By reference to the treaty, I find that we are bound to pay that money. By reference to the same treaty, I find that we are bound to pay $185,000 as the interest upon the installment. So one question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] has an answer. But he says I ought to be able to tell the House the way in which the payment is proposed to be made. How is this payment proposed to be made? Does the gentleman from Ohio know? I should like him to tell us, if he undertakes to say how it should be made, upon what terms the payments are to be made. I should like him to give us all the minutiae in regard to these payments. I have never heard how it was to be made except from the statements of the gentleman that it was to be made through certain houses, and that other houses had proposed to make the payment. So, then, I think, this house possesses all the information as far as my appropriation bill is concerned. It finds an appropriation of money is due, and ought to be paid. If the President of the United States proposes in any particular way to pay it which this House condemns, or questions, or desires to examine into, then let the House indicate it, and the terms of the payment shall be brought before the House, and the House then can see whether the proposition is a correct one or not—whether the proposed mode of payment is correct or not. The Committee of Ways and Means had nothing before them showing how the payment was proposed to be made. There was no proposition, either to Congress or the country, that reached the Committee of Ways and Means, by which they were informed whether the payment was to be made through one house or another, or directly by the Secretary of the Treasury to Mexico. Hence the committee could not have done any more than they did. The committee reported the appropriation bill precisely as the treaty, which is the highest law of the land, required it should be done, and that appropriation is now before you. Ah, but the gentleman says I ought to go and obtain the information; and he seems to have referred very frequently to the fact that I said his suggestion was to me a singular one. I certainly said, not out of any improper spirit or feeling at all, that I thought it was singular; and I think I will convince my friend from Ohio that it is a very singular fact, if he will but hear me. He says he called upon the Secretary of State at the last Congress for this information, and although he had the House to sustain him in the call for the information from the President of the United States, yet he bravely tells this House now that the call was refused, and it was evaded by the Secretary of State. Well, then, let me say to my friend from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY,] suppose the Secretary of State evaded a response to a call of this House, made upon him in due form, would it be more likely he would communicate the information to me personally than to the House? He is bound under the law, by his official duty, whenever an application is made to him, to respond solemnly to the call made upon him.

Mr. DISNEY. I did not say the Secretary of State had evaded answering the call. I said that the charge had been made, and that the response to it was an evasion.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Ohio declares he did not say that the Secretary had evaded answering the call, but that the charges had been made. My friend from Ohio did say this, I am sure, that he made the call and failed.

Mr. DISNEY. I said that I made an effort to get the information.

Mr. HOUSTON. A resolution was passed and sent to the Secretary of State, and that resolution was responded to. But the gentleman from Ohio has more than intimated that the Secretary of State evaded, intentionally, a manly, frank, and honest response to that call.

Mr. DISNEY. I said that the charge was made. I disclaim endorsing the charge.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am aware of that, when he referred to a charge of that sort. It is certainly an intimation, that upon our part we are not satisfied. So then I am endeavoring to present to this committee an utter impossibility. I have brought before the House, by instruction of the Committee of Ways and Means, the bill proposing to make the appropriation which is required of us by the treaty with Mexico. And we have got all the information that the committee could be possessed of; and if any other information is to be obtained it should be upon a call of the House. If the gentleman desires it, I will go as far as any other gentleman in an effort to bring the information before the House.

Mr. McMULLIN. The fact of my having yielded the floor to gentlemen on either side has been of great service to me, and to this House. I think it is now perfectly evident that this subject must be investigated. I must be permitted to say to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that he has furnished me with evidence sufficient to satisfy my mind that if he will discharge his duty faithfully—as I have no doubt he will—as chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, he will investigate this subject. I hold that it is not necessary that this investigation shall come before the committee by a formal resolution. No, sir, I concur fully with the view taken by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY,] that if the Committee of Ways and Means, having to provide for the payment of this indemnity, shall be of the opinion that there has been an abuse of power on the part of the Executive of this Government, it is their high and solemn duty to investigate the matter, and report the facts to this House and country. Yes, sir, and I tell the head of this committee, that unless they now investigate this subject—the matter having taken this direction—he will be held responsible by his constituents and the country. What is the view of this case as now presented? A member upon this floor rises in his place and tells the House and the country, that there have been charges preferred against the Executive of this Government, in regard to the payment of the late indemnity. Here is another bill proposing to pay a further indemnity; and in the payment of which there may be saved a large amount of money to this Government, and yet do justice to the oppressed sister Republic of Mexico. If these charges, as preferred against the Executive of this Government through the newspapers of the country, are to be relied upon, Mexico has been most fraudulently and shamefully imposed upon. I say if these charges preferred against the Executive of this Government, in connection with the Rothschilds, the Barings, and Messrs. Corcoran & Riggs, are well-founded, there has been palpable injustice done to the oppressed Government and people of Mexico.

I hope the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will not undertake to tell the House and country, that he is bound in good faith to carry out all the suggestions and recommendations of the Executive, whether right or wrong. I beg that gentleman to remember—and there are gentlemen upon this floor who will remember—that in some of the campaigns recently come off, it was charged upon the Democratic party in the last House of Representatives, that if our appropriations were extravagant and enormously high, they were made by a Democratic Committee of Ways and Means. I beg that gentleman to remember, that while the present House is composed of a very large and overwhelming majority of the Democratic party, the last House of Representatives could not be said to be composed of a majority of either party. For certainly, it will be recollected by every gentleman who is here present, neither party at the last Congress had a practical majority; and notwithstanding that fact, in some of the States of the Union, the Democratic party were held responsible for the enormously extravagant appropriations of the last Congress, because of the fact that we had a Democratic Committee of Ways and Means. Now, I beg gentlemen upon this floor to remember, that one of the gentlemen from Maryland, [Mr. BOWIE,] upon the other side of the hall, proposed to retrench the expenses of our Government, and he met a hearty response in his immediate neighborhood and upon our side of the House. Now, I desire that we shall meet that gentleman; and the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means is placed in a position in which he may be able to effect much in retrenching and reforming the expenses of the Government.

But I come back to the original question, Is this subject worthy of investigation? Ought it to be investigated? Is it not due to the country—due to the Government—due to Mr. Webster—due to the Mexican authorities—due to all the parties concerned, that there should be an investigation? I do not mean to offer a resolution on the subject. I had intended to do so. I had a resolution prepared for the purpose of eliciting information upon the subject, but I now take the ground—and from that position I hope that the worthy chairman of the Ways and Means will not attempt to escape—that it is the duty of that committee, these charges having been preferred not only in the newspapers of the country but by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY,] from his place upon this floor, to investigate the matter. I call upon the committee to investigate it and see whether—even if there has not been corruption—there has not been, at least, a species of favoritism exercised. If I were allowed here to draw upon my very humble resources, and to speculate in reference to the late transactions for the payment of this indemnity, I think I could satisfy the House that if there has been no corruption, there has been something very like favoritism, or that has, at least, an awful squinting towards it.

I beg pardon of the committee for having occupied so much of their time. I did not intend to do so, as I stated when I rose. My object is accomplished by having called the attention of the House and of the country to the fact, that there was dissatisfaction in the last Congress and is now, and that an investigation is demanded.

Mr. APPLETON, of Massachusetts, called for the reading of the President's message and the accompanying communication in reference to the subject before the committee.

The CLERK read the communication, which is as follows:

To the Senate and

House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to Congress a report from the Secretary of State, accompanied by a letter to him from the contractors for paying the installment of Mexican indemnity due on the 31st of May next, and respectfully invite attention to the subject.

MILLARD FILLMORE.

WASHINGTON, January 19, 1852.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 19, 1852.

To the President of the United States:

I lay before the President another letter from the contractors for the payment of the remaining installment due to Mexico under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo.

This affair appears to have become urgent. The contractors would seem to have had a right to expect that the proper appropriation would have been made by Congress in such season as to have given them a reasonable time to have made arrangements for the fulfillment of their undertaking.

For the last payment, which fell due on the 31st of May last, an appropriation was made on the 25th day of September, 1850, which gave time for the necessary arrangements. A bill for making an appropriation for the installment now to fall due in May next, passed the House of Representatives on the 26th day of February last, but failed to be considered in the Senate, as it is understood, for want of time.

The honor of the country requires that provision should be made to meet this payment with punctuality; and it is apparent that inconvenience and loss may probably ensue if the appropriation be longer delayed.

Respectfully submitted: DANIEL WEBSTER.

BOSTON, January 14, 1852.

SIR: The undersigned had the honor to address to you on the 26th ultimo, a letter urging the importance of the immediate passage of the appropriation bill for the payment of the installment of the indemnity due to Mexico on the 31st of May next.

In the remarks made in Congress when the bill was reported, they were alluded to in such a manner as makes it proper that they should state their position towards the payment, in justice to themselves, and also that the passage of the bill, any delay in which may occasion great loss to the Government, should not be impeded by useless discussion.

The undersigned had ceased to regard themselves as contractors, as the delay that had occurred was such as to render it impossible for them to go on and make the payment in the absence of such needful and timely appropriation, as was contemplated by both parties in making the contract, and without which its execution became impracticable; awaiting, however, the action of Congress, and the intentions of the Government, and prepared to aid in carrying them out when occasion for their services should offer. In this position, and knowing from their own experience the importance of time to make the funds in Mexico, and the great loss to which the Government might be subjected by prolonged delay, they addressed to you their letter of 26th ultimo, that the matter might have the attention of the Government.

To show clearly the effect of this delay, and to prevent the possibility of any misconception as to their present position, the undersigned beg to ask your attention to the following statement of the result of the last payment made by them.

To make the required funds, their agent proceeded to Mexico in October, and was occupied from that time until June following, in disposing of his exchange on England, France, and the United States, and was finally obliged to borrow three hundred thousand dollars on his bills, to be negotiated afterward, in order to complete the payment on the 31st of May. Thus it took nine months to draw the bills without depressing the market so as to make a loss.

The result of this immense exchange operation with all its attendant risks, was a profit of about one per cent. on the amount, and the contractors made no other profit except what resulted from loaning a portion of their own funds (not advanced by the United States) to the Government of Mexico, and to merchants in Mexico, at the current rates of interest. Adding the interest received for their own money, to the profit on the exchange, as stated above, the net result was a division of three and one third per cent. among the three contracting houses. This comprises the whole of their profits direct or indirect in connection with the business. The United States Government made no payment to the contractors, except in reimbursement of payments made by them in Mexico, from their own moneys, and on presentation of duly-authenticated receipts at Washington. Nor were any moneys received by the contractors from the Government prior to the first of March, and the last payment of about two millions of dollars was not made to them until the 27th June last, so that in fact the average of payments to them fell about 15th of May.

You will perceive that the accumulation of funds which required last year nine months for its completion, cannot now be made in the short space of time that remains without loss to the Government, and Congress ought to be fully aware of the responsibility it assumes by increasing the delay which may render compliance with the treaty stipulations a matter of great loss. These difficulties were urgently represented by the undersigned at the time the appropriation bill was pending at the last session.

It will be perceived from the foregoing, that the contractors made all their payments in Mexico out of their own funds, and were afterwards reimbursed in the United States, at a date averaging the 15th of May, and the last and largest payment by the United States to the contractors of two millions of dollars was not made until the 27th of June, nearly one month after they had paid the full installment to Mexico.

Any statements that have been made in regard to them at variance with the above facts, or implicating them in any way in the purchase of bonds for the purpose of speculating on the payment, or any other indirect transaction whatever, are an entire fabrication. No consideration would have induced them to depart from the full performance of everything implied in the strict interpretation of their undertaking.

We have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your obedient servants,

BARING, BROTHERS & Co.,
By T. W. WARD, Att'y,
HOWLAND & ASPENWALL,
CORCORAN & RIGGS.

To the Hon. DANIEL WEBSTER, Secretary of State.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, moved to amend the bill by adding thereto the following:

And that said sum be paid over to the proper authorities of Mexico by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States under the supervision of the President.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I have not arisen with a purpose to prolong this debate, by indulging in either the attack upon or defence of the honorable Secretary of State, but, if it were possible by my suggestions to do so, to secure its termination at once by coming to a vote upon the bill.

I respectfully submit to those who seem intent upon an assault on the Secretary of State, that this is not the proper time or occasion for the execution of their determination. It is not the proper place for criticism upon his conduct, even in the particular transaction of the payment of the Mexican indemnity. The House is not in possession of facts to indicate the position of Mexico, in regard to this affair of the indemnity.

At an early stage of the last Congress a bill was presented, to appropriate for the payment of $3,500,000—the installment due in 1851, under the treaty of Hidalgo—and it was then said that General Taylor's administration had signified a willingness to meet that and the rest of the installments, by accepting drafts of the Mexican Government, drawn for the several installments, payable at the city of New York. It was said that the Herrera administration, of which General Arista was a member, desired to have the use of the money, in advance of the day of payment, because the fear was entertained that a revolution impended which would, in all probability, break out at the period of the presidential election in Mexico. It was said that Mexico wanted to transfer her business from the hands of British capitalists into the hands of American capitalists, with the view of nurturing credit and fostering friendship here, instead of in London. I thought then, and yet think, that it would be generous and magnanimous on our part to make these payments in such form and manner as would be most agreeable to Mexico; provided it is safe and just to our own country. The treaty stipulates the payment of each installment "in the city of Mexico." Has Mexico signified to this Government, through the usual and accredited channel, any desire for the change in the place of payment? Has Mexico, as a government, through her departments which have the power to modify the terms of treaties and to change her laws, even yet signified to this Government a proposition to make the change suggested? Have the drafts alluded to been presented, or has any form of acquittance of this Government under the treaty been submitted for the consideration of the Executive of this Republic? It will not be enough that the President and Cabinet of Mexico have desired the acceptance of drafts for the amount of the installment. They have no power to bind their country to the modification, or to release us from our obligations under the treaty. But, Mr.

Speaker, it will be perceived that I speak of the reports which we heard last year, of what had been the respective wishes and concessions of the Mexican and American Administrations. Neither of the then existing Administrations now hold power. What is now—to-day—the attitude of the Mexican Government in regard to the payment of the installment falling due in 1852?

I understand that the charge against Mr. Webster is, that, immediately upon his accession to the office of Secretary of State—disregarding the commitments of the former Secretary, and without the slightest respect to the wishes of a neighboring power, and with a most ungraceful haste, he transferred the business of making these payments, under the treaty, to certain capitalists—British bankers, if you choose—thus evincing his utter disregard of true national policy, and his overweening desire to promote the private interests of himself and his friends. But, sir, this charge, whether true or false, can throw no light upon the question as to the present views of Mexico in regard to the installment now becoming due. We cannot learn, by discussing Mr. Webster's conduct in making the arrangement complained of, whether Mexico now wishes the $3,700,000, due in May, to be paid in New York or in Mexico, and whether Mexico is now making, in form, any application to this Government upon the subject. The money is to be paid in May; the treaty stipulates that it is to be paid in the city of Mexico. The money cannot be obtained until Congress passes this bill. It will require time to make the arrangements for exchange, so as to place so large a sum in the city of Mexico without deranging business. We cannot possibly acquire any material assistance in the discharge of our plain duty in the premises, by spending hours and days in discussing whether the Secretary of State acted properly in arranging as he did for the payment of the last installment.

I understand that the arrangement or contract which he entered into (subject of course to ratification by Congress) covered all the installments to become due after the date of said arrangement. I understood this from the debate of last year. Whether rightfully or wrongfully acting, the Secretary took the responsibility of making the arrangement in advance of the passage of the law, and under that contract the installment of 1851 was paid. Now, after our Government had, pro tanto, determined upon our line of conduct, am I to understand that Mexico yet wants the remaining installment to be paid in the city of New York upon our acceptance? Is any one here ready to say that this is the attitude of Mexico now before the Government of the United States? The anticipated revolution in Mexico did not occur. Aristocracy went into power without any trouble. Time has so nearly brought to maturity the installment due in May, 1852, that it would seem impossible for Mexico to derive any advantage from the peculiar manner of making the payment or the place where made. After the expression of our determination to pay at Mexico, according to the treaty, I imagine that Mexico has scarcely continued to apply for our acceptance at New York even conceding that she ever did so apply formally. In making the arrangement for the payment, in advance of the passage of the law, the Secretary of State may have committed an unpardonable error, or he may stand justified by a plea of necessity from want of time. This is not the proper time or occasion to investigate the propriety of his conduct.

Our duty is simple and plain. The treaty stipulates the payment of $3,700,000 in May next. The Executive calls our attention to this matter, and our Committee of Ways and Means brings in a bill appropriating the money. This done, the rest will remain with the Executive Department. It is understood that the arrangement under which the last installment was paid also covers the payment of this installment—that the Secretary of State made, but the single arrangement and that extended to the whole of the payments to be made under the treaty. Shall we undertake to alter the manner in which this contract, already partially executed, is to be carried out, or shall we permit the Executive to pay according to the treaty, we affording the means, and then hold the Executive to a just responsibility before the country for the fidelity and skill with which the duty shall have been discharged? It seems to me that all this debate about the wishes of Mexico, and about the conduct of Mr. Webster, is out of place. The question was substantially decided in 1850. The whole subject-matter is foregone.

But there will be a time when gentlemen who desire to discuss the conduct of Mr. Webster will have an opportunity. A memorial has been referred to a committee of this House—the Committee on the Judiciary—upon the consideration of which the propriety of the conduct of that gentleman in this matter, and in regard to other affairs of a public nature, interesting and important, will necessarily pass in review before the House and the country. The information can by that time be procured in full, to enable the House to pronounce its judgment upon the conduct of that public functionary, when his friends will have the opportunity to meet the issue fairly with his foes. At present, gentlemen are premature in their assaults on the Secretary of State; and on a proper consideration of the question presented by this bill, I hope it will appear that we are uselessly consuming precious time in an extra discussion, all of which will be hereafter repeated. I advise gentlemen to save their ammunition for the proper occasion. It is confessed that the information is not before us upon which these assaults are to be justified. "There is no gentleman upon this floor who can say that Mexico is now an applicant before this Government for any favor, or for any change as to the time and place of paying the money to which this bill relates. No one here can say that Mexico will now permit us to pay the remaining installments elsewhere than is stipulated by the treaty. No one here will rise in his place and indorse any charge against the Secretary of State, impugning the propriety of his conduct in regard to this transaction. This business demands our action—our instant action. It does seem to me, under these circumstances, that we had best proceed to pass the bill making the appropriation, so as to have the money paid under the treaty and according to the treaty. If it shall hereafter appear that the arrangements for the payments have secured a loss to us, or have effected any imposition upon a weak neighbor, let the Executive take the responsibility, and we may in the discharge of our proper functions pronounce our judgment, condemning the course of the Executive or lending to it our expression of approbation.

One additional remark as to the amendment offered, or indicated by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON,] and I shall have done. A similar amendment was offered to the bill of 1850, providing for the payment of the installment due in 1851. I voted for it then, because I preferred that the Secretary of the Treasury should pay out the public money, and did not clearly perceive why the payment should be intrusted to the Secretary of State. The House decided then, that the Executive should not be controlled in the distribution of these duties to his heads of departments, but might, upon his own responsibility, confide the payment to the Secretary of State, or the Secretary of the Treasury. It was then known that the Secretary of State would negotiate the arrangement for the payment. If we now reverse the determination of the Thirty-first Congress, by directing the Secretary of the Treasury to make future payments, and so discharge the Secretary of State therefrom, we shall by that act stain the reputation of Mr. Webster as a public officer, and as a man. I shall not, by any act of mine, so directly inflict an injury upon the reputation of any man, and surely I shall not under the circumstances here presented, and after what has transpired in connection with the conduct of Mr. Webster touching these installments. I thought we had best commence, where the gentleman's amendment proposes we shall now go. I voted accordingly, but with no bias upon my mind, and no desire by that vote to reflect upon any one. Were the circumstances the same, I should so vote again. But the circumstances, as I have shown, are radically different. When the Secretary of State was assailed here, in the last session, this question was much in the state in which it is now presented, and it will be remembered that the House, by a very decisive vote, refused to transfer the duty of making the payment to the Secretary of the Treasury, or to order the substitute which contemplated the acceptance of the drafts. These circumstances render it still more difficult now to interfere with the Executive in determining the functionary who shall make these payments.

Therefore, in the absence of any knowledge of the exact desire now entertained by the Mexican Government in regard to the place and manner of our meeting the remaining installments, and unwilling ever to censure any man unless I am certain that my duty compels it, I am willing to vote for the passage of this bill. If it shall be found hereafter that loss has occurred, or that wrong has been done, or frauds have paved the way for speculation through the instrumentality of these public transactions, I shall be ready, without the slightest regard to party ties or political affiliations, to mark my condemnation in the most public manner upon the guilty.

Mr. DUNHAM. I concur most fully in the opinion expressed by the gentleman from Kentucky, that this question is presented to us prematurely. In the first place, even if there has been wrong done, there is no pretension that the money which has heretofore been appropriated for the purpose of complying with the terms of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, has been diverted from that purpose; nor is there any apprehension that this appropriation will be diverted from the purpose for which we intend it. It cannot be doubted that there is a necessity that this money shall be speedily appropriated, in order that the terms of the treaty may be complied with, without loss or expense to the Government. The true course is, to pass this bill and let the money be applied, and then if gentlemen think that there has been corrupt and improper conduct on the part of the Secretary of State, let them come forward and institute an investigation; but we ought not, for the purpose of investigating a supposed charge against a high officer of the Government, to stay the necessary proceedings to carry out this important treaty. Now there is no apprehension that loss can occur to the Government by making this payment through the Secretary of State, and afterwards investigating his conduct, if necessary; while there is great danger that if we delay the appropriation for the purpose of making beforehand such an investigation into his conduct, loss will occur to the Government.

Now, one word in reference to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, to take the control of this payment from the Secretary of State and give it to the Secretary of the Treasury. Aside from the suggestion made by the gentleman from Kentucky, that it would be an implied censure on the Secretary of State, before an investigation, I ask what officer of the Government ought to carry out this treaty? Does it belong to the Secretary of State, or to the Secretary of the Treasury? The payment of this money is to comply with the terms of a treaty. Has the Secretary of the Treasury anything to do with the negotiation, or in the execution of a treaty? No, sir; this properly devolves upon the Secretary of State. Why will you, then, without any previous investigation, take this duty from the officer upon whom it properly devolves, the officer who has charge of our foreign relations, and give it to another officer, who has not usually had, and never ought to have, any control over such matters? It belongs to the Secretary of State, as the organ of this Government in its intercourse with foreign nations, and not to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, (interposing.) The gentleman says that the Secretary of the Treasury has never had charge of matters of this sort. I desire to ask that gentleman whether a former Secretary of the Treasury—Mr. Walker—did not provide for the payment of one of these installments?

Mr. DUNHAM, (resuming.) I do not know but it may have been as the gentleman suggests. But what I wish to say is, that it is a duty that properly belongs to the Secretary of State; and no matter what has been the course taken heretofore, if it is a duty which devolves properly upon that officer, it should be discharged by him. The duties of the Government are divided. They are executive and legislative. Now, all that this House is called upon to do in relation to this matter is, in the proper discharge of their functions as the legislative branch of the Government, to appropriate the money necessary to enable the Executive to discharge his duty in executing the law, that is, in complying with the treaty, for there is practically no difference in these terms.

The treaty is a law—a national law; and it devolves upon the Executive to see that this law shall be properly executed. And when we step out of our own legitimate sphere of action and undertake to dictate what officer shall discharge a particular duty belonging to the executive department of the Government, we at once relieve the Executive from all responsibility connected with the discharge of that duty and take it upon ourselves. If we undertake to dictate what officer shall make the payment of this money, I ask with what face can we go back to the President and call upon him for explanation in relation to it? How can we hold him responsible if the money shall be misapplied? He will turn upon us and say, "I am not responsible, because you yourselves pointed out the officer who should discharge this duty and the manner in which it should be discharged; this officer, and not myself, is responsible to you; he is your agent, not mine." Now, I am for holding the Executive responsible. The treaty stipulations must be carried out, and I am for appropriating the money necessary to carry it into effect, and then hold the Executive responsible for its faithful execution.

If gentlemen, then, suppose that these means have been improperly employed—if they suppose that this law has not been properly carried into execution, let them come here and prefer their charges before this House, and let the matter be investigated.

I will say one word in reference to the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means in reference to these charges; and perhaps it is not necessary to say even a word upon that subject, for I think the chairman of that committee has amply vindicated the course we have pursued in reference to this matter. What are the duties of that committee? Is it their duty to investigate all the charges which may have been made against the executive officers of the Government? Our duty is to provide the means necessary, according to law, for carrying on the Government, and then to see that those means are properly applied in accordance with the law. But is it supposed by any gentleman upon this floor that this money will not be applied in accordance with the law of the land, and in accordance with our treaty obligations? By those treaty obligations we are to pay to Mexico a certain amount of money. Now, if we appropriate that money, and if it is applied, why it is in accordance with the law, and the Committee of Ways and Means have nothing else to do with the matter. We have nothing to do except to appropriate the money necessary for carrying out the law, and to see that it is applied for the purpose of carrying out the law. It is just as much the duty of the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY]—every bit as much—if he believes that corruption has existed in the execution of this treaty, to take the proper steps for having the matter investigated, as it is that of the Committee of Ways and Means, or of any member of that committee. If he believes such to be the fact—if he believes that this money has been misapplied, it is his duty to come before this House and ask for an investigation. That gentleman says he has been talking about this matter for two years. I ask him if he can clear his conscience as a representative of the American people upon this floor, when being satisfied that these charges were well grounded, and, as he says, deserving of investigation, when he has not insisted upon an investigation?

Mr. DISNEY. I did make a move in the matter.

Mr. DUNHAM. The gentleman did not make an effectual move, or there would be no necessity for making it now. If he made it, he should have followed it up until the matter was investigated and his object was accomplished.

Mr. DISNEY. I did follow it up until it failed.

Mr. DUNHAM. Well, it is plain that the gentleman did not accomplish his object, else, why is the question now before the House? And why are we here discussing it? But again, this question has been before the House ever since the commencement of the session. These rumors, as the gentleman says, have been talked of in the city and have been mentioned in the public prints, yet the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] has sat here quietly in his seat as a member of this House and has made no move in reference to it until now, when the emergency is precipitated upon us, when we are called upon to appropriate the money necessary to carry out our treaty stipulations with Mexico; and now gentlemen propose to delay this appropriation, and thus stop the means of the Government to carry into effect the provisions of that treaty until this investigation can be made. Why, if the investigation was to be made at all, it should have been made when the officer was first suspected. The question should at least have been raised at the commencement of the session, and not now.

Now, what is the state of the case? The stipulations of the treaty must be carried into effect; its terms must be complied with; but in order to comply with these terms it is necessary that a certain amount of money should be appropriated. It is, then, clearly the duty of this House to appropriate that amount of money, and thus furnish the means to the Administration, or the Executive Department, to carry out the provisions of the treaty. That is what we have to do. If then the Executive fails to apply the money to the purpose for which we have designed it, then it will be our business to investigate in relation to it. But is there any doubt upon that point? Has the charge been brought by any one that the money heretofore appropriated for the payment of the former installments has not been properly applied? Have not the installments been paid to the last dollar? No, sir, that is not the charge. The charge is, that although the Executive has complied with the treaty—although the installment has been paid to the last dollar, yet that in some manner, they have made a speculation out of it. Well, is that for the Committee of Ways and Means to investigate? The money which has been appropriated out of the Treasury has been paid over, every dollar of it, and paid according to law. So far as the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means goes, then, it has been discharged. If corruption has been practiced upon the part of the Secretary of State; or upon the part of any other executive officer, it is as much the business of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] to investigate it, as it is for the Committee of Ways and Means, or any member of that committee.

Mr. HOUSTON, (interrupting.) How can they investigate it unless it is referred to them?

Mr. DUNHAM. The honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. HOUSTON] suggests that this matter has not been referred to that committee. I ask the gentleman from Ohio—for he is a gentleman of a good deal of legislative experience—if it is usual, as far as his experience goes, for a committee to act upon mere vague rumors, gotten up by or circulated through the newspapers, without the authority of the House? Our committee was raised—for what purpose? Was it raised as a sort of grand-jury, to bring forward and investigate every vague charge of every person or newspaper; to hunt up every little slander or rumor which circulates about the country? Or is it our duty to carry out such matters as are referred to us by the House, either by your resolutions or by your laws, and which we are bound to carry out and execute? I ask, whether it is made a part of my duty, as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, or any other committee of this House, to read the newspapers every morning, or to walk up and down the streets of the city, to learn what idle rumors are afloat? Or whether it is a part of my duty, as a member of that committee, to enter into the private controversies of speculators, in their scramble for spoils? For I tell gentlemen, that the great bone of contention is a contention between speculators for the job of paying the three millions of money, by which they hope and expect to make a profit off of somebody. I had never supposed it was my duty to seize upon these idle rumors, and bring them officially before a committee of this House, and ask for action upon them in the committee-room, and convert ourselves into a sort of inquisition, to hunt up charges and commence these investigations. I do not believe this is the business of any committee of this House; and if it is, I hope to God I may never be placed upon another. My understanding of the duties of a committee of this House is, that we are to act upon such subjects as come to us legitimately through this House, by the laws of the land, or by the action of the House. Now, as to the charges which have been brought against the Secretary of State, we know that he has discharged his duty, as far as the faithful payment of the money appropriated by Congress goes; but further than that I do not know. God knows that I am no political admirer of the Secretary. I do not stand up here to vindicate him. I care not for him so far as I am concerned. All I ask is that the laws of the land may be properly executed, and our treaty obligations faithfully complied with, and that the Executive officers of this Government may have the means of carrying out the treaty, and that they may use those means for that purpose in their own way, so that we can hold them responsible for the manner in which they shall use them. That is all. We are bound to provide the means necessary to execute the treaty, and let the Executive execute them.

Mr. Chairman, I have taken up the time of this committee longer than I intended, and I will only add one thing further. Shall we hesitate in the passage of this law and appropriating the money necessary to carry out the stipulations of this treaty, for the purpose of gratifying the malice and revengeful feelings that have been engendered amongst certain stock-jobbers against the Secretary of State, because they did not happen to be the fortunate speculators in this transaction? That is the real question at issue, and you cannot escape it. It is a question whether we shall embarrass the action of the Executive branch of this Government by these charges, for the purpose of gratifying the malice of those who have been thwarted in their purpose of obtaining the contract for the payment of this installment. The experience of every man in these transactions is, that this money ought to be appropriated, and that speedily, in order to enable the Government to transfer the money in the usual way to the Mexican Government in time to make the payment by the day stipulated. To do this we have no time to lose. If we delay we may incur much additional expense and trouble to our Government in making this payment, the responsibility of which must rest upon those who obstruct the speedy passage of this bill.

Mr. DISNEY. I did not propose to say another word to the committee, in addition to what has already fallen from gentlemen, upon this subject; but the course of remark indulged in by the gentlemen who have just taken their seats, [Messrs. MARSHALL and DUNHAM,] compels me to say a word or two in reply.

I confess that I cannot see what there is in connection with this subject that so utterly blinds us to all investigations in regard to these charges. Now, what are the facts of the case? Allegations have been made here involving two distinct points. One is, that the bargain made, in a pecuniary point of view, was not a just one to the Government of the United States. The second one is, that by the payment of the money upon the draft of the Mexican Government, the interests and wishes of that Government, as well as the interests of the United States, would be better consulted than by the payment now proposed to be made. These charges are made, and they are important ones. If they have not been made on this floor, they have been through the public prints of this city, as I stated before, and in the lobbies of this House, until some members of the House have become convinced that there is reasonable ground for the inquiry. What, then, is the objection to the investigations proposed? Why do gentlemen rise here and denounce it? The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] says we should first pass this bill, and then hold the Executive responsible for the improper discharge of his duties.

Mr. MARSHALL. I ask the gentleman from Ohio, whether he is prepared to say that the Mexican Government desire that this installment shall be paid otherwise than in the manner provided for in the treaty?

Mr. DISNEY. There is reasonable ground for the inquiry to ascertain whether the fact be so or not. And why will gentlemen rise here, and refuse the light, and refuse me the information which I desire in order to enable me to vote intelligently? But we are told that all that this House has to do is to appropriate the money, and place it at the disposition of the Executive, and our treaty obligations are discharged as far as this House is concerned. Let me ask of that gentleman, and every member of this House, have we, or those of us who have asked for information in order to enable us to vote intelligently upon this matter, shown any disposition to violate the terms of the treaty? No, sir. We are not disposed to be guilty of any act which could be construed into a violation of the interests or the good feelings which ought to exist between this country and the Government of Mexico. We are exactly upon the other side of this matter. And when it is represented that the Government of Mexico wishes that this matter should be arranged in a different manner from that of the last installment, it is necessary that this matter should be inquired into, and we, who ask for this information, wish to consult at once, both the interest and wishes of the Government of Mexico, as well as the interests of the United States, for both are involved in this matter. I do not wish to interpose any delay. To obtain the information we ask for will not prevent the passage of this bill in time to make the payment. Never before in the history of legislation was it heard, that when it is suggested that money was about to be improperly used, either as regards the pecuniary interest of this country, or as it tends to disturb the good feeling which exists between this country and the Government of Mexico, and we rise up here and ask for information in order to arrest and to prevent that sort of action, gentlemen get up here and say, No, no, the executive department of this Government is charged with the execution of treaties, and we will place the money in their hands and leave the responsibility with them.

NEW SERIES.....No. 21.

Mr. DUNHAM, (interrupting.) The gentleman seems to base his remarks upon the hypothesis that Mexico herself desires this change to be made. No response has been made to the gentleman from Kentucky who puts this question, whether any gentleman is willing to say that the Mexican Government is desirous, at this time, for such a change to be made. I wish to put another question. It is, whether this whole matter, so far as the Mexican Government is concerned, was not brought about by speculators who went from here there, for the purpose of inducing that Government to change this mode of payment for their own private benefit? And whether, in inducing that Government to do this, they did not address themselves to the necessities of the Mexican Government, which necessities made that Government desire to appropriate this indemnity a little sooner than it could if it was paid according to the terms of the treaty as now proposed, and that that inducement was what operated upon the Mexican Government?

Mr. DISNEY. I am at a loss to understand the pertinency or the importance of this question. We have certain facts charged, and with them we have to deal. Now, of what importance is it to this House, what caused the Mexican Government to do it? It is charged that the Mexican Government does wish this installment paid here, and we ask that you shall make an official investigation and an official inquiry into the truth of the facts. But what are gentlemen doing? They are asking us to pass this bill, and by their acts, their doctrines, and the policy they advocate, they seek to withhold from us the information we desire with regard to the facts charged, and they rise up here and ask us whether we know them to be true.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I do not choose that the country shall understand from the lips of the gentleman that there are charges here which I attempted at all events to smother. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] who makes the charges? Where are they made? and are you willing, upon your official responsibility, to introduce the charges to the notice of the country?

Mr. DISNEY. I will respond to the gentleman with great pleasure. I say again that the public prints of your city have teemed with charges of this sort. I say I have heard these charges until they have brought to my mind the conviction that there is reasonable grounds to put this House upon the inquiry. And it is not requisite that a member, or this body should be satisfied of their truth, but it is sufficient when the House or any of its members shall be satisfied that there are reasonable grounds for the inquiry, to make it proper that this House should make that inquiry. How are we to ascertain whether it be true or not? That is the point which we are seeking to arrive at. Gentlemen ask me whether I am willing to state that they are true? I am not; but I want to be advised as to whether they are true or not. You want me to vote with reference to this bill, while the truth of these charges is undetermined. What objection can be fairly urged towards the course suggested? What tangible, fair, solid, and substantial reason can be urged upon an unbiased and impartial mind, why this House should not make the inquiry, and possess itself of the proofs in regard to the charges made? The country will ask you why, when these charges pending and made in the public prints, you did not make the inquiry, to know whether they were true or false? That is all I desire. But you object to it. No, not fairly, not solidly. Then why this constant opposition to obtaining the information with regard to this matter? Why will gentlemen seek to withhold from us that kind of information which will enable us to act and vote intelligently in regard to it? But we are told that we ought to pass this bill, and then afterward hold the Administration responsible for a proper application of the money. Sir, what would be said if a man was told that the groom who had the charge of his horse intended to make way with the animal, and he should say let him—he has the charge of him; I will take no preventive steps; but if he does the deed I will hold him responsible for the act? Why, such a course would earn but scorn. In this case it is worse, for we are but the agents of the people, and we have been told that such things are intended; and if we shall pass this bill, and place the money in the hands of the Executive, and subsequent developments should prove the charges true, with what face could gentlemen stand up and face their country and face their constituents? You will be asked, why did you permit this thing to be done? You knew that the facts were charged, and yet you gave the means to be perverted. Of what avail would be your defence? Oh, yes! we knew that the facts were charged, but we determined to hold the Administration responsible afterwards. As to this sort of by-tings as to this matter of opposition having been started by speculators out of doors, I know nothing, I care nothing; for they are not important to the issue. The charges are grave and important, and, as I have said, they have brought to my mind the conviction that they are reasonable enough in their character to put this House upon inquiry, and I desire that inquiry to be made; and I repeat, I cannot understand why it is that gentlemen oppose every effort to obtain the information. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNHAM] asks why I did not make the offer before? I did at the last session, but this same sort of opposition then met me that meets me now. The gentleman says, why did you not make it before this session? How could I make it more opportunely than when the question itself was before the House? I might upon some resolution day, if I had been smart enough to out-hollow and out-jump some fifty gentlemen struggling for the floor at the same time, have got a resolution of that sort in. But certainly there could be no opportunity, no time so pertinent as when the subject was up before the House. It is now up for the first time, and I avail myself of the opportunity. But I ask the gentleman to put it to himself, to his own judgment, to his own conscience, to say how he can feel justified to his constituents, when he puts every obstacle in his power in the way of obtaining information to enable this House to decide whether these charges are true or false.

Mr. DUNHAM. I do not choose to allow the gentleman, by that kind of inquiry, to place me in a false position before the country. I do not think that the gentleman can, if he will consider for a moment, with propriety make such an inquiry as that after the remarks I made. My object is not to stifle this inquiry. No person will be found, who will devote more ardent energy to the prosecution of this inquiry, than I myself, at a proper time and upon a proper occasion. I say this is not the proper time and occasion, because in doing it, you obstruct the execution of that treaty, and lose more to the Government by delaying this payment, than you gain, for the reason that you may now make this payment under this contract, and lose nothing to the Government by transportation and exchange. If you delay this matter until it is too late to execute the contract that has already been made, you will have to send your own agent there to pay this money. But when you do that, I apprehend you will lose more by the operation, than you will save by this investigation. I do not object to the investigation, and I hope no friend of the Secretary of State will object to it, for if he is an honest man, who has done his duty properly, he ought not to fear an investigation; and if he has not, the country is interested in having it made. It is not the investigation I avoid; but it is the time at which it is proposed to be made. I wish, while I am up, to make another suggestion. This whole controversy is not about the manner in which the money shall be paid, but about the men and the officer through whom it shall be paid—who shall have the contract to pay it. In other words, it is as to who shall have the pickings arising from the job.

Mr. DISNEY. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNHAM] has found out, that there is great danger of the non-execution of the treaty if we should now make the investigation, and that the treaty stipulations cannot be executed if this House endeavors to avail itself of the necessary information, to enable it to act intelligently in regard to the affair. Why, sir, one of the matters charged is that the Mexican Government is now standing ready to receive the money here. But, says the gentleman from Indiana, if you are delaying this matter, and going through a long and tedious inquiry, the time will have flown and past by, and the contractors will either refuse or be unable to make this payment in Mexico at the time limited and required by the terms of the treaty itself. I repeat, sir, if the charges be true, the money can be paid here, and at once consult both the interest of our Government in a pecuniary point of view, and do an act of courtesy towards the Mexican Government. If it is not, as the gentleman from Indiana seems to think, that it is a mere question of dollars and cents, but were it, that is of sufficient importance, in my judgment, to attract the attention of this House. The people, sir, expect us to have a regard for the Treasury. They expect us to make such an administration of their affairs, so far as they may come under our control, as will consult their pockets.

But it is said that the Mexican Government wishes to avoid the influence which British bankers would and do exercise over them by having control of the payment of this money—that they would prefer to have it paid here by the Government to their own agent, upon their own direction. The objects and benefits to be accomplished, then, are twofold: first, the saving of money to the Treasury of the United States; and secondly, the relief of the Mexican Government from the influence of British bankers, which they so much desire to avoid. But to suppose that the execution of the treaty will be seriously endangered by an offer upon the part of this House to obtain from the Secretary of State the information which will enable this House to decide upon the truth or falsehood of the charges mentioned, is too absurd, in my judgment, to require a serious refutation at my hands. We ask but light; and let us have it, that we may be enabled to vote intelligently upon this bill. I desire at the proper time to offer a resolution to call for this information. It is all moonshine—it is downright absurdity to talk of endangering the execution of the treaty, because the House wishes to direct such an inquiry to the Secretary of State. The information can be obtained in forty-eight hours, and thus with but little delay the bill can be passed.

Mr. BAILY, of Virginia. If there is any other gentleman who desires to address the committee upon this subject, I wish he would do so now, as I do not wish to speak until I have heard all that gentlemen desire to offer.

Mr. BROOKS. I wish to call the attention of members of the House to the fact, that this whole subject was discussed at great length last year, and all the facts which could be elucidated, were brought out in the course of the debate, and from the documents laid before the Committee of Ways and Means, of which I had then the honor of being a member. These surmises, these ambiguous voices which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Disney] has given utterance to, as has also the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. McMullin], were scattered not so much through this House as they were through the newspapers, and I, as a friend of the Administration, as intimately connected with the President of the United States, being a member of his own State, felt it my duty to rise upon the floor of this House, and state such surmises and suspicions were afloat, and I called upon the House to take action upon the matter at that time, before they voted upon the appropriation. This is the fact, and every gentleman who was then a member knows that such was the fact. The mode of payment I did not approve; and in the course of the discussion of that bill, I submitted a proposition, I may say, on behalf of some of the friends of the Administration, certainly of this portion of the House, and with whom I was connected, that that contract be put up, as loans are put up, to the lowest bidder. I stated to the House, and I have the debate and record before me, that however the House then acted, having all of these facts before them, it was not in the power of members hereafter upon this floor, as fair men to the Administration, to rise again and make opposition, when the House had had the opportunity of putting this contract up to the lowest bidder. I did not approve of the manner that it was proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means to make the payment. In and out of committee I resisted that mode of payment; and I said at that time that I wished to make a record, and that I wished the House to stand upon the record in throwing the facts before the House, or before the country, with all the surmises and imputations against the President and the Secretary of State. I wished the House either to indorse or reject the action of the Administration, and as a friend of that Administration, I wished that contract to be put up to the lowest bidder. How did the House act? I obtained only fifty votes for it in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that after a great struggle, and with difficulty; but when the question was brought before the House I could not obtain enough for it to make a record, by the call of the yeas and nays. There were but fifteen members who rose upon the floor and were disposed to make the record. If the contract had been put up to the lowest bidder at that time, a large sum of money would have been made by the Government. The House having passed this bill, it failed for want of action in the other branch of Congress, and there it died. It has so happened from the failure of the bill to pass, that it is not in the power of the contractors to make money. Now the only means by which they could make money, was by having the securities of this Government. They alone would then have held the securities of the Government, and could loan money to Mexico, having adequate securities for its repayment. There being no appropriation upon the part of this House and Government, they had no securities whereby they could lend money to Mexico so as to secure a repayment, and thereby they have been deprived of the means of making the profits I anticipated, and which they would have made had the law passed both Houses of Congress. There now has arisen altogether a different state of things from what existed then. The faith of the Government is pledged in the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. In May next the payment must be made—no matter what it costs—under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. There is no time to put it up as a loan and offer it to the highest bidder. There is no means by which the Government can make the three and a half per cent. it had in its power to make then. The contractors, or whosoever take it, can hardly, I think—though I have not studied the state of exchanges—make anything at all under any sort of contract, such as they would have made had the appropriation passed at that time. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Disney], and the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. McMullin], both old members with myself, had all of these facts before them. The country possessed also a knowledge of all these facts. They are, sir, all upon the record to a great extent. If it had been the desire of the House to take the responsibility, and the House could have taken it, not to pass the bill as it did pass, without fifteen members rising to call for the yeas and nays, I say to the gentleman that it is not fair dealing; it is not honorable, after a friend of the Administration rose upon the floor of the House and challenged investigation, and predicted that this state of things would arise here, now a year after to scatter forth these ambiguous voices and these reproaches. It is not necessary for me to defend the President of the United States. I scorn to defend him against any reproach of bribery or corruption made here. If there is in this House one who will make these charges against the President of the United States, he will make a mark for himself which after time will declare to be more disgraceful than the imputation involved. He is a man above any eulogium. I challenge, in his behalf, investigation from beginning to end. I challenge any member standing at the head of any committee, to make any charge. I will vote for any committee of investigation whatsoever. As for the Secretary of State, I do not know with what propriety charges are made against him here; this, more than they were last year. It was in the power of this House to have taken the responsibility of making that contract as I proposed—to give it to the lowest bidder. I do not believe—nay I feel assured of it as any man can be, that there was no dishonesty, no corruption, no reproach to be attached to the Secretary of State. I investigated and explained all of those facts, and the connection he had with that transaction, in my speech published at length in the Congressional Globe, now before me. I said then what I say now, that it ought to have been put up as a loan to the highest bidder. That was my impression at that time, and is my impression now. But no contract was made, and no contract could be made which would bind this House in any manner whatsoever. It was not in the power of any department of this Government to make a contract for the negotiation of its payment before an appropriation upon the part of Congress had been made. The Government could make an arrangement only after the appropriation had been made.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] say that the Secretary of State had entered into no contract as to the manner of paying this debt and the person by whom it was to be paid?

Mr. BROOKS. I say now as I did then, that it was not in the power of the Secretary of State to enter into any contract, and that whatsoever arrangement, or contract if you choose to call it so, he made, was known to the contracting parties to depend upon the appropriation by this House of the three millions—that it was subject to the action of the House. The action of this House was the approval of the arrangement, and the appropriation was carried by an immense majority, so large that it was not in my power to obtain the yeas and nays upon the record. I trust I am understood by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Marshall], for this is an important point. I do not know that I have anything more necessary to be said for the vindication of my course upon this subject. I only wish to be understood further, if I have not been sufficiently understood, that now there is entirely a different state of things from what there was last year. The treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo must be immediately fulfilled, and the quicker this law passes the two Houses of Congress, upon the better terms can arrangements be made; and the longer it is put off the more it will cost the country. Therefore it is the interest of this House to let the Departments make the arrangement or contract in whatsoever manner is most beneficial to this Government.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, obtained the floor, but gave way to—

Mr. GIDDINGS. I desire to make but a few remarks upon this subject.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. Do I understand the gentleman to yield the floor unconditionally?

Mr. BAYLY. I cannot yield the floor for explanation; but I have no objection to yielding it unconditionally. I presume, considering the official connection I stand in relation to this matter, that it will be the pleasure of the House to allow me to be heard. I do not want to speak until have heard all that is to be said.

Cries of "Certainly!"

Mr. GIDDINGS. This being the first opportunity I have had, I will throw myself upon the indulgence of the House for a few minutes, in reply to my colleague, [Mr. Taylor], which will be about as much in order as anything that has been said upon this question. [Laughter.]

[Cries of "Certainly!" "Go ahead!"]

The subject-matter of the resolution, it will be remembered, was an expression of our sympathy for Governor Kossuth, and inviting him to this body for the part which he took in the struggle for freedom by the people of Hungary. Several gentlemen upon this floor most strenuously opposed the adoption of the resolution, and among others my colleague, [Mr. Taylor]. In the remarks which he made, and which I did not notice, and which it was not my intention to notice, he made a very direct allusion to me as one holding extreme opinions, and that sort of thing, so common are the allusions to my opinions by other gentlemen, as well as my colleague, when they have nothing to say, that I never think of replying to them. However, upon that occasion, finding my colleague, a few years since, together with several other gentlemen, opposing that resolution; had taken a course which appeared to me to be directly opposed to the one they were pursuing on the occasion just referred to, I, with the utmost good feeling, and with not a single thought of ill will to any human being upon the earth, I took the privilege of referring to their former action upon a resolution of sympathy with the people of France. Now, I call the committee to bear testimony, that there was nothing unkind in my remarks—that I showed no malignity or ill will to my colleague. God forbid that I should. I intended simply to exhibit what appeared to me to be his inconsistency upon the one subject only, of having voted for the resolutions of sympathy with France, and now opposing the resolutions of sympathy with Hungary, as he did. I sent, therefore, to the Clerk's desk the resolutions as they were introduced, and two of them were read. They were not all read, as my colleague has asserted, though I have no idea he intended any misrepresentation. I did not at that time recollect or bear in mind that those resolutions were amended subsequently. But when afterwards reminded of it by the gentleman over the way, [Mr. Venable], in the report of my remarks I directed the reporter to insert the resolution as amended instead of the resolution as read, and it went out to the world with the literal truth in all its parts. I did it with the utmost pleasure, and I so informed my colleague at the time; and at that time he expressed no dissatisfaction. Had he done so, I should have endeavored to satisfy him. I then understood him to be perfectly satisfied, and other gentlemen alluded to in my remarks declared themselves perfectly satisfied.

But to the point: The resolution of sympathy with France was the subject of every word that I spoke in relation to my colleague. I made no reference to mere words; and my remarks applied to the resolution as passed, with all the force that they referred to the resolution as introduced. There was, then, in point of fact, no injustice to my colleague—none intended, none perpetrated upon him. Yet there was a technical difference in the resolutions as introduced and as passed; and as I have before stated, he seized upon that variance of words, not of substance, for the purpose of attributing to me a wanton attack upon him, and, in the exuberance of his good humor, to say that "I must, therefore, believe it was the design of the gentleman to misrepresent me knowingly, willfully, and maliciously, by a false allegation." Well, it gives me great pleasure to believe that my colleague is the only human being upon the surface of the earth who entertains such an opinion. As I have already stated, the resolution as adopted, for which he voted, was in substance the same as the resolution offered. My colleague, in making his statement, was guilty of perpetrating two or three mistakes, to which I will call his attention. The resolutions, as they were introduced, my colleague says, were not received. The gentleman is mistaken. He appears to have been not only in favor of the resolution as introduced by our colleague at that time, [Mr. CUMMINGS,] but he voted to suspend the rules of this House in order to have them introduced, and the rules were suspended and the resolutions received. They were discussed through the day. Now, far be it from me to say that my colleague intended any misrepresentation. It must have escaped his examination. Yet I have as much reason to charge him with willful and malicious intention as he had to charge me. Again: On the 10th of April, a week subsequently, my colleague expressed his approbation for the resolutions as originally introduced by again voting to suspend the rules in order to take them up for discussion. The rules were again suspended—the resolutions were again taken up and discussed, and in the course of that day they were amended, and as amended my colleague voted for them. Here is the whole length and breadth of his case. As I said before, I had no idea of censuring my colleague any further than to show his sympathy with France by voting for those resolutions, and his opposition to one expressing sympathy with Hungary. My colleague has mistaken me, when he says I have made any misrepresentation in regard to him knowingly. I thought the gentleman had been guilty of impropriety, and I felt it deeply. When I saw him here during that day in his military manner—for my colleague is a general, [laughter,]—march out of the Hall, and when the tellers were counting he counter-marching instead of marching—

Mr. TAYLOR. Will the gentleman repeat his remark? I did not understand him.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I will state it again. You, sir, and every member upon this floor recollects upon that day, when we attempted to take a vote upon this resolution, my colleague came up missing in this Hall.

Mr. TAYLOR. What resolution?

Mr. GIDDINGS. I mean the resolution welcoming Governor Kossuth to a seat upon this floor.

Mr. TAYLOR. I voted against it. If the gentleman says I did not, he misrepresents me most grossly.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Let me tell my colleague, that my eyes and those of others were upon him while we were in committee, where no vote was recorded, and engaged in an endeavor to break up the committee by faction, by disorganizing, by revolutionary measures; and refused to show himself upon the vote, when the roll of members was called. This is what I mean to say. I did not intend to say, that in the House, where a record was kept, my colleague failed to vote. No, sir; it was to delay, to break up the committee, and prevent by factious measures the passage of that resolution, that my colleague failed to march forward, but counter-marched out of the Hall, instead of marching between the tellers. It gives me pain to allude to this matter. But he is a representative of the State of Ohio, and I felt that the dignity of my State was compromised by her representative upon this floor becoming factious and disorderly, to prevent the passage of that resolution. I felt it deeply, and it was no part of my intention ever to have named it, had not my colleague charged me with maliciously misrepresenting him on a subject of comparatively no importance. I should have never named it, but for the reason that it would do neither him, nor myself, nor any other person any good.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not know that I distinctly understood the remarks of my colleague, [Mr. GIDDINGS.] Do I understand him to say, or to insinuate, that those of his colleagues who voted in the minority upon the Kossuth resolution, engaged in a factious movement to defeat in this House the passage of the resolution?

Mr. GIDDINGS. My colleague could not have listened. When he calls upon me and attacks me, I will reply.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not attack my colleague.

Mr. GIDDINGS. If he never attacks me, I shall never assail him.

Mr. CAMPBELL. When it is necessary for my own defence I will unquestionably do it. I do not propose to do it at this time. All I wish to do is this, to prevent my colleague or any other member of this House from placing that minority in a false position. I voted, then, against the raising of a committee to send for Kossuth throughout, as will be seen by reference to the Journals. I do not regret having done so; and I desire to say now, with a view of correcting the misrepresentation which has gone abroad in reference to my own course, that I invariably voted to keep up a quorum, and refused to join in what has been termed the "factious opposition;" and I call upon gentlemen who voted with me to attest the fact, that throughout all the controversy I endeavored to bring this House to a direct vote. I was ready to "face the music" upon that question, as I hope I ever shall be, on all questions.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I am very glad to give my colleague an opportunity to set himself right, but really I cannot see the pertinency of the gentleman's throwing his head in between me and my colleague, [Mr. TAYLOR.] [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. I just entered the Hall and understood my colleague to say that his State had been degraded by the votes of his colleagues who acted with the minority on the Kossuth resolution. I wished to understand him on this point only, and intend to take no part in the "private fight" between my two colleagues, [Messrs. GIDDINGS and TAYLOR.]

Mr. GIDDINGS. It is very important for a gentleman to keep himself right in this Hall and in these days.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is very important, too, to keep others from putting him wrong.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I said that I never should have referred to the dodgings of my colleague [Mr. TAYLOR] in this matter if he had not assailed me as he did. I know, as I was remarking, that one of the first lessons in the military school was—if I recollect aright, but it is a good many years since I served as an officer or a soldier—facing to the right, to the left, and to the right-about, and I thought that my colleague was a little too rapid in that kind of facing about, [laughter,] yet I had no intention to speak of it, and now ask pardon of the committee for having detained them thus long on this point. But there was another remark of my colleague's that looks a little frightfully. [Laughter.] He says:

"Sir, I would say to him, that it is equally necessary for politicians to have honesty, and to speak the truth. And now, Mr. Chairman, let me ask you, and honorable gentlemen on this floor, with what grace or propriety he dares?"

Coffee and pistols, sir, for two if you please. [Laughter.] "He dares!"—Mr. Chairman, I hardly like to repeat the words that follow. Why, does my colleague really suppose that I have sat here for so many years in this Hall and do not dare to speak the truth, no matter when it comes or who it affects? The gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] had a shot at me the other day. Well, I love to contend with slaveholders; there is something generous, and noble, and frank about them; but a dough-face—hands off. [Great laughter.] I repeat again that when my colleague uses this sort of language, that I have willfully and knowingly and maliciously misrepresented him, he is taking a liberty that he is not authorized to take. I had never, myself, entertained the idea that it was an object with me to assail him. [Laughter.] Let me say to the House and to the world, that this killing flies with a bodkin is no very big business. [Renewed laughter.] It is an amusement that may do well for children, but it belongs not to statesmen, and now I have said all I wish to say upon that point.

I desire to say a word, and only a word, upon the subject immediately before us—in regard to the payment of this Mexican indemnity. I had prepared an amendment, which has been taken from my desk since I rose to speak, providing that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury or of the Secretary of State—just as gentlemen choose, for I wish not to enter into the controversy upon that point—to pay over to the authorized agent of Mexico the amount of money due to her, if such authorized agent shall request it, in this city or in New York, without further hesitation or delay. That is the substance of my amendment, if I recollect it aright, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JOHNSON] has, I believe, presented one nearly like it. It seems to me that it is due to our Government that this money shall be forthcoming in such manner as to Mexico shall be most acceptable. It is a treaty stipulation, and if—as has been stated in this Hall and in the newspapers of the country—she wishes the payment of this money in the city of Washington or New York, let her have it. I am not disposed to put it in the hands of any bankers, or speculators, or stock-jobbers, to enable them to speculate on the Government of Mexico, by purchasing up her bonds, as has been alluded to here to-day.

One word, before I go further, in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] who spoke of a contract, and also in reply to the communication which was read this morning. Who has entered into a contract? Have we authorized any officer of this Government to do it? Not at all. And not only so, but the parties who, it is said, have contracted for the payment of this money, tell us, in the communication which we received to-day, that they no longer regard themselves in the light of contractors. If, therefore, the Secretary of State has entered into a contract—which he was never authorized to do—his negotiations are already rendered obsolete by the failure of the Government to act at the last session; he is released from the contract by this communication, and we are at liberty to take up the subject as an original proposition, without embarrassing the Secretary of State, or counter-acting any of his negotiations whatever. In this state of facts, it is urged that the Mexican Government will allow us one per cent. more than these bankers propose, to have the money paid over here rather than in Mexico; yet I would not take that amount from the Mexican Government under the present existing circumstances. I would not take one dollar; but I would meet the obligation of this nation as it stands, promptly, and let Mexico, if she chooses, have the money here in this city or in New York, or, if she chooses, I would allow the Government to make arrangements to pay it over in the city of Mexico. That I understand to be the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON,] and for that I am prepared to vote. These speculators say that they can make nothing out of this payment, and we do not want to put anything into their pockets. We wish to have no advantage taken of the Government of Mexico, and therefore let her have the money here.

Let me say to those gentlemen who were not here during the discussion on this subject at the last session of Congress, that it was then stated that these bankers go to Mexico and sell their bills for specie, and then purchase up Mexican bonds at a discount of twenty to twenty-five per cent. I do not know that it is so, but it was so stated. Now, I would avoid all that. Let Mexico have her money, and have it without discount and without subtracting from the original sum.

Mr. TAYLOR. It is with some little regret that I find myself called upon by the unexpected attack of my colleague [Mr. GIDDINGS] who has just sat down, to address the committee at this time. There is a bill of very great importance before us which I am anxious to see passed, and I will not delay its passage by any unnecessary discussion. With reference to this bill, I concur in the main in the views which have been presented by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS,] and other gentlemen who have addressed the committee in favor of its passage.

I regret that my colleague should have thought proper to make this unprovoked attack upon me. He has waited until the 20th of the month to respond to what I said upon the 2d. I had reason at that time—as I will show the committee—to believe that what I then said was true, and that my colleague intended to misrepresent me, by making a false allegation. I have listened to him this morning, with some attention, to see if he would put himself right before the country, for there is no man in this House, or out of it, who, when he finds himself in error, will more readily admit it than myself, and I am ever ready to do all that is proper towards those whom I may have improperly accused. But I wish to state to this committee, and to the country, what I said upon the 2d of January, that my colleague from the Ash-tabula district, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] who has always been opposed to me since we have been together in this House, during the last four years, did have read at the Clerk's desk a series of resolutions which were offered by Mr. Cummings, of Ohio, who was then my colleague, and he charged me in the debate with voting for that series of resolutions, when no direct vote was ever taken upon them, but simply a vote to suspend the rules for their introduction. I went to my colleague and asked him to correct the mistake, stating to him that he had done me very great injustice. I supposed that he would correct it in his published speech, but he published next morning the resolutions sent in to us from the Senate congratulating the people of France on their change of government, which I did vote for, but which he did not cause to be read. My colleague, in causing that series of resolutions offered by Mr. Cummings to be read, and charging me with having voted directly for them, did accuse me of that which he knew to be untrue.

Now, I should feel myself degraded if I were willfully to misrepresent a man, however high and honorable, or low his position might be, or if I should willfully misrepresent a member upon this floor. As to my colleague's remarks in regard to myself,

"They pass by me as the idle wind."

I should degrade myself by accusing that gentleman, or any other, with voting directly for a proposition on this floor when I knew that he did not do it. My colleague had the Congressional Globe before him, and knew that I had not voted directly for these resolutions; and yet he accused me of having done it, and sent the resolution to the Clerk's desk to be read; and when I asked him to allow me to explain what I had voted for, he declined to do it.

Now, as to my action in regard to the proceedings had in this House, in relation to Louis Kossuth. I voted to welcome Louis Kossuth to this country. I voted for the resolutions of Congress which authorized his being taken on board of one of our national ships, and brought to this country as a man seeking an asylum in our glorious and free land. I rejoiced to know that the people of the United States sympathized with the Hungarian exiles then in Turkey, and from the best information I could derive at the time, I united in the resolutions empowering our Government to give Kossuth and his companions in captivity a free passage to this country as emigrants, who desired to live under the glorious stars and stripes of our nation. But when Kossuth came here, and was evidently misled and deceived by men high in the estimation of the country, into the belief that we had intended by our action to signify our readiness to intervene in European affairs, I deemed it my duty, as a representative of the people, to say to him that all we intended was, "You may come on to this great, beautiful platform of ours, become a naturalized citizen if you choose, enjoy our hospitality, live with us under our laws and be protected against all the powers of the earth, in the possession of those liberties which I trust we shall ever enjoy." I therefore voted against the resolution of my colleague [Mr. CARTTER] for the appointment of a committee to introduce him into this Hall, to teach us republicanism and our duty to our constituents. It was with me a matter of deliberate judgment, seeing that out of my twenty-one colleagues, only three concurred with me, and vote against the proposition.

Sir, I sympathize with Louis Kossuth, as a man who had struggled for the liberties of his country; I admired his talents and his genius; I read his orations, beautiful as they were, with as much admiration and delight as anybody; but I studied his character and found that it was not free from many blemishes. In his own country his courage has been questioned, and it has been said that through his indecision, the liberties of Hungary were sacrificed. Pulszky, edited Max Scheflinger's "War in Hungary"—1848 and 1849—in which it is stated, that, "His [Kossuth's] indecision was the ruin of himself and Hungary." He was never in a battle. He resigned his governorship, placed all the power in the hands of Görgey, when he knew, or ought to have known, that he was a traitor, and fled to Turkey. Thence he was brought to this country as an exile seeking an asylum, and I could not see the necessity of introducing him into the Hall of the representatives of the people, to lecture us upon our duty, and teach us whether we ought to interfere in quarrels between European nations or not.

I voted against it, and I rejoice in it. And the good sense of the people of the whole country sustain me in the opinion, that we ought not to have brought him into this House, or given any countenance to his doctrines. But I will say, further, that it is my firm belief, that if it had not been for the opposition made in the Senate of the United States, and the opposition made in this Hall—an opposition highly respectable, composed of nearly one third of the members of the Senate and about one third of this House,—I say if it had not been for that opposition, I firmly believe that we should have witnessed a scene in this Hall—here in the Capitol of the United States, similar to that on his introduction to the Legislature in Harrisburg. But such was the opposition manifested in this Hall, as well as in the Senate, that I understood the committee appointed to wait upon him advised him not to make such a speech as he had expected to deliver to this House. The opposition which I gave was this: I sat here and gave my vote whenever I considered it necessary to carry out what I conceived to be right, for the good of the country, and when gentlemen saw fit to call questions upon little motions of no importance, I did not choose to pass between the tellers every fifteen minutes. I want to know if it is the duty of my colleague from the Ashtabula district [Mr. GIDDINGS] to call me to an account upon this floor? I ask him if he can stand up here and say that he never missed a vote upon any question? If he does not say that, and he cannot, why does he come here and censure other gentlemen?

It is well known to this committee that I very rarely trouble them with remarks upon any question, but I desire to say something upon this, because I have been censured by a portion of the newspapers of the country for my course in relation to this question. It has been intimated that the gentleman who proposed the resolution inviting Louis Kossuth to this Hall and welcoming him to the House of Representatives, instigated the editor of the abolition paper of this city—the editor of the National Era—to censure the three gentlemen, my colleagues, who had the firmness to vote with me against this resolution, as well as myself. If I am wrong, I hope the gentleman will correct me.

Mr. CARTTER. I will correct my colleague.

Mr. TAYLOR. I understood that he instigated that editor to notice those gentlemen as misrepresenting their constituents. I will give way for the gentleman, but I hope he will answer the question whether it is true or not, by "yes" or "no."

Mr. CARTTER. I will answer the gentleman. There is not a word of truth in it. Now I demand from the gentleman where he got his information?

Mr. TAYLOR. My colleague [Mr. BARRERE] gave me the information.

Mr. CARTTER. I want the gentleman to answer the question. I never made any such intimation to any one.

Mr. BARRERE. I understood my colleague [Mr. HUNTER] to say that that gentleman [Mr. CARTTER] had told the editor of the National Era that I had misrepresented my district in my course on the Kossuth resolution.

Mr. HUNTER. I am much surprised that my name should be drawn into any discussion whatever in relation to this question. If my colleague from the Highland district [Mr. BARRERE] thinks that I told him that my colleague from the Wooster district [Mr. CARTTER] told the editor of the National Era that any of my colleagues upon my right or left misrepresent their constituents, I desire to state that I said no such thing. I do not suppose any of my colleagues misrepresent the wishes of their constituents. I will tell the committee what I did say. I do not blame my colleague for misrepresenting me, but he is certainly mistaken. A copy of the National Era was lying before me, when I remarked, not that any of my colleagues misrepresented their constituents, but that I had heard my colleague [Mr. CARTTER] say in the presence of the editor of the National Era that my colleague [Mr. BARRERE] represented but about one third of the people of his district.

Mr. CARTTER. I said he was elected by about one third of the voters in his district.

Mr. HUNTER. Well, I remarked that I had heard my colleague [Mr. CARTTER] say that the gentleman from the Highland district [Mr. BARRERE] was elected by about one third of his district. I made this remark, but it applied to nothing further—I said nothing further. I never heard my colleague say that he misrepresented his constituents. But I did go on to say that for this remark the editor of the Era might have inferred that he misrepresented his constituents.

Mr. BARRERE. I will state, that having heard that I had been attacked in the National Era, I called upon my colleague [Mr. HUNTER] and asked him if he had a copy of the paper. I do not recollect that there was a word said about my election; and really I thought it was doing a pretty good business that I was elected at all. [Laughter.] I understood him to say, that in conversation with Mr. CARTTER, Mr. C. had told him that I was misrepresenting the sentiment of my district upon that subject. I then understood it, and I have referred to it many times since, that there was such an understanding as has been alluded to by my colleague [Mr. TAYLOR] between my colleague who introduced that resolution [Mr. CARTTER] and the editor of the Era. I may have been mistaken, but I certainly gathered this impression from his remarks.

If my colleague says that I was elected by one third of my district, he is mistaken. It is true that the vote by which I was elected was a small one, but it was larger than one third or one half of the voters of the district.

While I am up—if my colleague will allow me—I desire to say one word in reference to another matter. I understand my colleague from the northern district [Mr. GIDDINGS] to charge that all those who voted with us in the negative upon that resolution were factious.

Mr. CARTTER. Will the gentleman allow me to make a single remark? I simply desire to disclaim any knowledge of any attacks upon any member of the Ohio delegation by the editor of the National Era. I do not take the paper, and I have read no article upon the subject.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Will my colleague allow me?

Mr. TAYLOR. I do not wish to lose the floor. I give way only to my colleague on my left, [Mr. BARRERE.]

Mr. GIDDINGS. I will not occupy the floor for a minute. The gentleman says he understood me as making the charge of faction upon all who voted in the negative upon the resolution. I desire to say that I included in that charge none except my colleague from the Scioto district, [Mr. TAYLOR.]

Mr. TAYLOR. I understand that I yield no longer, except to the gentleman upon my left, [Mr. BARRERE.]

Mr. BARRERE. I was going on to say that I heard my colleague from the Ashtabula district [Mr. GIDDINGS] make the charge against all in this House who opposed this resolution as factious.

Mr. GIDDINGS. The gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. BARRERE. I understood him to say that my colleague [Mr. TAYLOR] was a general, and had marched and countermarched; and as I was one who took that course, which brought such shame and mortification to that gentleman—disgrace upon Ohio, in his opinion—I supposed I was, of course, included in the charge. I was in my seat when most of the votes were taken upon that resolution, but upon several occasions I did not vote. For although I was not much of a parliamentarian, and although I had not had much experience in this House, nor in any other legislative body, yet I was constrained to believe that that resolution was brought before this House by a breach of our own rules and by a breach of the parliamentary law by which we are governed. And I felt that it was due to vindicate our rules by the defeat of that resolution, if we could defeat it, aside from all considerations of the merits of the resolution itself. I was opposed to the resolution upon principle, and voted against it. I was willing to bring it to a direct vote in the House, and vote against it; but inasmuch as, in my opinion, the rules of the House had been broken down, I thought I was justified in acting with the minority in every legitimate mode allowed by the rules in order to prevent the resolution from passing, if I could.

I had hoped that this Kossuth business was done with. But it seems it has been brought up again to-day, and I am glad to avail myself of my colleague's courtesy to place myself right. From the information I have received from my district, so far from misrepresenting the sentiment of my district upon this question, I have acted in strict accordance with the sentiment of all parties in that district; for I do not represent any particular party in that district. I was elected by all three parties. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAYLOR. When I referred to the four members from Ohio who took an independent position upon this question, it was not with the desire of bringing about this colloquy. But I am glad it has been brought about. I now only wish to refer to the fact that my colleague, [Mr. GUDINGS,] who was so sensitive upon my vote upon questions of adjournment, and little questions of no importance, has chosen to centre all his opposition and censure upon me. Why, I do not know. I have always treated him respectfully and kindly, and never desired to treat him in any other way. But there is something deeper about this matter yet to come.

But I wish to say here, that from the first of this proceeding in regard to the great Hungarian, I saw that many gentlemen in this country were greatly deceived. Those who styled themselves Abolitionists, Liberty men, Free-Soilers, and Barn-burners—or as they now wish to show themselves, Free Democrats—were eager to take him in hand, and make the most capital out of him they could. And if they could blind and hoodwink Hunker Democrats, and through this Kossuth fever and excitement to strike a blow at the negro slavery of the South, do that covertly and effectually. That is the question, and why did not gentlemen see it? Sir, I saw it and know it. You find men belonging to that nefarious faction which the great Kentucky statesman—no, the great American statesman—Henry Clay, whose voice we probably shall never hear in either of these Halls again, has pronounced—if not in words, substantially—a curse upon the country, shuffling about, tariff men and free-trade men alternatively, as you have seen upon this floor when important questions have been brought up, in order to conciliate Southern Democrats, and to hoodwink and blind them against the nefarious crusade against their domestic institutions. And conservative Northern men, who stood up to the compromise measures, warned you against it. Sir, I should not be surprised at this coming presidential election, to find distinguished gentlemen calling themselves Democrats in the South, shaking hands and burying the past in oblivion, and clasping to their arms these Liberty men and Abolitionists, for the sake of what, sir? To elect some one to the Presidency of the United States—an office which should never be sought for, but always filled by the free and independent choice of the whole people, without reference to slavery or abolition. I take no pleasure in saying here, that since the passage of the compromise measures of the last Congress, as they were called, especially the fugitive slave law, and for all of which I voted—that I have been the object of attack from every quarter by this chameleon-like party, calling themselves Free Democrats. Look at it, gentlemen; see a member comes here and makes a false allegation about a colleague, and as he said he did not consider me of any moment, he struck first at me, and then at my friend from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY,] and my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE,] in declaring in this House that we voted for a series of resolutions in relation to the French and Italian revolutions, which were submitted to the House for a direct vote on their merits. Sir, it is a small way to get out of such a difficulty, for a gentleman to rise and say he intended nothing, when he sent to the Clerk's desk a series of resolutions which never came up for a final vote on their merits, in this House, and that I never voted for—causing them to be read by the Clerk, and alleging that I had voted directly for them; and now he says he was mistaken, after nearly three weeks have elapsed, when he knew at the time that he was wrong.

Mr. Chairman, it behooves the people of this country to keep an eye upon the present excitement. Every day is evolving some new facts. The establishment of an Abolition paper in New York under the auspices of the Hungarian coöperators of Kossuth, should open your eyes to the fact that the Abolitionists have been endeavoring to make political capital out of that great man's fame. I yield to no man in this House or country in sympathy with the great struggle for liberty in Hungary. My heart was with them, and my hand shall be with them so far as I am able; but I will never yield the sacredness of republican principles in my own country at the dictation of any foreigner, no matter how high I esteem him, and I will never give my vote in this House, to show to a foreign missionary, of liberty if you please, a higher honor than you or any man in this House would show to any living American citizen. If General Jackson should rise to-morrow—if Mr. Madison were to come among us—if any of the departed sages of the Revolution were to rise up from the dead, you would not bring them here with a committee of five and hear their response as you did Kossuth's, the eminent Hungarian, who is now visiting our land; and hence my opposition. I could not place him upon an equality with Lafayette. Lafayette came to us and offered us his life, his fortune, and his sacred honor; and during the seven years' war of our Revolution, helped to work out our glorious independence. I did not wish to do anything that looked like elevating Kossuth in the same estimation in which we held Lafayette, and I shall never cease to rejoice that I had the independence to resist the tumultuous ocean-current of popular feeling, and to stand by what I believed to be right.

Sir, I hope that the gentleman's explanation this morning, if he thinks himself aggrieved, will not be slumbering for three weeks. If I did him any injustice, I did not intend it; and if he says now he did not mean to do me any injustice I forgive him, but his course led to my impression. He had read resolutions for which I never voted, alleging that I did vote for them, and caused to be published those for which I voted without explanation. In that, I think he did me a great injustice. I hope it will cease to be a subject of future attack.

I will now follow the example of my colleague, and say something about the bill—I suppose it is in order. It is in order to travel all over creation in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I say, sir, in relation to the bill before the committee, that I think this House ought to pass it. That if there is any information wanted from the Secretary of State, ample time will be afforded to investigate it; but my colleague [Mr. DISNEY] I think has failed to inform the House, when he speaks of charges made in the newspapers in this city and elsewhere, with regard to the wishes of Mexico upon the subject. We have no official information, as I understand it, that Mexico desires any other mode of payment than that which we have adopted, and for that reason, sir, and that the Committee of Ways and Means say this appropriation is absolutely necessary now, I think we ought to rise, report this bill to the House, and have it put upon its passage.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. The House is doubtless weary of this matter of personal explanation. I now rise merely for the purpose of saying that I did not design to interfere in any way whatever with—

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman yield for a motion that the committee rise?

[Cries of "Oh, No!" "No!" "No!"]

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not want the committee to rise now, and promise to be brief. I desire to fix up this personal matter now, in order not to interrupt the public business to-morrow. I regret, as one of the representatives from the State of Ohio, that there should have been any occasion for the scene which has been presented to the committee this morning, and I do not exactly see the necessity of making these personal explanations here. I have no personal explanation to make to any colleague of mine for any vote I give upon this floor.

[A message from the President of the United States was here received at the hands of MILLARD P. FILLMORE, Esq., his Private Secretary.]

Mr. C., (continuing.) I owe no explanation to my colleagues for my vote; I do not acknowledge their right to ask any account of me for what I do here, and I will give them none if demanded. I hold myself amenable to my constituents, and to them alone, for my action. A great deal has been said, Mr. Chairman, in relation to what has appeared in certain political newspapers in regard to our votes upon the Kossuth resolutions. I have great regard for the political press of the country. And I give them full and entire privilege to comment upon my votes just as they please. I shall be answerable for my stewardship to those who have sent me here. I shall go home with the record I have presented upon the proposition to send out a committee for Louis Kossuth, and if I cannot defend myself before the voters of my district, I am willing to fall.

It seems to me there has been an effort to connect improperly this matter of the reception of Kossuth with what are called the free-soil issues, which have been presented. Now, sir, it is very far from my purpose to drag in now, or at any improper time, this vexed question of slavery. I shall not do so, but it becomes necessary that I should make a remark or two in this connection in relation to my course upon that Kossuth resolution. Something has been said during the discussion upon this bill, now before the committee, in regard to outside whispering, lobby movements, and newspaper articles. Now, sir, I was appealed to during the progress of the discussion of the Kossuth resolution by members, as well as "outsiders," to evince my devotion to free-soil by supporting the resolution. When we had that question before us during the Thirty-first Congress—when these slavery issues were really tried—it will be found that I made no crooked marks; and I had supposed myself to be regarded as among the sound ones by my colleague from the northern district. I have been appealed to to know why it was, in that vote upon the Kossuth resolution, I was found with Southern members. I will tell you, Mr. Chairman. It is because when a great principle is involved, I vote upon principle, and know no North, no South, no East, and no West. Sir, I would scorn myself were I compelled to return to my constituents with no other reason to give them for my vote on the Kossuth resolution, or any other proposition, than that a particular man or set of men voted for or against it. Do gentlemen suppose—does any newspaper editor suppose—does any lobby member, who may prowl around us, taking members by the button when a question is about to be voted upon, suppose that when I come to record my vote, representing as I do one hundred thousand freemen, that I am to be controlled by the fact that a Southern member may vote this way, or a Northern member that way? If there are any members in the Hall who follow their "file leaders," and give their votes because they find Northern men voting one way and Southern men another, let it be known now, if it has not yet been discovered, that I am not among that number, and whilst I preserve my self-respect and a regard for my constituents, never will be.

In relation to the Kossuth question, I have no concealments to make; and upon a proper occasion, when the great question of intervention, which has been proposed by him comes up for discussion, I will lay before the House, if I have an opportunity, my opinions upon it. The question which was presented to the House upon the occasion which has been referred to by the gentleman, was as to the manner, as to the form, in which he should be received into this Hall. I looked upon the record to see what were the precedents, and found there was no instance in the history of the country, except that of Lafayette, who had periled everything for this nation's liberties, in which a committee had been appointed. No such action as the resolution proposed had ever been taken to compliment any distinguished foreigner, or to confer honor even upon those heroes of our own country who had fought and bled for our people's rights. The highest honor that had ever been conferred upon any statesman or patriot of this or any other land was simply to vote him the privileges of this Hall. When the resolution of my colleague [Mr. CARTER] was introduced, it will be remembered (and the record shows the fact) that I proposed such a modification as would give the distinguished Hungarian, for whom no person's admiration exceeds my own, the privilege of a seat here. I had seen nothing in the history of this Louis Kossuth, able a man as I deemed him to be, powerful in intellect as he has proved himself, great in genius, great in patriotism, great in the love of liberty, as the whole world acknowledges he is, which I thought required us to go further than we had gone for the purpose of complimenting the distinguished men of our own land, who had struggled in council, fought for and bled upon the battle-field for the very liberties we now enjoy. The gentlemen upon the other side refused to accept this modification, which would have enabled us to have brought Kossuth into a privileged seat in this Hall by unanimous consent. When he refused that, and insisted upon giving compliments that had never before been given to any man of this or any other country—when it was thus determined that this Hall should be converted into a sort of parade ground, to show off a foreigner who came to us announcing that he wants none of our compliments, but wished to turn our Government from that policy recommended by our patriot fathers, and the pursuit of which had led us to our present national glory,—I determined, in the representation which I should give for my constituents, to vote against it, and I did so. So far as relates to what are termed the “factious movement” to which my colleague [Mr. GIDDINGS] alluded, I understood him to charge that his State had been degraded by the vote which had been given by his colleagues with the minority upon this question. That is the reason I sought to make an explanation. I did not design to interfere in the private and personal affairs between him and my other colleague, [Mr. TAYLOR,] which I regret very much has taken place. I did not design to assail my colleague from the northern district, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] and shall never do so, unless it becomes necessary in my own defence; and he knows full well, that whenever he is disposed to present such an occasion, I am not the man to shrink from the responsibility or the consequences.

During the progress of the proceedings upon this Kossuth resolution, I voted always, when we were in committee, for the purpose of making a quorum, because I wished to bring the House to a direct vote, in order that I might vote with that minority, whether Northern or Southern, Eastern or Western, and thereby give to letter-writers, newspaper editors, and perhaps politicians at home, who may desire political promotion, an opportunity of assailing me for it, should they think proper to do it. I voted with them upon a principle, and wherever a principle is involved, I shall not inquire who votes with, or who votes against me. In relation to the other questions incidentally connected with this Kossuth reception, I do not propose now to say anything. It has been charged that certain of my colleagues have, by their votes, misrepresented their constituents. I will leave each one to take care of himself, knowing that all are competent to that task. They are all capable of doing that upon the other side of the House as well as upon this. I will endeavor to take care of myself without their aid, or the aid of any one else here. So far as the views of my constituents are concerned, this is a matter of neither interest to my colleagues, nor to those who voted with or against me upon the proposition. I have only to say, if there is any person in this House who cares to know it; that my constituents, let the fate of Kossuth and Hungary be what it may, intend to stand firmly and resolutely by the policy of Washington and Jefferson, and the wise men who have gone before us. That is the sentiment of my constituents as far as I have been enabled to learn it; and if there was anything covered up by that resolution giving extraordinary compliments to Louis Kossuth, by which it was intended that the impression should be made upon this country, or any other, that we are prepared to involve this country in almost endless European wars, I feel now more authorized than I did when I gave the vote to say, that my constituents are against it. Deeply as they sympathize with the man, ardently as they advocate the great principles of “equal rights,” for which he is said to contend, and anxious as they may be to have republican institutions extended all over the world, yet they are not prepared to involve this country in those struggles which must bring darkness and despair upon our own happy land. They are not prepared to authorize a vote in this House or elsewhere, that will bring that dark and gloomy hour upon us, when, through entanglements with foreign nations and fierce and bloody wars with European powers, our own proud and glorious Republic shall be numbered with the nations of the earth that have been, but are not. I have now, Mr. Chairman, said all I designed to say, until a proper occasion arises for a discussion of the policy to be pursued by us in our future intercourse with other nations.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I wish to reply a word to that portion of my colleague's remarks, in which he charges me with delaying to answer his charge.

Mr. Chairman, you will bear witness to the solicitude with which I appealed to you on the day of my colleague's attack, to give me the floor. In consequence of this personal assault which he had made upon me, so far from a desire to refrain answering my colleague, I strove for the floor the very instant he closed his remarks. I tried nearly the whole day to obtain the floor, and I went to the Chairman and told him that I was personally assailed by my colleague, and solicited him to give me an opportunity to reply. He, however, felt it his duty—and for it I certainly cast no censure upon him—to give the floor to others upon that day and the day following. I made the effort when we went again into committee—and we have been in committee but once since—but was unsuccessful. I have been successful to-day, and I want my colleague to understand, that his assaults are not outlawed, and that when a man assails me personally in this Hall, charging me with malicious misrepresentation, I will meet him on the first occasion.

My colleague, at the close of his remarks, said, if I should say that I did not intentionally and willfully misrepresent him, he would withdraw what he had said. The very first remark I made after I stated the facts was, that I was not conscious those resolutions had been amended. I told him so in the presence of the House, of the committee, and the country; and now, sir, I shall not repeat it. I have generally been accustomed, amongst gentlemen, to have my word taken when I speak it once. So much for that.

Again: my colleague said, if I had set this matter right he should have found no fault, and that he now rises as much to defend the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY,] the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, as himself, and I want the ear of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BAYLY. What did the gentleman say?

Mr. GIDDINGS. I say that my colleague said, he now rises more to protect the gentleman from Virginia, than to vindicate himself, or to that effect, as I understood him. Now the gentleman from Virginia and myself had a conversation in regard to this matter, and he appeared perfectly satisfied. At no time has he intimated any dissatisfaction. He does not hesitate to speak his views, and I in return tell him mine. I do not think he will feel under particular obligations to my colleague for defending him. He generally speaks for himself, and is able to inform the House if he felt aggrieved under the remarks I made. I know he does not feel aggrieved in the least.

The gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE,] at whom my remarks were aimed more than at my colleague, after searching and searching, and finding that the resolutions were amended, came and told me they were amended. I then said to the gentleman that I would, in my published remarks, see that the resolution was inserted as amended, and as it was adopted. He declared himself perfectly satisfied. Soon after my colleague came around to my desk, and told me that Mr. VENABLE had told him the resolutions were amended.

Mr. TAYLOR. I did not so state. I went to the gentleman, when I found these resolutions had been sent to the Clerk's desk. He had before him the Congressional Globe, which I could not then get; and he then said “that Mr. VENABLE told him there was a mistake about the matter—that neither of us had voted for the resolutions which were read.” When I complained to him of his misrepresenting me, by alleging that I voted for a series of resolutions when I had not done so, he said “he would correct it in the report;” but how did he correct it? He published the resolutions in regard to France—entirely different ones—and not Cummings's resolutions as amended, but those sent to us from the Senate. I did not vote upon Cummings's resolutions. The vote was never taken upon them nor were they amended. Now, the gentleman thinks they were amended. I do not believe they ever were amended. The Senate resolutions superseded them.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I have no doubt my colleague represents this matter as he understands it. For myself, I do not undertake to say how he understood it, but I say that the gentleman came to me, and as I understood him, stated what I have said, and I then told him, that I had corrected it by requesting the Reporters to report the resolutions as adopted, and for which he voted, and I then understood him to be entirely satisfied.

Mr. TAYLOR. I did not express any satisfaction about it.

Mr. GIDDINGS. My colleague then did not cast any imputation upon me, of having misrepresented him, or of having intended to misrepresent him; but, upon the contrary, gave me to understand that he was perfectly satisfied. One word more in regard to others of my colleagues, [Mr. BARRERE and Mr. CAMPBELL,] I had no intention of alluding to them in any manner whatever. And I will say here, that not a man of the entire generation of members with whom I served in this Hall, and who have now passed away, nor one of those men holding a seat here, was ever personally assailed by me, except in self-defence; nor while I hold a seat here shall any member upon this floor wantonly charge me with malicious falsehood and escape unscathed.

One word as to the speech of my colleague about Kossuth and slavery. Is this the place and this the occasion for my colleague to rise and make a speech in regard to slavery—to be eternally agitating that agitating subject? [Laughter.] Why, here I call upon him to correct a misrepresentation, and he commences his speech with slavery. [Laughter.] Let me tell him and this committee, this question of slavery is one which, from the time I first took my seat in this Hall, I have not hesitated to discuss upon all proper occasions. When I do hesitate to meet it, upon all such occasions, let my right arm drop from its socket, but let me protest against these agitators. [Laughter.] Why, you cannot say anything in regard to Kossuth and about Hungary, or about any other subject, but there are men upon this floor who will see the ghost of slavery, abolition, free-soil, or something, else rising up before them; and at it they will go wind-mill fashion, waging war against it. What provocation has my colleague to come out and assail the Free-Soil party, the Abolitionists, or the public press? Why, does not the public sentiment of our State stare him in the face and point him to a speedy political grave to which it will consign the man who tramples upon the popular sentiment of the day? I very much apprehend, when the proper occasion arrives, these agitators will force me into a speech upon this question of slavery, [laughter,] and then let me tell you, that the gentleman will be as silent and dumb as an adder. You will not coax him into a reply or a speech when I shall come forward and in a legitimate course of argument assail the positions he has so long occupied; but here, out of time, out of place, and out of order, he pitches into it, as the saying is out West, with a perfect looseness. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Does the gentleman from Ashtabula [Mr. GIDDINGS] yield the floor to his first colleague? [Mr. TAYLOR.]

Mr. OLDS. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. TAYLOR. I do not mean to follow the example of the gentleman—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] rises to a point of order.

Mr. OLDS. My question of order is this—that no gentleman has a right to occupy the floor more than once. My other colleague [Mr. TAYLOR] rises to a personal explanation and occupies the floor for half an hour, and if this thing is to go on there will be no end to it. I want the floor for five minutes for personal explanation.

Mr. CAMPBELL. In order to relieve my colleague, however, I will simply say, as this is a controversy between my two colleagues upon the right, [Messrs. GIDDINGS and TAYLOR,] I have myself nothing more to say. Having made a few remarks in respect to my personal connection in the matter, I yielded the floor to my furthest colleague, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] because he was connected with the controversy; and I had just now yielded the floor to my colleague from the Ross district, [Mr. TAYLOR,] I rise again to say that I yield the floor unconditionally.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] had yielded the floor to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] to make a personal explanation. Then he yielded it to another gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] for personal explanation. It is legitimate, in the opinion of the Chair, for one gentleman to yield the floor for a personal explanation; but it is not legitimate for him to yield it for the purpose of making a speech.

Mr. OLDS. I know I can hardly claim the attention of the committee at this late hour of the day. I do not propose to detain them five minutes.

I do not rise for the purpose of entering into this fight between my colleagues upon the other side of the House. I trust that when this committee shall again have under consideration the bounty land bill they will provide that these gentlemen shall have bounty land for services rendered the country, fighting in this buck-shot war. [Laughter.] My friend from the Scioto district, [Mr. TAYLOR,] being a wily politician, has made some insinuations at this time which I am called upon to notice, being from the same State. I propose to notice his great devotion to the names of General Jackson and James Madison. He made the remark, that if these illustrious dead should rise and appear before the American people, there would not be the same exertion to tender honors to them as in the case of Kossuth. Why has my friend from the Scioto district become so devotedly attached to the names of Madison and Jackson as this, that he places them among the great men of the country? The gentleman has been a party man—he has always given his allegiance as a party man; and when the illustrious Jackson was alive, and a candidate for the highest honors before the American people, he belonged to the party that carried the coffin hand-bills to blacken the name of that great man. Why does he rise now and place him before the American people as one of those to whom they will not pay honor before they would to the name of Kossuth? It is not to that remark particularly to which I wish to call the attention of the committee. I have observed that he is a party man. He knows the condition of his party now. He sees the handwriting upon the wall, and he knows full well what the interpretation of that handwriting is. Does he stand here for the purpose of giving information—

Mr. TAYLOR, (interposing.) Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? I will ask him if he was not opposed to Jackson, and if he did not at one time belong to the Whig party in Ohio?

Mr. OLDS, (resuming.) I will reply to the gentleman. I once belonged to the Whig party; but I have done works meet for repentance. Has my colleague changed his views relative to General Jackson and James Madison, as I have mine.

Sir, what I wish to call the attention of the committee at this time is this: the gentleman being a party man, and seeing the handwriting upon the wall, and knowing well the interpretation, wishes to speak upon this floor, not for the ears of members, but so that it will reach the ears of Southerners—men who will be called before a year shall have elapsed to vote for another presidential candidate. What is the insinuation of my colleague? It is, that these Northern fanatics—Free-Soilers and Abolitionists—are uniting with the Democracy for the purpose of getting the ascendancy in this country. How long is it since my friend from the Scioto district [Mr. TAYLOR] has eschewed all connection with abolitionism and free-soilism in Ohio? How long is it since his party has eschewed all connection of that kind? Has not his party, in Ohio, been united with every ism in the country? Did not his party unite with Anti-Masonry for the purpose of political ascendancy? Has not his party in Ohio for years perambulated that State, cajoled, coaxed, and courted Abolitionism and Free-Soilism, for the purpose of gaining the power of the State? Did they in their convention of the 3d July dare to come out and express any opinion upon the compromise measures, on one side or the other? No, sir. They did not dare do it: an important election was soon to come off. Free-Soil votes were necessary to their success. They evaded the question by merely saying the “compromise was not a Whig measure.” But in order to conciliate the Free-Soil vote of Ohio, what did they do? They nominated as one of their candidates for the supreme bench of the State, a man who declared in the convention that amended the constitution of our State, that office should not be bestowed upon or withheld from any man on account of the color of his skin, and that if there was a black man in his county qualified to discharge the duties of magistrate, and the people approved of him for that office, he had no objection to his filling it. They took this man as one of their candidates for the bench of the supreme court of Ohio, in order to conciliate the Free-Soil party. But the bait did not take. The Free-Soilers held their separate convention, and nominated a full ticket. What then, sir, did the gentleman’s party do?

Why it was said—though I do not make the charge upon this floor—that their candidates for State auditor and State treasurer bargained with the Free-Soil candidate to withdraw from the contest, so that they might get the Free-Soil vote. This I do know and here assert: just upon the eve of the election, and when it was too late for the Free-Soilers to call a new convention, the Whig candidate for treasurer of the State visited the neighborhood of the residence of the Free-Soil candidate, who shortly afterwards declined the nomination of the Free-Soil party. Upon this, the Central Committee of the Free-Soil party came out in a circular, in which they said that they would not direct the name of the Whig candidate to be printed upon their ticket; yet they should feel constrained to vote for him; and recommended the Free-Soilers to do likewise, because the nominating committee of the Free-Soil convention had, in their first report, named the Whig candidate as the Free-Soil candidate also. But now, when the election is over, and when the Democrats of Ohio have triumphed by ten thousand majority over the Whigs and Free-Soilers combined, and elected a clean Democratic ticket from end to end, now my friend from the Ross district [Mr. TAYLOR] rises on this floor and denounces the Free-Soil party, who are no longer of any use, and declares to the Democrats of the South that the Free-Soilers are in league with the Democrats of the North. The gentleman is a wily politician.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. Will my colleague give way for a single question?

Mr. OLDS. Certainly.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I do not undertake to say that some of the remarks of my colleague in relation to the Whig party of Ohio are not true. It is very true that the Whig party of that State have uniformly declared themselves opposed to the extension of slavery, &c.; but if I understand the current of the gentleman’s remarks, he desires to cast some sort of odium upon the Whig party for having taken that position. Now, I rise merely for the purpose of making an inquiry of the gentleman, as he is going over in detail the political proceedings of our State, and that is, whether it was not the Democratic party of Ohio who elected to the Senate of the United States the present senior Senator, Mr. CHASE? I put that question to my colleague for the purpose of showing that the Democratic party, as well as the Whig party, has been indulging in that way somewhat. [Laughter.]

Mr. OLDS. I am glad to have an opportunity to reply to that point, for it appears to me that there is a point there, and if the House will indulge me a moment, I will tell an anecdote in relation to it. The anecdote was told me by Colonel Powell, of Kentucky, now the Democratic Governor of that State. There was an old man away down in his neighborhood who was always a candidate for office, and when a candidate published long political essays to the country. His name was Jones, and he had been so long a candidate for office that they called him “Live-forever Jones.” One fine day he came to Colonel Powell and said: “Colonel, I have got a political essay that I wish to have your opinion upon.” The Colonel took it and read it through, and then remarked that it was very well written, but that he could see no point in it. “You cannot see any point in it?” said Jones; and then he took the essay and read it over paragraph by paragraph. Still the Colonel said that although it was very well written, excellent grammar, good rounded periods, still he could see no point in it. “Well,” said the old man, “that’s just what I want; now I’ve got my essay without any point; for when I make a point, they always get me on a point.” [A laugh.] It strikes me that my friend over the way has made a point, and I should not be surprised if I got him on that point. Now, who was the alternative offered to the Democrats when they elected Mr. CHASE to the United States Senate? Who was the candidate of the Whig party? Why, Tom Ewing—“Butcher Tom,” as he is called—was a candidate, and Tom Corwin was a candidate.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh no; he did not need to be a candidate, for he was then in the Senate of the United States, and his term had not expired.

Mr. OLDS. My friend is right: Mr. Corwin had already been rewarded, by an election by the Whigs and Free-Soilers of Ohio, in part payment of important services rendered his party in perambulating the Western Reserve, pretending to have a letter in his pocket from General Taylor to the Free-Soilers of Ohio; pledging the General to the maintenance of the Wilmot proviso, though he was never willing to show the letter. Such was the man who had been elected Senator by the Whigs, and Tom Ewing was no better; and the Democrats of Ohio, by a combination with the Free-Soilers, elected a man who, although a Free-Soiler, was a thorough, radical Democrat—right upon the tariff—right upon the currency—right upon all the great radical questions of the Democracy of Ohio, with the exception, perhaps, of this slavery question. There was, perhaps, one point on which he may have differed from the Democrats of Ohio, but being right on all others, what were the Democrats to do? Were they to sit still and see “Butcher Tom” sent to the Senate rather than vote for Mr. CHASE, who is a thorough, radical Democrat upon all questions but upon the question of slavery? But pray, who is the junior Senator from the State of Ohio [Mr. WADE] who was elected last winter by a combination of the Whigs and Free-Soilers? Does he not go the same length as Mr. CHASE upon the slavery question? But such has been the state of things in Ohio, that the Free-Soil party have held the balance of power, and both parties have been obliged to coalesce with them.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I want to know of my colleague, whether he intends publicly before the nation to declare, that both parties are under the control of, and obligations to, the Free-Soilers? [Laughter.]

Mr. OLDS. That is the very point at which I was about to arrive, and the very point that my friend from the Ross district [Mr. TAYLOR] is trying to avoid now, by severing the connection between the Whigs and Free-Soilers. Yes, the Free-Soilers have held the control of the State elections. The Legislature was so organized that neither the Democratic party nor the Whig party had a majority of all the votes upon joint ballot, and therefore, in the election of a United States Senator or a State officer, the Free-Soilers held the balance of power, and the Democrats could not elect a United States Senator, unless they selected a man who was a Democrat, it is true, but holding free-soil doctrines. Sir, the Whigs had taught us the potency of such means; they had often practised them. They have always been more adroit in their use than the Democracy. They out-generated us last winter; as manifested in the election of the junior Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE.] They tried by skillful manoeuvres to use the Free-Soilers in our last fall’s election; but they failed. The day, as my friend from the Ross district [Mr. TAYLOR] well knows, has gone by when the Free-Soilers can be of any use to the Whigs of Ohio. The people of the State have spoken through the ballot-boxes, and given ten thousand majority for the Democrats, over both Whigs and Free-Soilers, and now my colleague [Mr. TAYLOR] is willing to coalesce with Southern gentlemen, and would have Southern Democrats believe that the Northern Whigs are with them. Let me raise my warning voice, and say to my Southern friends, Beware of these Birney Roorbacks! Beware of the Whigs of Ohio, who have been wedded to the Free-Soilers and Abolitionists, from the first dawn of political Free-Soilism in Ohio! But now, when they can no longer be of any use in obtaining State power, the gentleman wishes to sever the connection, and he calls upon this House to divorce the Whig party from that marriage contract made with the Free-Soil party of Ohio. He wishes now to take to his bosom the Southern people, and to make them believe that the Whigs of Ohio have been standing up for the peculiar institutions of the South. The gentleman would give the impression, by his argument on this floor, that the Northern Democrats are against the people of the South, and that the Northern Whigs are on their side, and yet when you look at the record of the vote on the passage of the fugitive slave bill, you will find twenty-seven Northern Democrats to three Northern Whigs, voting for that measure—although I admit that my colleague was one of those three.

I care nothing about this Kossuth vote; it is a mere matter of moonshine with me. I care nothing about the quarrel between my two colleagues; but let me give the cheering intelligence to the House, that my colleague from the Ashtabula district [Mr. GIDDINGS] holds a decided advantage over my other colleague from the Ross district, [Mr. TAYLOR.] Our State will be redistricted for Congressional purposes this session of our Legislature. The Democracy will do this work; and I doubt not that it will be well done. The gentleman from the Abolition district [Mr. GIDDINGS] will come back to this House again. His district is so situated that we cannot attach enough democracy to it, to oust him from his seat. He holds a life tenure upon this floor; but my colleague from the Ross district has no such tenure.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, next obtained the floor.

Mr. MARSHALL, of California. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield me the floor for a moment? I desire, before the committee rises, to offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. BAYLY. I have no objection to yield it for that purpose.

Mr. MARSHALL. I wish to offer an amendment to the bill which has been under discussion, or ought to have been under discussion, all morning. My amendment is in these words:

Provided, That the President may cause the payment to be made at such time and in such manner as will be most acceptable to the Government of Mexico.

I do not, of course, wish to discuss this amendment now, but I have some few observations upon it, which I shall wish to submit at a more suitable time than the present. I now move that the committee rise.

The question was put and agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman [Mr. JONES] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 46, providing for carrying into execution in further part the twelfth article of the treaty concluded with Mexico at Guadalupe Hidalgo, but had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. BARRERE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported back as correctly enrolled—

An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a register to the brig Ada; and

An act to provide a room for the Congressional library.

On motion by Mr. FOWLER, the House then adjourned.

CLAIMS AGAINST MEXICO.

Mr. DOWNS. I have in my possession a petition of Daniel N. Pope, one of the claimants for indemnity against Mexico, who prays that some provision may be made for the reinvestigation of his claim. I have also a similar petition from Andrew J. Brame. There are now several petitions before the Senate on this subject, which have been presented by myself and other Senators, of which the Senate has made no disposition. I see that the honorable Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. STOCKTON,] who made the motion the other day to refer these memorials to a select committee, is now in his seat. I now make the same motion which he then made, and I will state that I was mistaken the other day in relation to that matter. I understood the Chair to say that the motion at that time pending was to refer the memorial which he presented to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I have since understood that the Senator from New Jersey moved to refer it to a select committee.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I understood the Senator from New Jersey to move to refer to a select committee.

The PRESIDENT. No, sir; he suggested that he would make that motion at the proper time.

Mr. DOWNS. Then I make the motion now. I will state that I have looked into these memorials with some care, and I think that the subject to which they relate is important, and that it requires serious and laborious examination. The memorialists make complaints of so serious a nature, that I think it is indispensably necessary, in justice to them, that a full investigation should take place. The only objection I have to these memorials going to the Committee on Foreign Relations is, that their other avocations are so important that the committee will not be able to devote the necessary time to the consideration of this subject. As I said the other day, these memorials are very similar in their nature to those in relation to the claims for French spoliations, and are not properly referable to any of the standing committees of the Senate. Hence I think that, like the memorials in reference to French spoliation claims, they should go to a select committee. Besides, the petitioners request that a select committee be appointed with power to send for persons and papers.

I would state that there are some things in the proceedings of this board which seem to me astonishing. I find that several memorialists represent that their claims on being presented were stated to be admitted, subject to the future order of the board, and afterwards some of them had been reduced to one half of the sum which they had claimed, and that some were rejected altogether. The first idea was, that they had perhaps reserved them in order to make a pro rata distribution, but on examination I find that that discretion was not left to the board, but to the Secretary of the Treasury after the returns were made.

There is another very serious matter set forth by the memorialists, and that is, that when the decisions were made they were never informed of their nature. They say that in some particular cases this information was given, but that although application was repeatedly made to know the grounds on which their claims were rejected, in order that if there were any errors a reconsideration might be obtained, and although they were promised from time to time that such opportunities would be afforded, yet that until the commission was closed they were not allowed to examine and see the grounds on which their claims were rejected. Not only was that the case, but it was attended with this very singular circumstance—these papers were all returned to the office of the Secretary of State and there sealed up. There is no reason that I know of, why they should be kept secret; certainly after the Board examined the claims, the claimants ought to have an opportunity of looking into the grounds of the decision, and see what was done in relation to their claims. Yet I am informed, on good authority, though not officially, that these papers, since they have been returned, have been put under seal; so that the parties cannot get any information which may be necessary for the further investigation of their claims.

These things may all be very right, but they seem to me very strange; and I think that when so many persons are calling for relief, an investigation ought to take place. I therefore move that these memorials which I have presented be referred to a select committee of five, with power to send for persons and papers. I wish also to include those memorials which have heretofore been presented in relation to this subject, but which have been laid upon the table.

The PRESIDENT. That cannot be done without moving to take them from the table.

Mr. DOWNS. Then I confine my motion to the memorials which I have now presented.

Mr. MANGUM. Mr. President, I hope that the motion of the honorable Senator from Louisiana will not be acceded to by the Senate. I suppose that the standing committees of this body are capable of passing upon all questions which may arise. This is a question which is appropriate to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I would not say anything upon this subject, but for the fact that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. Mason] is absent.

In all the numerous commissions which have originated in this country during the time I have served in the Congress of the United States, I have never known a case where persons disappointed in their expectations with regard to claims, have not complained of the injustice and unfairness with which they were treated. But when we have deputed and delegated to these commissioners the adjustment of claims, nothing but a most flagrant case should tempt or induce Congress to interpose. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT. As the Committee on Foreign Relations is a standing committee, the first question will be on the reference to that committee.

Mr. DOWNS. I should perhaps have no very serious objection to the reference of the memorials to that committee, but for the fact that a prominent member of that committee has expressed a very decided opinion in reference to this matter, and seemed to have very much the same idea about the claims that the Commissioners had, that is, that all the injustice was done to Mexico, and none to the claimants, and that it was a duty to oppose them, and cut their claims down as much as possible. I think, if gentlemen will look into these claims, they will find them to be of a very different character. Many of these claims, and one which I presented some time ago, were admitted by a former Board of Commissioners of at least as high authority and dignity as the last Board, but were referred on some points to the umpire, and were not decided by him.

These claims, I take it, are clearly recognized as being entitled to be liquidated by a subsequent treaty. In the case to which I have alluded as having been presented by me some time since, an order was made by the Board that the claim should be allowed, subject to the future order of the Board, yet when the future order of the Board came, they rejected the claim altogether.

I think that a matter of this importance requires some investigation. It may be all right; and if it is, it will not suffer by investigation. The gentleman seems to think that these complaints should not be listened to, and that there will always be complaints of this character. Perhaps the Senator is not aware that it was never expected by our negotiator in Mexico, or by the Government here, or by the people generally, that the amount of three millions and a quarter of dollars stipulated in the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo should be the only compensation which the United States would make. That was urged as an objection by the Mexican negotiators when the treaty was made; but Mr. Trist replied to them, that although that amount was fixed, still that was not necessarily to be the limit to which the United States would go—that there was no reason why they should not pay a greater amount if claims to a greater amount were justly due. And when we take into consideration the fact that these claims were presented against Mexico, and that when we were enforcing them against that Government we did not fix them at three millions and a quarter, but at some eight millions of dollars, it is very strange indeed that we should now confine the claims to that limit of three millions and a quarter. But I understand, further, that the Board, so far from going beyond the three millions and a quarter, which was evidently contemplated by the treaty, have fallen short of it, and that forty thousand dollars of that amount has not been absorbed, and that Mexico has perhaps already laid claim to that surplus as belonging to her, because this Government stipulated to pay that amount, and she claims that she is entitled to any surplus which may remain if the amount is not paid. She is certainly entitled to it, if the Board have acted fairly and justly, but she is not entitled to it if these claimants have not been fairly treated.

All I ask and all I wish is, that a thorough investigation of this matter shall take place; and I am more anxious that these memorials should now be referred to a select committee, because the gentleman from North Carolina seems to intimate very clearly that they will receive very little quarter from the Committee on Foreign Relations, because he thinks that all such claims are apt to be wrong.

Mr. MANGUM. I was not present when this motion was made on a former day; but I understand that the chairman of the committee on Foreign Relations then gave some indications of an opinion upon this subject. I know not what his opinions were; but there is not a Senator in this body who is acquainted with the ability and remarkable liberality of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations who would not be willing to trust anything to his judgment, no matter what might have been his first impression.

The honorable Senator from Louisiana says that this subject requires some investigation. I need not say anything as to the capability of the Committee on Foreign Relations to investigate the subject. At its head stands one of the most eminent and able lawyers of this body, [Mr. Mason.] The second member on that committee [Mr. DOUGLAS] is a prominent candidate for President of the United States. There are others of us on that committee, very humble, to be sure; but yet I think that that committee may be trusted as capable of investigating almost any question relating to their appropriate sphere of duty.

Sir, this practice of raising select committees in this body is of very recent origin. It is only on rare occasions, when the Union is shaking to its foundation, that the Senate have decided to depart from its usual and settled practice, and appoint select committees. The Union will suffer no detriment if these claims should never be allowed. I hope the country will do justice to all claimants. But the Senator entirely misconceives what I said, if he understood me as having expressed an opinion that these claims which have been rejected ought not to have a fair hearing. So far from it, when the interposition of this body shall become necessary for the purpose of setting the matter right, I trust I shall be found ready to go as far as anybody.

The aggregate amount of ability of the Committee on Foreign Relations is well understood by this body. The two first members of it ought at least to give it currency in this body, and place it on an equal footing with any select committee which can be raised. I trust that on a mere question of private claim we shall not depart from the usual and dignified course of the Senate by appointing a select committee to pay money to persons who it has been decided are not entitled to it.

Mr. DOWNS. I hope that the Senator from North Carolina will not understand me as objecting to the reference of these memorials to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I have no objection to that committee. I disclaim any such idea. I have as much respect and as much confidence in the members of that committee as any Senator. But I stated before that I wished this subject to be referred to a select committee, because I thought the labors of the Committee on Foreign Relations in reference to other questions were so great that they could not devote the time and attention to the consideration of this subject which it seems to me to require.

I think the honorable Senator is entirely mistaken in one point. He says that it has not been the custom of the Senate to refer questions to select committees, except in the case of great questions, where the Union has been in danger. I need only remind the Senate of a case which happened at the last session of Congress, and at this session in reference to a question which did not affect the Union at all. I refer to the claims for French spoliations. These are exactly such claims as those. They are claims against a foreign Government, which have been relinquished against that Government and preferred against our own; and, therefore, they cease to be connected with our foreign relations, because we have taken their payment upon ourselves.

Mr. MANGUM. The French spoliation claims involve the payment of from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000.

Mr. DOWNS. How does the Senator know that this may not involve the payment of $5,000,000?

Mr. MANGUM. If it should involve that amount it would be very astonishing.

Mr. DOWNS. It might not be so astonishing as the Senator seems to suppose, because the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo has made provision for $3,250,000, whereas our Government asserted, when prosecuting these claims against Mexico, that there should be paid $8,000,000. It may turn out that this difference of $5,000,000 is due to these claimants. I do not know how the fact may be. Hence, it cannot be so astonishing as the Senator seems to suppose. However, that is not material. This is a case very analogous to that of the claims for French spoliations; and, therefore, I would have moved to refer these memorials to a select committee.

The Senator from North Carolina is mistaken in saying that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations said anything on this subject when it was before us a few days ago. I recollect that he was not here at that time, and that his colleague [Mr. HUNTER] suggested that the memorials upon this subject ought to go to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I suppose it was that to which the Senator had reference.

Again it would be no want of confidence in the Committee on Foreign Relations to refer those memorials to a select committee. I made the motion because I thought that a more thorough and sifting investigation could be had by a committee specially charged with this business. I cannot see with what propriety the Senate should send those old claims for French spoliations committed prior to 1801 to select committees, session after session, and now refuse a select committee to another set of claimants standing very much in an analogous position. I do not see why we should make this distinction. I hope, therefore, that these memorials will be referred to a select committee.

Mr. HALE. I have not heard any of these petitions read. In order that I may vote understandingly on the subject, I would like to hear one of them read.

The PRESIDENT. There are a number of petitions on this subject.

Mr. HALE. Let one of them be read.

Mr. BRADBURY. It would occupy an hour.

Mr. HALE. Well, can any one give me an abstract of one of the petitions? Do they allege corruption? because if they do, I believe it. If there were three millions of money to be disbursed by the Government without there being corruption in the transaction, it would form an exception to the general rule. And if there was not corruption, if these claims were honestly investigated, whoever heard of parties litigant going before a tribunal, and both plaintiff and defendant being satisfied with the result? You have instituted this Commission, and the money has been, or is about to be paid out. Some of the parties are dissatisfied and complain of gross injustice. I have no doubt of it in the least. And if you were to institute another commission, and disburse three millions more, there would be twice as many dissatisfied then as there are now, and the number of claims would be increased. Instead of lessening the amount of the claims, you would increase them; and you would increase the dissatisfaction. If it is supposed that by multiplying commissions and increasing the amount of payments, you would decrease the amount of dissatisfaction, it will be found to be a great mistake.

If there be a charge of corruption, I hope it will be made definite; and I hope the Senate will take some course to vindicate the Government against abuses of that sort. But I can tell these claimants, that if they are suffering under corruption, they are not alone. Why, it is said that when the late President of the United States, General Taylor, came to take his seat at the head of the administration of the Government, the poor old gentleman came with the idea that he was going to drag this Government back to its original purity. The task proved too strong for his Herculean powers, and he fainted and died under it; and so would any man. It cannot be done. Corruption is the history of the day, and it will be found not only in this commission, but in a great many other places. If there is a charge I hope it will be made definite. If there is not general dissatisfaction; but if there is a definite charge made of corruption, perjury, forgery, or anything of that sort, then I would be willing to investigate it, and go as far as anybody. But if this is merely a case where there is dissatisfaction on the part of claimants on account of their claims not being paid, it is an idle task, it is perfectly useless, to undertake to satisfy them. It is for this reason that I asked for the reading of some one of the petitions, that I might see whether a specific charge of corruption was preferred against anybody.

The PRESIDENT. One of the memorials will be read if the Senator desires it.

Mr. DOWNS. I can state briefly the nature of the memorials.

Mr. HALE. I am willing to take the statement of the honorable Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. DOWNS. The honorable Senator from New Hampshire is mistaken in supposing that the memorialists charge corruption. I understand them to charge no such thing. But they do charge that injustice has been done them; that there is a mystery about the matter; that the investigation has not been as public as such things ought to be; that they were never informed until the Board had closed its sessions of the nature of the objections to their claims, although they were promised an opportunity; and that, finally, the grounds of the decisions and all the papers were sent to the office of the Secretary of State, and there sealed up.

These memorialists do not ask that their claims should be paid as they represent them; but they state the circumstances under which the awards of the Board were made; and that previously some of those claims which have now been rejected, were allowed by Boards of Commissioners of as high respectability as any board that ever sat on similar claims. They complain that claims have been rejected by the late Board of Commissioners, and that no reasons for their rejection had been made public, or placed in a form to be accessible to the claimants. They ask that this veil of secrecy, which is so inconsistent with our course of proceedings generally, in courts of justice and everywhere else, should be removed, and that the matter should be looked into. It may turn out that these claims were properly rejected. If so, the first duty of a select committee, if one should be appointed, would be to report that fact. In my opinion these memorialists are justly dissatisfied with this state of things, and they merely ask that a committee should look into the matter, and see if their complaints of injustice are not well founded. If they are well founded, certainly it is the duty of the Government to interpose and render them justice.

The Senator from New Hampshire says that when parties go before a tribunal, the disappointed party will be dissatisfied. But I would ask, have these parties not a right to be dissatisfied, since these investigations have not taken the usual course? Where was the necessity for the proceedings of the Board to be kept secret? Why were not the decisions made as in all other courts? Why were not the records open to those persons, that they might see upon what grounds their claims were rejected? In all our courts, even in the highest courts, there is always an opportunity for a reconsideration and revision of opinions. What would we think of one of our courts of justice, whether a subordinate or a supreme court, if, when they rendered a decision, they should keep it secret, and keep the records and documents in the case a sealed book, not allowing the parties interested to look into them until the proceedings of the court were closed, and then to say that their decision was final and irrevocable, and could never be looked into? What sort of justice would that be?

I know nothing of this transaction except what I learn from the representations of the memorialists, who are most of them respectable persons; and I say that they do make out a very strong case for the investigation of a select committee. That is all I ask. If the committee, after investigation, shall report that these claims were rightly disallowed, I shall not have a word to say. But I think that the memorialists make out a case which entitles them to have the subject considered by a select committee.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair must interpose. This discussion is not in order. It is not in order to go into the discussion of the merits of a case upon the simple question whether the memorials shall be referred to a select committee or to a standing committee.

Mr. MANGUM. I rose for the purpose of making, in substance, that very remark. No one present, that I have yet heard, has hinted the slightest degree of opposition to the reinvestigation of this matter. The only question before the Senate is, whether these memorials shall go to a regular committee or to a special committee.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to refer these memorials, which have been presented by the Senator from Louisiana, to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DOWNS. My motion was to refer them to a select committee of five.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is aware of that, but a motion having been made to refer them to the Committee on Foreign Relations, that motion has precedence, and is first to be put.

The motion to refer the memorials to the Committee on Foreign Relations was agreed to—ayes 25, noes 12.

On motion by Mr. DOWNS, it was Ordered, That all similar memorials on the files, presented during the present session, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. WADE, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Bryan Callaghan be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

On motion by Mr. BELL, it was Ordered, That the petition of Arabella J. Strong, widow and executrix of Lorenzo N. Clarke, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

On motion by Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of the Iowa militia claim, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; and that the letters of the Secretary of War and the Adjutant General, accompanying the same, be printed.

On motion by Mr. GWIN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of McKean Buchanan, a purser in the Navy, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. WHITCOMB, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to the claim of the administrator of Major Wade, a quartermaster of marines, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. DOWNS, it was Ordered, That the heirs of Andrew D. Crosby have leave to withdraw their petition and papers.

On motion by Mr. FELCH, it was Ordered, That the petition of George Barrell and S. V. S. Wilder, on the files of the Senate, in behalf of themselves and the other heirs of the owners of the ship "Columbia" and sloop "Washington," be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion by Mr. FELCH, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of John Watson, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have been requested to ask leave to withdraw the papers of William Zollikoffer, who petitioned Congress at the last session for a pension. I am informed that there was an unfavorable report in that case, but that it was not acted upon. These are the facts under which the petitioner desires to withdraw his papers.

The PRESIDENT. Simply to withdraw them?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes, sir.

Mr. PEARCE. Am I to understand that the report made in this case was unfavorable?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was unfavorable, but it was never acted on, according to the information which I have on the subject.

Mr. MANGUM. It will be a very bad precedent to allow papers to be withdrawn in such cases. If there be additional testimony, and there is any purpose on the part of the petitioner to apply to the Senate for that relief, let the question be decided when it comes, for on its coming, if I understand the rule, the case may again be referred to a committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I withdraw the motion. I think myself that in general it is a bad thing, and I would like to ascertain more as to the motives which induced the petitioner to make the request.

The motion was accordingly withdrawn.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. DODGE, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the memorial of Charles S. Jackson, submitted a report; which was considered by unanimous consent, and, in concurrence therewith, Ordered, That the Committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof.

On motion by Mr. DODGE, of Wisconsin, it was Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of the citizens of Martinicus, reported a bill to annex the Island of Martinicus, in the county of Lincoln, State of Maine, to the collection district of Waldoboro', in said county; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. SOULE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of John S. Maunsell, reported a bill to admit the Hermaprodite brig Sylphide to registry; which was read and passed to the second reading.

The said bill was read the second time by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate.

Ordered, That it be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. SEWARD, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill to authorize an exploration and reconnaissance of the courses of navigation used by whaling vessels in the regions of Behring's Straits; and also, of such parts of the China seas, Straits of Gaspar, and Java sea, as lie directly in the route of vessels proceeding to and from China; which was read and passed to the second reading.

The report accompanying the bill was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FOOT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of William Miller, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Ezra Williams, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. BRADBURY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill authorizing the payment of interest to the State of New Hampshire for advances made for the use and benefit of the United States in repelling invasion and suppressing insurrection at Indian Stream, in that State, reported it without amendment.

On the motion of Mr. HALE, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate, ordered to be read a third time; and it was read a third time and passed.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. SEBASTIAN gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill to be entitled "An act to revive for a limited time 'An act in relation to donations of lands to certain persons in the State of Arkansas.'"

BOOKS FOR NEW SENATORS.

Mr. BADGER submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That each of the new members of the Senate be supplied with the same number and description of books as were furnished to each of the members of the Senate of the last Congress.

CENSUS RETURNS

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. HAMLIN on the 20th instant, in relation to the Census returns; and, having been amended, was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to furnish the Senate with an estimate of the number of pages which the Census Returns will contain, if the same shall be completed on the plan now pursued by the Census Bureau. Also, what part of the same will be composed of statistical tables, and what part of other matter; and whether there are any tables accompanying the same not designated by law.

WILLIAM K. LATIMER.

On the motion of Mr. HALE, the following resolution was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the charges and specifications, and also the report and opinion of a court of inquiry in the case of William K. Latimer, and the letter of the Secretary of the Navy transmitting the same, and the general order in said case, dated July 1, 1851, be printed for the use of the Senate.

ASSIGNABILITY OF LAND WARRANTS.

The bill to make land warrants assignable, and for other purposes, which was ordered to a third reading yesterday, was read a third time and passed.

GENERAL ORDERS.

Mr. GWIN. As I understand that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] is not particularly anxious to address the Senate to-day on the special order, I move that the Calendar be taken up, and that we commence our work to-day and clear it if possible. I believe that some of the questions which were made special orders cannot be conveniently proceeded with to-day, and I trust that there will be no objection to the course I have proposed, and that we may go on and clear the Calendar of its business.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair must call for the special order unless some motion is made to postpone it and take up the Calendar.

Mr. GWIN. I make that motion, especially as I learn that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] will not object to it.

Mr. DAVIS. I shall not object if the special order will still occupy its place and come up to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT. It will come up as a matter or course.

The question was taken, and the special orders were all postponed, with the view of proceeding with the Calendar.

LANDS IN WISCONSIN.

The bill to extend the time for selecting lands granted to the State of Wisconsin for saline purposes; was taken up for consideration as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported with an amendment to extend the time to the year 1854.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. DAWSON. I wish the Senator from Wisconsin would explain the character of this bill.

Mr. WALKER. I will endeavor to do so as well as I am able. By the act of admission of Wisconsin into the Union there were certain lands granted to the State in connection with salt springs in the same way as lands had been granted to other States. The Governor of the State, whose duty it was to select these lands, neglected to do so in the proper time. The time for their selection expired, and since its expiration we have been endeavoring to get it extended, so that these lands may be selected. The bill does not propose to give to the State anything which has not already been given and to which it is not in equity entitled.

Mr. BADGER. The bill is merely to give further time for the selection of these lands.

Mr. WALKER. That is all.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a second reading.

LANDS IN MICHIGAN.

The PRESIDENT. The next general order is a bill to extend the time for selecting lands granted to the State of Michigan for saline purposes.

Mr. FELCH. I move that that bill be passed over informally. There is another proposition of a similar nature before the Committee on Public Lands, and I wish that the two propositions may be considered together.

The motion was agreed to.

SAFETY OF PASSENGERS ON STEAMBOATS.

The Senate then proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to the consideration of "A bill supplementary to the several acts of Congress providing for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled, in whole or in part, by steam, and for other purposes."

Mr. DAVIS. I think that bill contains some provisions which are rather novel. I do not object to the principle of the bill, if the honorable Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BORLAND] deems it necessary for the accommodation of boats upon the rivers in his State; but it takes away what has hitherto passed through the collector's office. I do not precisely see what disposition is to be made of the certificate, unless it is to be used as a license. If it is to be used as a license for the vessel, it is entirely novel, and a departure from the old system. I should be glad if the Senator would consent to let it lie over long enough to afford an opportunity to examine it. I do not think I shall throw any obstacle in the way of the wishes of the Senator from Arkansas finally.

Mr. BORLAND. I would yield to the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, but that this bill has been long delayed. It passed the Senate at the last session, but did not pass the House for want of time, and as I deem it very important that it should be passed, I hope it may be considered and passed now. I think the Senator is mistaken with regard to the introduction of any new principle. It does not interfere with the existing licenses; they remain under the existing laws. It simply provides that the vessels may be required to receive their inspection in other places than those now specified. If the honorable Senator will read the last section of the bill, he will see that it refers to inspection instead of licenses. I will further state, that when I originally introduced this bill, it was to make Arkansas a collection district, and Little Rock a port of entry; but before it was acted upon by the Committee on Commerce, it was sent to the Secretary of the Treasury. I addressed to him a letter, and informed him precisely what was the object I had in view, which was to put Arkansas on the same footing as the other States with regard to the inspection of steamboats. Under the general law, the judges of the district court, within the collection district, have the power to appoint steamboat inspectors. But Arkansas is not a collection district, and the judge of the district court for Arkansas, therefore, has no such power. The Secretary of the Treasury, in response to my application, had this bill drawn up, saying that there was no necessity for the establishment of a new collection district and a new port of entry there, and that the whole object could be accomplished by giving the district judge the same power to appoint inspectors, that the judges have in collection districts. The general law, then, is not altered at all by this bill, with regard to the regulation of steamboats; it simply gives power to the district judge to appoint inspectors, so that boats may be repaired there, and thus save the time and expense of going to a distant part of the country for inspection.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would prefer to let this bill lie over a little while. There is a very extensive yard for building boats at Paducah, in Kentucky. That is not a port of entry nor of delivery, and the judge of our district court resides some two hundred and fifty or three hundred miles from that place, where a great many steamboats are built. There is an absolute necessity to have inspectors of the boilers and hulls of steamboats at the shipyard at the mouth of the Ohio river, at Paducah. It is a very important point; and under the law as it is now construed by our district judge, the inspectors can only be appointed at ports of entry or delivery, according to the idea of my friend from Massachusetts. Now, this grievance has been complained of by the people of Paducah, and with a view to obviate this grievance under which they suffer, they have petitioned—and I hope that petition will be duly considered by the Committee on Commerce—to have a port of delivery at that point. I feel the same kind of interest in the navigation of the waters of the western rivers which the Senator from Arkansas expresses, and for the purpose of seeing how far this bill will apply to and embrace the waters of Kentucky, as well as those of Arkansas, I would prefer greatly that it might lie over for the present, that I may see if it will not obviate the grievances of the people of Kentucky as well as those of Arkansas.

Mr. BORLAND. I am really very sorry that I cannot consent to the proposition of the Senator to allow this bill to be laid over. If he has any change to propose to this bill, so as to accomplish the object he desires, I will not object; but it seems to me this bill contains within itself all that is required. It does not interfere at all with any proposition with regard to other States. I dislike to resist the wish of my friend from Kentucky—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to embrace my own State.

Mr. BORLAND. I would be glad to embrace Kentucky; but this bill was before Congress at the first session of the last Congress, and at the last session again, and was passed here. Now, this session has advanced somewhat, nearly two months of the session have passed, and the bill has now come up in its regular order; and if we pass it over it will be difficult to get it up again. I repeat, that the bill was prepared at the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, and that it cannot interfere in any way with the existing general laws on the same subject.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My friend will perceive that if there is any difficulty in the way of getting his bill through, in consequence of laying it over for the present, the difficulty will be far greater with regard to any one that I might bring forward for the benefit of Kentucky, for I should have to commence de novo. My object is to avail myself of his bill to benefit the people of Kentucky, for I wish to embrace his popularity to carry the bill. If I am compelled to introduce a bill, it will be thrown off to the end of the session, and perhaps I shall not get anything at all. It will save everything for Kentucky, if he will allow his bill to be passed over.

Mr. BORLAND. I shall be very glad to oblige the Senator, and I will yield to the suggestion and agree to pass over the bill informally, for I wish to avail myself of his popularity also.

Mr. DAVIS. The Committee on Commerce, at the last session, reported a bill embracing this subject very fully, with provisions somewhat new in regard to the mode of making these inspections, changing the system and adopting a new plan, embracing all the waters of the country. That bill has been committed to the Committee on Commerce at this session; we have had it under consideration, and we anticipate an early report on that subject. It has only been delayed for the want of papers, which have now been laid upon the table from the Treasury Department. At the close of the last session, a resolution was passed through the Senate, upon my motion, asking for a large body of information on this subject, through the Treasury Department. That has come in this morning, and a bill will, therefore, be reported at an early day. But, still, I do not propose to throw any obstacle in the way of the object and the wishes of my friend from Arkansas. I am willing his bill should take its course; but if that bill which the committee will report passes, this bill will be superseded.

Mr. BORLAND. I ask that the bill may be passed over informally.

The bill was accordingly passed over informally.

THE UNITED STATES BRIG WASHINGTON.

The bill for the relief of the widows and relatives of certain officers and seamen of the United States brig Washington, who were lost overboard in a hurricane, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and having been amended verbally, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

BINDING CONGRESSIONAL DOCUMENTS.

The joint resolution providing for the binding of certain documents, was next considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that all the executive documents of which additional copies have been ordered to be printed, which shall not contain less than two hundred and fifty pages, shall be bound, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, provided that the cost thereof shall not exceed twelve and a half cents per volume.

Mr. BORLAND. As chairman of the Committee on Printing, I will state that this is a joint resolution which came from the House of Representatives, and was referred to the Committee on Printing of the Senate, and was favorably reported upon. When this resolution was before the Senate on a former occasion, I made some remarks in opposition to its adoption, and I shall not, therefore, now go at length into the reasons why I am opposed to it. I will simply state, that as I opposed the measure then, so I shall vote against it now, because I think it is adding to the list of opportunities occasioning invitations to commit impositions on the Government. The binding of our documents for the last session has satisfied me with the system; and although in some respects there may be an advantage in it, I think it is, upon the whole, a great evil. I think that, instead of the documents being benefited by the binding, they have in a large number of instances been materially injured. So far at least as some of them which went to my State would go to prove this position, I am satisfied. I examined some of those which went there, and found that when they had reached their destination the binding was not worth anything. Nay, that it was worse than useless, for it had put these documents in a condition which prevented them from being bound again. I am opposed to this plan of binding, as I am opposed to everything in the way of either printing or binding being done on contract. My opinion is, that everything which we undertake to do under that system will be badly done—that it will result in much more expense and much less advantage to the country than by almost any other system. I have expressed these sentiments on a former occasion, and I have now no more to say.

Mr. BRADBURY. I did not hear the resolution read, but I think that whatever is deserving of being placed in the library is deserving of being bound. I think the great fault is, that we print too large numbers of documents which are not of sufficient general interest to compensate for the outlay. It certainly is convenient when we have documents to use, to have them in a position in which we can use them. As the expense of binding is not great, I am under the impression that what we print in considerable numbers should be bound.

Mr. BORLAND. We now print fourteen hundred copies of all documents that are ordered to be printed, for the Library and for the use of the Senate. But the proposition in this joint resolution is to bind the extra copies which go out into the country. Now, if the Senator from Maine will look into this question of binding public documents, and will view it with regard to the economical course which he usually pursues, I think he will be inclined to favor my side of the question. Does any Senator know what was the cost of binding documents last session?

Mr. HALE. No.

Mr. BORLAND. Why, sir, it cannot have fallen short of a hundred thousand dollars. The binding of the Patent Office reports alone cost fifty thousand dollars; and for the binding of the documents of this Congress, if we adopt this resolution, my opinion is we will have to pay a hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

A SENATOR. No, no; not so much as that.

Mr. HALE. My observation leads me to differ with the Senator from Arkansas in regard to this resolution. I think that if there be any value in these documents at all, at least to the people to whom they are sent in the country, it is in the binding. Now, if it is worth while to print these documents to send to our friends, it is certainly worth while to put upon them this ninepenny binding; for instead of tearing them up, as they would inevitably do if they were not bound, they allow them a place on the shelves of their libraries, there to remain, sir, like many of our documents here, never to be opened and read again. I am quite of opinion, therefore, Mr. President, that if these public documents have any value at all—at least many of them—it is in the binding; and if we are to dispense with anything here, I would rather that we dispensed with the printing and kept the binding. [A laugh.]

Mr. BRADBURY. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Printing whether the order for printing the documents of the present session has already been so far executed as to render it impossible to reduce the number? The abuse seems to be in the manufacturing of so large a number of books. Formerly the Patent Office report was but a small volume; but recently, by the incorporation of much useless matter, it has swelled to two volumes; and I think that, in the first place, the abuse is in incorporating what is not of value; and in the second place, in printing so large a number of copies. I quite agree with the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] that one thing, at least, which gives value to these documents is their being bound, and thus be put in a position in which they can be used and referred to. And the same reasons which would induce me to bind them for ourselves, would induce me to bind those which are intended for distribution elsewhere. Otherwise, they become as mere waste paper, and might as well not be circulated at all.

Mr. HAMLIN. I was one of the Committee on Printing who agreed to this report, and therefore it becomes me, perhaps, to say a word. I have very little, indeed I have no feeling on this subject whatever. I am perfectly indifferent. Still, upon the investigation of the subject, I came to the conclusion that if our documents were worth preserving and sending abroad, they were worth a cheap binding. I will add, also, that I am satisfied that for twelve and a half cents per copy, the price we paid last year, binding may be had in muslin, which is a very respectable binding indeed, and makes a very respectable volume. If Senators will turn their attention or their recollection to the Debates on the California Convention, the Statistics of Commerce and Navigation, or still later works, the Surveys of New Mexico and Texas, all bound in muslin, they will have a fair sample of what can be done in the way of binding in muslin for twelve and a half cents per copy; and for that sum these documents can be placed in a situation in which they can be preserved. I must say that I think some of these documents are of a little more value than the Senator from New Hampshire seems to suppose. I think the agricultural report of the Patent Office is worth preserving, and in this cheap binding it will be preserved. The binding of these documents at twelve and a half cents per copy will not amount to half the sum named by the Senator from Arkansas, and it will fully accomplish the object which is desired. Besides, I am told that if we do not pass the resolution, the House of Representatives will recommend the passage of a resolution of a similar character, and have the expense defrayed out of their own contingent fund. I think, therefore, it will be a matter of economy to have these documents containing three hundred pages bound in muslin; which can be done so cheaply and so neatly.

Mr. BRADBURY. I observe there is a limitation of the size of the volume. Last year it was ordered to bind such volumes as contained not less than three hundred pages. The bill before us limits the number of pages to two hundred and fifty. I move to strike out the words "two hundred and fifty," and insert the words "three hundred."

Mr. HALE. I object.

Mr. CLARKE. I hope not.

Mr. BADGER. I hope that amendment will not prevail. I would much rather see the fifty struck out and leave the words "two hundred." I cannot understand why a document of two hundred pages should not be bound. I think anything beyond the size of a pamphlet should be bound. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

The amendment was not adopted.

The joint resolution was then reported to the Senate, and read a third time, and passed.

SELECTION OF LANDS BY ILLINOIS.

The Senate then proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to the consideration of a "Bill to authorize the State of Illinois to select the residue of the lands to which she is entitled under the act of 2d March, 1827, granting land to aid that State in opening a canal to connect the waters of the Illinois river with those of Lake Michigan."

Mr. HUNTER. I would like to have that bill passed over.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Would the Senator from Virginia like an explanation of the bill?

Mr. HUNTER. I should be glad to have it explained.

Mr. DOUGLAS. In 1827, the Congress of the United States passed an act granting to the State of Illinois a certain amount of alternate sections of land, for the purpose of constructing a canal to connect the waters of the Illinois river and those of Lake Michigan. The grant was made, under supposition that the land would be sufficient to construct the canal. A corps of engineers, walking over it, decided that it would require the sum of six hundred thousand dollars to make the canal. We accepted the grant with the idea of making the canal out of these lands. We commenced the work on that supposition, and went on and expended a large sum of money. The next estimate was, that a million and a half dollars would be required; but before we got through there was another estimate of three millions, and at last we made out the whole expenditure to be nine millions, and the canal is now finished. On selecting the lands there was an omission to select a small quantity, which was therefore left, and has been sold by the Government. The Department acknowledges that we are entitled to some twenty thousand acres more. It is a small amount, and this is simply to authorize the State to select what we were entitled to under the original grant. The State does not ask any more on account of the greater expense than the original amount estimated.

Mr. HUNTER. I would inquire if the bill allows the selection to be made in any part of the State, or whether it is to be confined to the vicinity of the canal?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The lands were originally upon the borders of the canal, but the Government of the United States has sold a portion of the land to which we were entitled along the line of the canal. It must now be selected elsewhere, so much as is necessary to make up the small deficiency that I have stated.

Mr. DAWSON. I would ask if the lands were not sold prior to the grant made to the State?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Not at all. Every acre has been sold since, and we now do not wish to disturb the title which has been made erroneously out of the grant made to us. It is on this account that we ask the privilege of selecting elsewhere.

The bill was then reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

RAILROADS IN IOWA.

The Senate next proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the State of Iowa, in aid of the construction of certain railroads in said State.

The bill was reported with an amendment.

The amendment proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert a number of provisions which have been prepared as a model bill in relation to all grants of land for the construction of railroads.

Mr. HUNTER. I would like to know from the Senator who introduced this bill, how much land it proposes to appropriate for the construction of these roads.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I will state, for the satisfaction of the Senator from Virginia, that, according to the estimate last year, the principal road and the branch which it is proposed to make will require fifteen hundred thousand acres as a minimum, and eighteen hundred thousand as a maximum. This amount is some three or four or five hundred thousand acres less than were granted to the State of Illinois by a like bill.

The Committee on Public Lands have sought to make this bill a model bill, and have shaped all the others which are to follow it for grants of land for like purposes in other States after this model, which I trust the Senate will pass. It was carefully examined and revised by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD.] Several amendments were introduced into it by him, and it comes now to the Senate under the unanimous sanction of the Committee on Public Lands. I will state to my friend from Virginia, as I know that he sits heavily upon the public chest and dislikes to part with its dollars, that there is a provision in this bill enacting that the alternate sections of land which are not used for the construction of the railroad shall not be sold at a less price than two dollars and fifty cents per acre; so that when you take out this fifteen or eighteen hundred thousand acres, you will impose a tax upon our people who may purchase and settle on the land of double its present value. The bill therefore, in reality, grants very little to the State; and I hope it may be passed without opposition from my friend from Virginia.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not think that we ought to tax the constituents of the Senator from Iowa, so as to make them pay $2 50 per acre for lands for which they ought not to pay more than $1 25; and if the bill is to operate in that way, I think it would be much better to lay it over for the present. It seems that there are to be many other applications of a like nature; and, before we know it, we shall probably grant away all that portion of the public lands in detail from which we are likely to derive any revenue. I believe that if this thing is to come up, it should come up as a system, so that we may see what we are doing. I hope that the bill may be postponed till another day.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I hope the Senate will not determine to postpone this bill. It is exactly the same which passed last session, and one precisely similar has been passed this session, making a grant of land to the State of Mississippi. The title of the bill is wrong. The bill, in reality, makes no grant to the State as a gratuity. It authorizes the State to select alternate sections of six miles on each side of the road, but as the price of the remaining land is double, it is, in point of fact, no donation to the State, because the road will by that much enhance the value of the land. The only grant given to the State, is the right of way through the public land. If this bill, and others of the same kind, are put off, the lands through which these roads are to be located will be taken up by those who hold bounty land warrants. Most of the lands in the range of these railroads are already taken up, and it is therefore necessary, if any real benefit is to be derived from the passage of these bills, that they should be passed as speedily as possible. If these lands should be taken up by land warrants, the Government of the United States will not realize for them more than seventy-five cents per acre. On the other hand, if they are granted for the construction of railroads, the Government will receive the full price for all the lands. But, sir, in addition to all this, the lands adjacent to these roads, not only for fifteen miles, but even for thirty or forty miles, will thus be brought into market, and will be sold many years sooner than they would otherwise be were it not for the building of these roads. I again say, that I trust the gentleman from Virginia will not insist upon this postponement, inasmuch as this identical bill has been before the Senate for the last eighteen months. The session before last it was introduced by myself, and it has now been upon our table for one or two years. The amendments which are proposed are merely verbal, and do not materially affect the provisions of the bill. The bill is exactly the same as those granting lands to the States of Illinois and Mississippi.

Mr. ATCHISON. There is another odious condition attached to this bill. The General Government, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. JONES] shows, grants nothing—it gives nothing. But, sir, this bill provides—and I suppose it is to be a model bill, whose provisions are to be extended to several other cases—that upon these railroads the Government stores and the Government troops shall be transported free of charge.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Will that be onerous?

Mr. ATCHISON. Yes, it will be peculiarly onerous to the State of Missouri and the State of Iowa. From the Mississippi to the Missouri river across the State of Iowa, perhaps one third of all the Government stores en route to California and New Mexico will be transported upon this road and upon the Missouri road exclusively. Now, sir, I intend to test the Senate upon this question. I shall move to strike out that section. I do not consider it any great favor. It is nothing more, so far as pecuniary considerations are involved, than a grant of the right of way to construct these railroads through the public lands. This is about all that there is of it. The alternate sections we get thus: No. 1 is free; and for No. 2 is charged $2 50 per acre, instead of $1 25 as now.

But there is another consideration. We have passed a bill making land warrants assignable. I do not recollect now the amount of public lands that will necessarily be taken up by these land warrants. Will the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands tell me the quantity of the public lands that will satisfy these land warrants? I think they cannot fall much short of thirty-five or fifty millions of acres.

And who obtains these public lands? Why, sir, almost exclusively, or in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, they will go to the citizens of the old States of this Union, under that law. Now, when we ask in reality nothing but the right of way through the public lands, the Senator from Virginia, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, whose duty it is to take charge of the public treasure—and I admit that I suppose it is in the discharge of that duty—opposes this bill. But I hope he will not be able to obstruct the passage of this first bill. It is but slightly altered from the bills which have passed time after time through this body. If I am not mistaken, this bill passed here, at the last session. Then why deliberate? Why move to postpone it? It has been discussed for the last ten years. I understand that the Senator from Virginia made the motion to postpone the further consideration of this bill, with a view to have an opportunity to look into it, and examine the principles involved in it. There is nothing new in it. This very bill, or a bill involving most of its principles, if not all of them, has been discussed time and again. I trust the Senate will act upon this bill, and promptly too. It is a matter of importance, if you make this grant of land, or this donation, as some gentlemen call it, that you should make it speedily; because, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. JONES] suggested, these land warrants will fall into the hands of speculators, and they will, as a matter of course, search out the public lands which will be most valuable, upon which the greatest profits can be made, and there they will go and locate their warrants upon all the proposed railroad routes in the State of Missouri. Such has been the fact. We have two routes, one from St. Louis to the western boundary of the State, on the south side of the Missouri river; and another from the town of Hannibal to the town of St. Joseph, on the north side of the Missouri river. During the last year, $100,000 was received in the different land offices on the north side of the Missouri river, mainly upon the line of this northern railroad. Now, sir, these land warrants being made assignable, hundreds of thousands of them, or thousands at least, will fall into the hands of speculators, and the first lands that will be selected under these land warrants, will be the lands upon the borders of the railroads in the State.

Then it is important that these bills should be promptly passed, that these alternate sections should be granted to the railroads, and thus taken out of the clutches of the speculators. I have examined, and I learn from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that a hundred thousand dollars more money was received from the offices on the north side of the Missouri river last year, than for any one year during the last ten years. I trust, if the Senate intend to pass these bills at all, they will do it promptly.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Dodge] to say that this was a model bill, and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Atchison] to repeat it.

Mr. ATCHISON. I so understood it.

Mr. DAVIS. It is a bill, then, which is to be our guide in all these matters. That is one good reason why it should be made right. I rise for the purpose of putting the inquiry to some gentleman who is able to inform me, whether I am right in understanding, that in laying out the road the State is authorized to lay one hundred feet on each side of the track—making the road two hundred feet wide.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. That is so.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Iowa answers that it is so. Then let us look a little at the effect of it, and see what may come out of it. Two hundred feet, all experience shows, is quite unnecessary for a track. I believe that a width of eighty feet is all that is esteemed necessary for a railroad, unless where there is some cut, or embankment, or something of that sort, in which case more land is required. For all the purposes of a track—even for a double one—as far as our experience goes, eighty feet is deemed ample. Then, according to the bill, in front of the lands granted to the State, and in front of the lands owned by the United States, there will be a tract of land in the private ownership of this road. If the State makes the road, it will own it, and will have a strip of land included within the track in front of the land of the United States, disposable for other purposes. If the State disposes of the right to make the road, as I believe Illinois has done, to certain companies, the companies will own the land. If they have a right to locate two hundred feet, they will own land in front of the lands of the State and in front of the lands of the United States. Will not that be the result of the bill? It seems to me that the grant should be limited to at least so much land as is necessary for the road. It should not go beyond that, unless you mean to lead yourselves into the difficulty I have pointed out. A tract of two hundred feet is not necessary. There may be places where it will be necessary, but they will only occur occasionally. I think the passage of the bill will lead to some embarrassment. I throw out these remarks for the consideration of gentlemen, if we are to pass a bill which is to be our guide hereafter.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator from Massachusetts mistakes the provision of the bill. It does not grant the land, two hundred feet wide, to the State of Iowa, throughout the entire length of the road, but merely grants the right of way. The title to the land is not vested in the State, it is the mere right of way—the incorporeal right of way. It does not grant the right to the land itself; but it gives the State the privilege of making the road over this breadth of land—two hundred feet—for the whole length of the road, so that the road might be shifted, as might be necessary, within this range of two hundred feet. The right of way enjoyed will be the mere breadth of the track and so much of the adjoining land as may be necessary to occupy for an embankment, or excavation, or anything of that sort. In this particular, I believe the bill conforms to the bill passed in favor of the State of Illinois, and to other bills which we have passed. We passed several, I do not know how many, at the last session of Congress. I was then a member of the Committee on Public Lands, and concurred with the majority of the committee—which I think was unanimous on this subject—in reporting all these bills to the Senate. I apprehend, therefore, that there is no difficulty in regard to this matter. It is a mere grant of the right of way—an incorporeal right invested in the State.

After what has been the decision of the Senate on this subject for several years past, certainly at both sessions of the last Congress, and I believe at preceding sessions—after there had been a most emphatic and distinct expression of opinion by a very large majority of this body in favor of this policy, I did not suppose that I would have occasion to address the Senate on the subject. But I say now, as I have said before, that both as a member of the House of Representatives and as a member of this body, I have never given any votes with more satisfaction than those which I have given to accord to the new States of this Union that sort of coöperation and assistance which is comprised in bills of this character, by which we do not surrender one dollar from the public Treasury, for we obtain an equivalent by these concessions in the enhanced price of the reserved lands. When I give such votes, I believe that I am not only advancing the prosperity of the new States of the Union, but that I am contributing to the prosperity of the whole country. Every appropriation of this character which is made, conduces not only to build up the West and the East, the Atlantic States and the middle States, but moreover to enhance the resources of the Government itself; for my honorable friend from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] knows very well that the resources of the Government do not depend upon the amount we actually collect into the Treasury, upon the dollars and cents we bring to the public coffers, but upon the ability of the people of the country to submit to taxation. Now we have the hour of prosperity. Now the taxes laid on the people are light. But the hour may come when we shall be involved in war, when the condition of the country will be such that we shall have to call upon the people to go to the full extent of their ability in supporting taxation to meet the exigencies of the country and of the Government. Sir, in opening these railroads, we not only provide for facilitating the transportation of the mail, and of troops and munitions of war, but we enhance the wealth of the country, and we increase its population and its tax paying capacity, and therefore place ourselves in a condition to meet any exigencies in which the country and the Government may be involved, particularly on the occasion of war, which I trust is very remote.

I will not dwell on this subject. I shall vote with cheerfulness for this bill. The only doubt I have in regard to this entire matter is, as to whether the country is not running too fast in constructing railroads, whether there is not some danger of our embarking more capital in this sort of enterprise than the country can afford, and whether there is not some danger of involving ourselves in a railroad convulsion similar to that which occurred in England a few years since. If I have any hesitation whatever in regard to these appropriations, it is based on this consideration. I should much have preferred that my friends from Iowa should have consented to take the appropriation for one of these railroads at the present session and postpone that for the other railroad until a future day. But there is a great deal of propriety in the remark of my friend, that so far as one of the railroads is concerned, that from Keokuck to Dubuque, there is danger that the lands will be exhausted and taken up by the bill which we have passed making warrants assignable, to which, by the way, I was utterly opposed. With regard to the other railroad, extending entirely across the State to Council Bluffs, it is very well known that it passes over a very large portion of the State not now in course of settlement. I should have preferred it, then, if my honorable friends had consented to take an appropriation for one railroad, as I apprehend that the finances and business of the country may be exposed to some danger of a revulsion by reason of over-action and over-expenditure in this business of building railroads. But I am for the general policy, and shall vote cheerfully for this bill, and for all other bills of this character, unless I am restrained by the single consideration to which I have referred. I am opposed to the miserable practice of giving away the public lands. I am for holding them in our hands, and dispensing them for great and beneficent objects of national importance. With them I am for building railroads and canals, and for endowing seminaries; but I am not for dissipating them in the deplorable manner we did when we passed the bill giving bounty lands to I know not how many, perhaps to one half of the country. By that act there were a great many millions of dollars in a very great degree thrown away, and yet after you have given them the recipients come here and tell you that the gift is not worth accepting unless they can have the privilege of taking the warrants into the market and selling them for a mere song. If that immense amount in the aggregate could have been reserved and appropriated to objects of this character, it would have been a source of much benefit to the country.

I did not intend to address the Senate on this subject. I did believe that, after the expression of opinion and sentiment which we have had, discussion was unnecessary. If, however, any Senator desires to have this bill postponed for the purpose of giving it further consideration, I shall vote to postpone it, although I shall unhesitatingly vote for the bill itself.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not rise for the purpose of entering into any discussion of the merits of this bill. I understood this to be a bill intended to serve as a guide hereafter, and to be followed in other cases; it therefore seemed to me that it should be properly considered, and that its provisions should be such as should be satisfactory. In answer to my objection that two hundred feet is an unnecessary quantity, and may prove an embarrassment, the Senator from Connecticut says, it is an incorporeal right—that the grant is really nothing but a grant of the right of way—of the right of having a track. Now, let me ask the gentleman, whether the easement granted does not extend to one portion of the two hundred feet as much as to another? and if the coterminous proprietors of lands are not precluded from the enjoyment of any part of these two hundred feet? If, for example, the land of a gentleman is one hundred feet from this road, is he not required to erect all his buildings and improvements at that distance, although his lands come within one hundred feet of the track? Let me say to the Senator, that this will be found to be very inconvenient, both to the proprietors of the lands and to the proprietors of the road. My own impression is, that it embarrasses all parties; and that is the precise thing which I wish gentlemen most interested in the bill to consider. I wish them to look at it and see whether, instead of this being a useful provision, it does not embarrass everybody. So far as my observations have extended, people who have lands coterminous with a railroad, are desirous of bringing their places of business as near to the track as they can. They desire to enjoy the road with as little expense and inconvenience as possible. If a man was about to build a place of business, the last idea that would enter his head would be to place it one hundred feet from the track of the road, if he wished to avail himself of its advantages. I think the provision is attended with inconvenience everywhere; but it is manifest that the easement goes to the whole two hundred feet. As it extends to the whole two hundred feet, it precludes persons having lands adjoining the road from enjoying the benefit of the road without great inconvenience.

I hope gentlemen do not suppose that I have risen for the purpose of interposing any captious objection to this measure, or for the purpose of embarrassing it in any way. I think that that portion of the bill to which I have drawn attention should be examined, in order that it may be ascertained whether it will or will not be attended with inconvenience. Besides, I do not understand that there is any provision in the bill, limiting the time within which this road is to be commenced.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. Yes, sir; it is limited to ten years.

Mr. DAVIS. In order that we may have an opportunity of looking into the details of this bill, as it is to be made a model bill, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 21, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Mr. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ASSIGNABILITY OF LAND WARRANTS.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of the joint resolution No. 1, heretofore reported from the select committee, to which the same was referred, with an amendment explanatory of the act of 1850 granting to certain officers and soldiers bounty land, &c.; the pending question being on the motion submitted by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DUNHAM], to commit the said joint resolution and pending amendments to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and on which question the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FITCH] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FITCH. I have been requested to yield the floor for the purpose of going into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to take up the Mexican indemnity bill. But after the character of the debate of yesterday, no benefit would result from my doing so; though, if I supposed debate would be closed upon that bill, and it could be disposed of to-day, I should yield willingly.

Mr. Speaker, upon the bill now under consideration, which was reported by my colleague, [Mr. DUNHAM], I desire to say but a few words. Indeed, the objections which I entertain to that bill have been so ably urged by others as to preclude the necessity of saying much more. The bill purports to be an act amendatory of an act granting bounty lands to certain officers and soldiers engaged in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes.

I confess, sir, that I am astonished upon reading this bill that it should have emanated from the source from whence it came, for I believe that of all the members upon this floor the chairman of the committee [Mr. DUNHAM] who reported it is usually the last gentleman who could be charged with inaccuracies in the business which falls under his charge. He is, perhaps, ordinarily, as correct in legislative matters as any other gentleman here. This bill, however, notwithstanding his general accuracy, is a very crude and imperfect one,—a fact of which my colleague [Mr. DUNHAM] is doubtless as well satisfied now as any one else. The proof of this crudeness and imperfection may be found in the bill itself, and in the remarks of the chairman when he introduced it. After hearing the debate of Thursday, and in view of the diversity of opinion developed by that debate in the committee from which the bill came, it is a matter of surprise that any bill could be reported from it; and if any, certainly we could expect none other than one of the mongrel character of this.

The first section of the bill, as it stands, is highly objectionable. These objections may be obviated in part by the amendment which the chairman himself proposes—an amendment which he so singularly explained on Thursday, by assailing other members of the committee. But whether that section be so modified as to obviate its objectionable features or not, I consider its passage totally unnecessary. We have already passed, in this House, a bill making these warrants assignable. That bill is probably before this time engrossed, with amendments, in the other end of the Capitol, and will soon become a law.

The chairman of the committee, [Mr. DUNHAM], when he introduced the bill, advocated this first section as it is. But when he introduced the amendment, he, by implication, opposed it in its present shape, by advocating that amendment.

Mr. DUNHAM. The gentleman is mistaken. I did not advocate that section when I introduced it. I only explained it.

Mr. FITCH. Does the gentleman desire that I should read his remarks upon this section?

Mr. DUNHAM. I have no objection. I opposed that section when I introduced the bill.

Mr. FITCH. Perhaps my colleague's advocacy of that section was that of a lawyer in court, who feels it his duty to make the best of the case for his client; entertaining certain mental reservations, however—private opinions as to the moral character and guilt of that client, which he does not see proper to express to the jury.

The gentleman says he opposed that section when he introduced the bill. In this he is mistaken. He did oppose it when he introduced the amendment, and thus eat his own words—his own previous argument. I shall therefore pay no further attention to his argument in favor of this section. I will leave that Janus-faced argument to neutralize itself.

The second section of the bill provides for compensating registers and receivers of land offices for the location of bounty land warrants. This is, in my opinion, the most important section in the bill, considering the fact that we have already passed a bill making land warrants assignable. It recognizes the justice and necessity of paying those officers, in some manner, for the labor and trouble of locating these warrants. So far it is right and proper, but is a mere mockery, in the manner and extent to which it proposes to compensate them.

I must here briefly call the attention of my colleague [Mr. DUNHAM] to a portion of his own remarks in relation to this section of the bill, and upon which I shall take the liberty to comment as I proceed.

"It may be possible," he says, "that in some of the offices, labor has been done for which their fees and salaries have not been an adequate compensation." Not only is that possible, Mr. Speaker, but, as my colleague well knows, it is an absolute certainty, because the records of the returns of those officers, found in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, prove to a demonstration that the money which many of these officers have received is not sufficient to afford any compensation whatsoever for the trouble necessarily attendant upon these locations. It amounts to very little above their salary; and that salary, as we all know, will not feed and maintain themselves, independent of the support of their families.

He says, "If their case is meritorious, undoubtedly the Congress of the United States will be disposed to grant relief. And further, that 'they are left in the same situation as private claims.'"

He thus would leave these officers, in each individual case, to present an application to this House for relief in the premises; an application which, of course, like all other applications for similar purposes, must be referred to the Committee of Claims; and it is well known what is generally the fate of these applications. It is such, that no gentleman can desire to multiply them. They remain here generation after generation; in some instances without any report being made upon them, and in others with favorable reports, which are not acted upon.

He proceeds, at the same time, to state that "they have, in many instances, received almost the maximum which the law allows them to receive, without any payment whatever for the location of land warrants." But, in truth, they have not received near that amount. I do not know from what source the chairman derived the information with which he thus edified the House; but certain it is, that during the five years from 1847 to 1851, both inclusive, if the percentage of all the different offices had been equally divided, it would not have given these officers, including their salary, over $1,000 per annum. But bear in mind, this percentage was very unequally divided. Perhaps two or three offices in the State of Indiana approached nearer the maximum than any others. In fact, it is altogether probable, one (Fort Wayne) attained that maximum. But it was owing to peculiar local and temporary causes. Much of the land within these office districts was not subject to entry until about the commencement of the period I have mentioned. These lands previously belonged to the Miami Indians, and were purchased by the United States at so high a price, that in selling them the minimum price was fixed at $2 per acre. They were, moreover, not subject to entry with land warrants, unless the warrants were in the hands of the original holders; and then only on payment of the difference between the special minimum price and the general minimum of other lands. These lands were very soon nearly all disposed of; and the cash sales of these offices, and of course the percentage from such sales, have very much diminished; so that they have not since equaled, by a very considerable amount, the average of the cash sales of the offices in other States. The highest yearly amount of sales, within the five years mentioned, was in 1850; and the offices in Illinois sold more than those of any other State; yet the highest percentage there, even in that year, was but about $600.

I make these brief remarks in relation to the pay of these officers more for the purpose of eliciting full information, for that information is in the House, in the possession of one of my colleagues, than with the hope or expectation of myself imparting anything not already known to the House in relation to the matter.

Mr. DUNHAM. I will furnish the House that information, if the gentleman desires.

Mr. FITCH. The gentleman tells me that he will furnish this information to the House. I fear if he makes the attempt that anything he may in-part will receive a coloring from his own peculiar views and opinions upon the subject, so that the House will not have impartial testimony, as it should have to legislate with impartiality. With all due respect to the gentleman, I should much prefer that the information should emanate from another source, and I know that it is in the possession of another gentleman upon this floor.

My friend [Mr. DUNHAM] proceeds to remark, in justification of the proposition to limit the pay hereafter, for the location of these warrants, to fifty cents, that there is just as much trouble, and no more, in locating a forty acre warrant as there is in locating a one hundred and sixty acre one. This may be true; yet fifty cents is no compensation for locating in either case, when the average amount of trouble and extra duty at many of the offices in making the locations is taken into consideration. The labor in fact is quadruple that of the ordinary cash sales of land; and the per cent. which such sales would give is certainly small enough compensation for that trouble—small enough to suit even the professed rigid economy of the gentleman himself. I may as well anticipate an argument which the gentleman will doubtless use. He will allege that all the labor and trouble in these cases are confined to the register, and that the receiver is not legitimately entitled to any compensation.

But this is very far from being the case. The receiver's signature will be found attached three times to the papers in each case. This, of course, presupposes an examination of the papers to which his signature is affixed. He is compelled, moreover, to sign the monthly abstract and certify to its correctness, and how can he do this without a laborious examination of the papers in each case?

The application of these officers for that compensation which all willing to be governed by justice must acknowledge due them, has been already made, as is well known, to those who were members of the last Congress. Our action for their relief need not, therefore, await that prospective application which the chairman of the committee appears to contemplate in his opening remarks.

The application being for that justly due them, pay should not be withheld, for we have no right to impose labor upon our officers, duties as onerous as these, or any other duties, without a just compensation. Look, if you please, Mr. Speaker, for a moment at the operation upon these officers of the law providing for the distribution of bounty land warrants, and their location. It imposes duties upon the officers which necessarily compel them to clerk hire—a clerk hire sufficient to absorb their pitiful salary of five hundred dollars per annum; leaving them entirely without any perquisites from their office, and depriving them, in fact, of that very pay to which they would be entitled had there been no sales whatever; swallowing up the pittance which it is supposed each obtains, whether there be or be not entries in his particular office. The chairman of this committee very pertinently, as he fancies, asks this House if they know what amount will be required to compensate these officers, and give them the per cent. which they ask. After having admitted in this section that they were entitled to compensation, it should never be asked what amount is to be paid, if that question is designed to operate against the payment. The only question which should be asked, he has himself answered, which question is this, Is the demand just? He has answered that in the affirmative—he has acknowledged the debt—and the amount, whatever it may be, should not deter him or this House from its payment. He charges that one member of the committee, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL], was governed in his opposition to the bill by motives independent of any opinion entertained by him relative to the assignability of warrants. He charged that the opposition of that gentleman grew out of the fact that this second section was not sufficiently comprehensive and liberal in its provisions. Well, I grant you, perhaps the charge is correct; and if so, if that was the sole reason actuating the gentleman from Illinois in his opposition to the bill, that reason was good and sufficient. For this section, as I have already remarked, is the most important one in the bill, and if not properly framed to accomplish the object it professes to have in view, his opposition to the entire bill for that sole reason is justifiable.

Section four contains another and one of the worst defects in the bill, and one to which I desire to call the attention of the chairman; for if I convince no other member of this House, I shall have proved to him that his own hand-work is imperfect, scarce decently rough-hewed. Let me call his attention for a moment to this section, and to a certain feature in the bill, of which this professes to be amendatory. I have here the bill providing for the donating of bounty land warrants, approved September 30, 1850, and the bill amendatory thereto, introduced by my colleague, [Mr. DUNHAM.] In the bill of September 30, 1850, is found the following proviso:

"Provided, That whenever any officer or soldier was honorably discharged, in consequence of disability in the service, before the expiration of his period of service, he shall receive the amount to which he would have been entitled if he had served the full period for which he was engaged to serve."

The object of this proviso is manifest. It is, that the wounded, who have enlisted or volunteered for a given period, but have been discharged before the termination thereof, in consequence of wounds, shall be entitled to receive the same bounty lands to which they would have been entitled under the bill if they had served out their entire period. Compare that provision, for a moment, with the fourth section of the bill reported by my colleague, which I will read. Section four of this bill provides:

"That in computing the term of service of the officers and soldiers of militia, volunteers and rangers, for the purposes of this act, or of the act of which this act is explanatory, such term shall be computed from the time they were mustered into the service of, and paid by the United States, to the time they were discharged therefrom."

Thus cutting off many of the most meritorious class of those for whose benefit the law of 1850 was designed from any bounty whatever; because there are many instances where citizens volunteered or enlisted for a specified time, and were wounded within the first thirty days of the term of their enlistment, and discharged in consequence of those wounds. But this amendatory act would deprive all of this class of the bounty to which, of all men, they are most entitled. This feature of the bill I look upon as the most crude and imperfect—but the result rather of carelessness than design; for I cannot believe that my colleague, or any other member of the committee, would be willing to do injustice to that class embraced in the proviso, of those for whose benefit the original act was intended.

The sixth section also contains a defective feature, and one to which, if I am not mistaken, the attention of my colleague was early called. It is found in the latter part of the section, and provides that the warrants "may be located upon any lands of the United States subject to private entry at the time of such location." I am not sure, but there is a pending amendment to this section.

Mr. DUNHAM. There is an amendment, by adding thereto the words, "at $1 25 per acre," or to that effect.

Mr. FITCH. Then this section, if the amendment is adopted, is free from any objection of the character which I was about to urge. My objection to the section as first reported, had no reference to the permission given to locate warrants on any Government land, wherever situated, if the same permission had been extended to all warrants; but to the fact, that it would create a distinction in favor of these warrants, and against those issued for the benefit of those who served in the Mexican war; whereas they should be placed upon the same footing.

There are other objections, which I designed to urge when the bill first came up, but which, as I have already remarked, have been ably stated by other members, and I certainly shall not go over the same ground. There are still others, by no one yet mentioned, part of which may be misprints; for we cannot presume that this committee would report a bill, professing to be amendatory of another act, and insert references to provisions in that act, and clauses of the act, which have no existence. The last section contains a reference to a proviso in the second section of the original act, which section has no proviso whatever. This I say may be a misprint, and I submit to my colleague that he had better declare the whole bill a misprint, in view of the defects with which it abounds, and procure its reference to the Committee of the Whole, where alone it can be corrected. Or, better still, as we shall soon have a bill from the Senate meeting the purpose for which this bill was designed, that he lay this upon the table. I shall not, of course, make this motion, as there may be other gentleman entertaining opinions, and desiring to express them in reference to it, different from those which I have urged. But my declining to make the motion is not from entertaining any doubt that such would be the most appropriate disposition of the bill, for it is certainly one which in its present shape, is not likely to become a law.

Mr. CLARK. The grounds of my desire to present a few reflections upon the bill which is now before the House, will be found in the fact that the provisions of this bill intimately interest my constituents. Perhaps the people of no State will be more seriously affected by the provisions of this bill than those of the State which I have the honor to represent here; and this remark, Mr. Speaker, applies generally, not only to those who are now citizens of that State, but to all who expect to become citizens hereafter. And not only so, but there are those there who are personally interested in this bill; and it is upon this account that I propose briefly to consider some of the provisions both of the original bill and of the substitute. It will not be my object to travel over the whole ground, and consider all the sections and all the provisions which arise upon these two bills.

I was glad, Mr. Speaker, to learn that the chairman of the special committee which reported the substitute, sent up an amendment the other day to the first section of the bill, in reference to the mode by which the warrants shall be assigned. I think that it would unquestionably create great confusion if there should be thirty-one different modes of assigning land warrants, in accordance with the laws of each of the thirty-one States of the Union. Now, the very fact that you propose to make warrants assignable, presupposes another fact, that you mean to give them a marketable value; that you mean an advantage shall accrue to the warrantee as well as to those who shall purchase them. Now, sir, if they shall be attended with such clogs as will prejudice their value in the market, why then your original purpose is to that extent contravened and defeated. How would these warrants pass from hand to hand, except at a diminished price, unless they shall pass freely without any restriction, and under such circumstances that those who propose to purchase them shall know that their assignments are according to law? Where do these warrants go for a market, and where do they find purchasers? In the first place they find them in the cities of the East, and in the next place in the neighborhoods of the land offices in the various districts of the West. And there it is, as well as here, that they are purchased by those who expect to use and locate them upon the public domain. Will these purchasers, sir, give as much for these land warrants when it cannot be known, or if known, yet with great difficulty and uncertainty, whether they have been assigned according to law? And how shall they know unless they have the means of referring to the statutes of the different States, whether they have been assigned in the manner in which deeds are required to be signed and authenticated in the several States in which such assignment shall be made? It is impossible that the purchaser can know with that certainty, upon which reliance may be placed; and whenever a warrant is offered to him, his natural answer would be, "that inasmuch as I have something to risk in reference to this matter, I cannot, and will not, give as much for it as though there was that certainty upon which I can rely." This will be his natural reply. But, if the mode prescribing the transfer of these warrants is made by the Secretary of the Interior, it will be uniform; and within, perhaps, less than twenty days after the mode is prescribed, it will be known in all the distant parts of the United States. There will be none ignorant of it. I think, then, decidedly, that the amendment offered by the chairman of the select committee, [Mr. DUNHAM,] in regard to the mode of assignment, is one in itself wise and expedient, and that it ought to be adopted. The next provision in the substitute which has been offered, to which I shall call the attention of the House for a few moments, is that in reference to the compensation of those who have heretofore performed service in the location of land warrants without pay. The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. FRICK,] who last spoke, has so fully investigated the facts of this case, that I shall not stop to consider them, but merely the principle involved. I believe it is an admitted fact, that those who have rendered services in your land offices, in the location of land warrants, have not received that compensation to which their services are entitled; and now I ask, upon what principle it is that those who have heretofore performed services for this Government, shall be left without compensation? I ask the chairman who reported this substitute, why it is that those who have already performed services are left to leanness and injustice, when those who are hereafter to perform like services are to be paid for their labor? Can the gentleman tell us what is the distinguishing principle between those who have rendered services, and those who are to render service, in reference to compensation? Is there any? I wish to call the gentleman's attention to that point—I wish to fasten his mind upon it; and I wish him to satisfy the House what distinguishing principle there is between those officers who have performed a service, and those who are hereafter to render the same service. If there is any, it is in favor of those who have already performed the service. Why, have they not performed them in view of the honor, the justice, and the good faith of this Government? Whenever you have invited individuals to labor for you, and have provided no specific compensation, is it to be tolerated as a precedent, or as a matter of principle, that they shall go unrewarded? I hear gentlemen say that they were under no obligation to have retained their office, and have performed the service which was required of them. Are they to be disposed of in this summary way—I might say in this inequitable way? Whenever you absolve yourself from your good faith—whenver you tread your good faith under foot, and do not perform that which you are reasonably expected to perform towards your citizens, that moment you do an injury to the citizens, which will recoil upon you, and which you will be made to feel. You hold out no inducement to faithfulness and devotion on the part of those upon whom you call for labor. Why, it seems to me, if there is anything in a declaration of this kind, that it applies only to those who are to hold office hereafter. When you have refused to grant them compensation, they will then know what course to pursue; they will know that you do not mean to reward them, and they will protect themselves. But, such is not the fact with reference to those who have already performed the services. I will read a brief extract from a letter to me by one of the officers of the land office in my district. He says, in addition to the above, referring to his memorial—"We beg leave to add, that of the new warrants for which there is no compensation allowed, there have been located at this office, during the last two weeks, nearly one thousand; the labor attending which would employ three competent clerks." I can vouch for the truthfulness of this man.

Mr. DUNHAM. I should like to know from the gentleman at what place that officer resides.

Mr. CLARK. Dubuque, Iowa. Now, let gentlemen bear in mind, there is a limit fixed by law beyond which the compensation of your officers cannot go. I have no objection to a modification—to a scaling of their compensation, if the House think proper to do so; but I contend for the principle, the main principle, that they shall be paid as much as they reasonably deserve. Another fact, that may not be known to gentlemen here who are not intimately conversant with affairs of this kind, is, that the land officers are allowed nothing for rent and nothing for clerk hire, nothing for fuel or stationery. They have to provide themselves with all of these things, and their salary is but $500, and the other remnant of their compensation is made up of percentage upon moneys received. Now you have set afloat a large amount of land scrip, with which your public domain is to be entered upon, and, as a natural consequence, you have curtailed, in a great measure, the purchase of lands with cash. Therefore there is no percentage, and the compensation of your land officers is reduced to a mere pittance. As it is now, it is hardly equal to the crumbs that fall from their master's table. These land officers have performed service in the location of land warrants from the time of the passage of the original act granting bounty lands to those who served in the Mexican war, which was in February, 1847, up to June of that year. For all that was done between these periods no compensation has been received. I believe there was an act passed in June of that year by which they were allowed a certain compensation upon warrants thereafter to be located. Again, the act of 1850, which has thrown wide-cast the greatest amount of warrants, provides for no compensation to them for their location. At any rate it provides for no compensation, and this is the kind of warrants to which the author of the communication from which I have read alludes. Now, I ask whether it is not hard enough that a man should earn his bread under the curse, to wit, by the sweat of his brow, and get his bread when he has earned it? I ask if gentlemen sitting here as a grand inquest in a matter of this kind, to do justice to our fellow-citizens, are to turn them away with such great injustice as cannot fail to awaken jealousy and rankling of heart? I am sure that it would be a violation of the plainest principles of justice—it would not be Jew—it would not be Christian. I do not believe it would be Mohammedan. I am sure it is not law. Why, sir, the Jewish law would not suffer the mouth of the ox to be muzzled that treadeth out the corn, and the Christian precept is, that the laborer is worthy of his hire. I do not know exactly what the Koran says upon the subject, but the law says that a man who has served his fellow-man shall receive as much as he reasonably deserves to have. The principle is not altered when the case is between an individual and the Government. Because you are sovereign or law-makers, do you lift yourselves above law and the principles of law? Because you cannot be reached in the execution of the law, therefore do you tread the principles of law under foot? I will believe it when I see it, and never before. I believe this Government has heretofore observed good faith in reference to those who have performed services for it, and I do not believe that it is yet ready to cut loose from that principle, and to say that they will have no more of it. I shall not dwell upon that section of the substitute, which provides for the issuing of a new batch of bounty land warrants. I will content myself simply with saying, that as at present advised, I am against that provision. I am glad that there is one section of this bill which I can approve, and that is the 6th: "That the warrants which have been or may hereafter be issued in pursuance of said act may be located upon any lands of the United States subject to private entry at the time of such location."

This is as it should be, and this is the most important part of this bill. There is no portion of it which is so material to the new States, and I may say to all the States—at any rate, to all those in the old States who expect to emigrate and become settlers in the new. Here I shall feel it my duty, in a cursory manner, to recur to the argument made by the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. TUCK,] and also to the argument made the other day by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BISSELL.]

The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. TUCK] seems to plant himself upon what he perhaps would denominate a principle in antagonism to speculators. It seems that speculators are a prominent class of men in the mind of the gentleman from New Hampshire. He would pursue a policy which would cut short the speculators from obtaining the public lands. He says, that if you suffer land warrants to be located upon the public domain to an extent as wide as they are surveyed and offered in market, the lands will fall into the hands of speculators. I can assure the gentleman from New Hampshire, that all his reasoning upon this point is based upon false facts, and therefore the force of his reasoning is neutralized and destroyed. The gentleman resides in the midst of the granite hills of New Hampshire. I reside in the midst of the great prairies of the West, where there are large tracts of public lands. I think I know the operations of this thing. I think I can with safety say, that speculations in lands have ceased long ago, except as here and there an individual may have entered a small amount upon speculation. Why, they have found it a losing business years ago. It has been perhaps ten to fifteen years since capitalists embarked money in this way. They found there was no profit in it. They found that the payment of taxes—the payment of agents, and the slow and gradual rise in value of the public lands, would not warrant the operation. Suppose, for the sake of argument and by way of illustration, that individuals go to the West, where there are large tracts of public lands, and make large entries, and hold these lands with a view to derive profit from them when they shall rise in value. Why, does not the gentleman see at a glance, that as long as there are such vast tracts of land in market which can be had at the minimum price of one dollar and a quarter per acre, nobody is going to give ten, five, or two and a half dollars an acre for the land which is held by speculators? This is the course which the thing takes. An individual who wishes to purchase land for his own benefit, will go upon the public domain, and he will get the land which is to be had at the cheapest price. I assure the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. Tuck] that the practical operation of the thing is not as he has stated. There is here and there an individual who wishes to speculate in public lands, and attempts to do it, but they are like angels' visits, in one respect at least, few and far between.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 23, 1852.

NEW SERIES....No. 22

Mr. TUCK. Although the statement by the gentleman from Iowa of his opinion, that the extension of the right of location of land warrants upon the newly-surveyed lands of the West, is entitled to much weight with me, yet it is not sufficient to control my vote. I am aware that representatives from the West may be presumed to be better acquainted with their local interests than we of the old States are. I will state, for the benefit of the gentleman from Iowa and others, that the opinion I expressed the other day, against the policy of opening the infant settlements of the far West to be overrun by the holders of these warrants, was founded, in part, upon information and opinions derived from gentlemen who understand the interests of the West as well, and are as anxious to promote it, as the gentleman from Iowa can be. I stated the other day, and now say again, that I believe that the new settlements of the West, in their early infancy, are hemmed in by speculative holders of land, and are retarded in their prosperity thereby, being unable to defend themselves against the ill effects of land being held in large amounts by non-resident speculators; and I believe that opening the newly-surveyed lands to these land warrants will increase the evil. The older portions of the West, where there are lands enough for the use of the warrants, have the ability to defend themselves. I have given the reasons of my opinion, and I have the satisfaction of knowing, that men who live in the West, and occupy eminent positions, agree with me in what I have said. I would refer the gentleman from Iowa particularly to the opinions of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Bissell] who spoke the other day upon this bill, and did me the honor to indorse the opinion I had expressed, of the bad policy of opening the new lands to invasion by speculating holders of land warrants.

Mr. CLARK. I do not know what the knowledge of facts is on the part of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Bissell] to whom the gentleman from New Hampshire refers. I do not know precisely the reasons of the policy which the gentleman from Illinois urges upon the House. I only speak of the facts, either positive or negative, which have transpired within the sphere of my own knowledge. Now, there would be no prejudice to Illinois, that this limitation should be observed, this restriction had in the location of warrants, because the lands in Illinois have been surveyed and were in market long ago. Such is not the fact in Wisconsin and Iowa, and other new States and Territories. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. Tuck] undertook to illustrate his case the other day by the fact, that in his travels in Minnesota, he fell in with two men, who had removed, if I mistake not, from the State of Illinois, and that their motive for doing so was, because they were surrounded with lands which were held by speculators. Now, I will venture the opinion, if these men should be put upon the stand and cross-examined, it would be found that they never owned an acre of land in the western country in their lives. I know not where they went from, but there is a class of men in the western country—I neither question their doings nor their motives—who are never satisfied except they are upon the extreme frontier. They do not want to be surrounded either by speculators or anybody else. They want an open sea—they want the whole region for their own use. They do not wish for society or institutions. There are a few such—very few, and they are in the exercise of a right, which is their own, when they seek the most distant locations.

Mr. COBB, (interrupting.) I will call the attention of the chairman of the select committee [Mr. DUNHAM] to an inquiry, which I wish to make: I desire to know what he means by the proviso to the seventh section of this bill, "Provided that the benefits of this act shall not accrue to any person who is a member of the present Congress?"

Mr. DUNHAM. I will state, in explanation, that there is an error in the printing, and the proper correction will be made.

Mr. COBB. As the chairman of the committee has determined to amend it in its present form, it supersedes the necessity of my commenting upon it.

As to the remarks of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. Tuck,] a few days ago, in relation to the third section of this bill, I am satisfied that if the gentleman had had the question of granting bounty lands to meritorious citizens of the United States in his possession as long as I had it during the last Congress, he would see at once the necessity of the passage of a bill to construe the third section of the original law. I am satisfied that the Secretary of the Interior has put a wrong construction on that portion of the bill, from the fact that I had the bounty land bill in my charge, as a member of the Committee on Public Lands, for seven months during the last Congress, and feeling deeply interested in it, I sounded the opinion of almost every member of this House upon the subject. The third section of this bill will remove the difficulties which the Secretary of the Interior has thrown in the way of meritorious individuals whom it was designed to include in that bill. He ought to be satisfied by this time that he has also placed a false construction on the law, by prohibiting the transfer of the bounty land warrants; for both branches of the Congress of the United States have said that that was not their intention when they passed the measure. So satisfied am I that the construction of the Secretary of the Interior upon that point was wrong, that if I had been disposed to purchase a land warrant from an individual I should have done it, and relied upon the courts of the country to sustain me in the position that these land warrants were truly and properly assignable under the original law. Both branches of Congress have now decided that question.

I feel satisfied that the Secretary of the Interior will see the error into which he has fallen, and will hereafter be cautious not to throw obstacles in the way of meritorious individuals so as to prevent them from receiving their warrants, or to prevent the transfer that was contemplated by the law.

Mr. CLARK, (resuming.) I believe that I should be safe in saying that it is my opinion that ninety-nine out of a hundred of all of the land warrants which have been located in northern Iowa, have been located by settlers. They come and search out their lands, and they either have land warrants in their pockets, or after they have ascertained the tract upon which they desire to settle, they go and purchase warrants and settle on that land as farmers, to develop the resources of the soil and add to the strength of society there. That is the course that warrants have taken. I do not believe that the statement which I have made is extravagant; if it is, I am willing to stand corrected by other gentlemen from my neighborhood who have as much knowledge on this subject as I have myself.

Sir, you have set afloat a large amount of land scrip, as it may be called—warrants, the design of which is to absorb, as far as they will go, the public lands. You design by this system and by the transfer of these warrants to enable your citizens to purchase and so to make themselves homes. Now, I ask, for what reason or sound policy you should restrict the location of them? You say upon the face of a given warrant, "This document is good for one hundred and sixty acres of land;" but yet gentlemen seek to say that it shall be of land of a certain value. You say upon the face of your scrip that the land is worth one dollar and a quarter per acre, and by a note at the bottom you say, in substance, that it shall only be worth seventy-five cents. Is not this a contradiction in terms? Besides that, it would be a partial system. Those who obtain their warrants first from the Department go and make a choice of their lands, while those who come afterwards are compelled to take up with inferior lands, and finally with those that are merely refuse. Is there any justice in making this distinction? Why should you deal less bountifully with those who are a little after in point of time, than you do with those who happen to be a little ahead in point of time? Is there any justice—is there anything which commands the approbation of gentlemen upon this floor in a system of that kind? Why will you not secure to all the same chances and benefits? Your original design in the creation of bounty land warrants was to benefit a certain class of men who had performed meritorious services for the country. It was supposed that they had claims upon the gratitude of their country, and you issued warrants in order to compensate them for those claims. But when you make the warrants assignable, it is not only for the benefit of the original warrantee, but also for the benefit of the assignee, and it is unquestionably so intended. Well, if you restrict them to certain limits, it prejudices not only all the settlers in the new States, but all who intend to emigrate from the old States.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, (interposing.) The morning hour has now expired, and I therefore move to proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table. I shall follow up that motion by a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ANDREWS. Is that motion in order?

The SPEAKER. It is competent to arrest the business of the morning hour when the morning hour shall have passed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would suggest to the gentleman from Virginia and to the House, that if they wish to expedite the perfecting and passage of this bill and to economize time, it would be better for us, by unanimous consent, to refer the bill now to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and make it the special order of the day for Monday next. That is the only way in which we can fix the bill so as to be satisfactory to all parties.

Mr. BISSELL. I beg to make another suggestion, in addition to the one which the gentleman from Tennessee has just made. I would suggest that this bill had better be laid upon the table at once; and if I can obtain the floor for the purpose, I will make that motion. It can never pass this House, I am sure. I believe the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Clark] has the floor, and I ask him if he will yield me the floor to make that motion.

Mr. CLARK. I cannot do it.

Mr. BISSELL. I would remark that a bill upon this subject passed the Senate yesterday, which appears to be precisely in that form which will meet the views of a majority of the members of this body, and it is useless to spend any more time on this bill.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The question was then taken upon the motion to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table, and it was agreed to.

Mr. BAYLY then moved that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; which motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended, and the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, in the chair.)

MEXICAN INDEMNITY BILL.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the first business in order was the consideration of the President's annual message.

Mr. BAYLY. The Mexican indemnity bill being an appropriation bill, I believe has precedence, and I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to, and the committee accordingly proceeded to the consideration of the bill to provide for the carrying into execution, in further part, the twelfth article of the treaty with Mexico, concluded in Guadalupe Hidalgo.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the pending question was on the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. MARSHALL] to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON,] and that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. BAYLY. Mr. Chairman, I had expected that I should never be called upon again to address the House of Representatives upon the subject of this bill. At the first session of the last Congress, a bill, precisely similar to this, except as to the amount appropriated, was reported from the Committee of Ways and Means unanimously. It underwent a thorough discussion in this House, when everything was brought to its attention which has since been advanced, and it passed by a vote of 123 to 36—there being fewer votes against the bill, than are usually given against all the appropriation bills, no matter how unexceptionable in themselves. The bill then went to the Senate, and was again discussed there, and it passed that body almost without opposition—I mean so far as the vote was concerned. At the last session of Congress, the matter was again brought before this House by the unanimous report of the Committee of Ways and Means. It was again thoroughly discussed, and so meagre was the opposition to the bill, that its opponents could not even get the yeas and nays upon its passage.

Again, at the present session of Congress, the Committee of Ways and Means, composed almost entirely of new members, after having examined the subject thoroughly, have, as I am told, by the unanimous vote of that committee, again reported this bill. Now, it would seem that further discussion in reference to this subject was superfluous; but it seems a certain gentleman has taken upon himself, under date of the 22d of November last, to address a long memorial to the President of the United States, calumniating the Secretary of State—the financial organs at the last Congress of the two Houses of Congress—and as necessary consequence, the two Houses of Congress themselves which sustained them. And that gentleman, with an assurance peculiarly his own, has asked the President to file that memorial among the archives of the Government. Now, I take it for granted that the President of the United States will not give it any such destination. The keeper of those archives is paid by the Government for a different purpose than to preserve calumnies upon the Secretary of the Department to which he is attached, and upon the financial organs of the two Houses of Congress, and by consequence, as I have said, upon the two Houses themselves. But, this memorial has also been laid upon the table of every member of the two Houses, and I have found by the debate here, that it has created some impression upon the minds of a small portion of the members upon this floor. Such being the case, I feel it to be my duty to notice his pretended statement of facts.

In relation to his calumnies upon myself, I shall say nothing. I have lived for forty years without a reproach upon my private character in vain; it is in vain that the people of my State, and the Legislature of that State, have expressed their confidence in me in almost every form in which it could be done; it is in vain that the House of Representatives have expressed a similar confidence, and that to such an extent as few of my predecessors have enjoyed, if the calumnies of Duff Green, and his associates will affect my character in the estimation of anybody whose good opinion is desirable.

Before I proceed to the consideration of this memorial, for the information of this House, composed as it is to a large extent of new members, and who may not be as well informed in relation to the subject, from its inception, as I am, I feel it my duty to refer to the history of the mode of payment of these Mexican indemnities.

By the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, we came under an obligation to pay to the Mexican Government fifteen millions of dollars, in five payments—the first in hand, and the other four in annual installments, with interest. The first payment was made down. So much of it as was paid in money, was paid by an arrangement with the Rothschilds. By that arrangement Rothschilds were to receive from us an amount in Treasury notes, at par, equal to the sum paid by them. At that time Treasury notes, as I believe, were at a premium; so in the first payment, made by Mr. Polk's administration, the Government received no premium, but rather paid one.

The first installment was paid by Mr. Walker, by an arrangement with the Barings. By this arrangement the Barings were to pay the money and allow us four and one half per cent. for conducting the transaction. These two payments were made under Mr. Polk's administration. The next was negotiated under General Taylor's administration. He intrusted the negotiation to Mr. Letcher, our Minister at Mexico. The great difficulty which he encountered in making that payment, as disclosed by his dispatches to the Government, I fully showed in a speech upon a former occasion. At one time he despaired of making any arrangement; but at last he contracted with Howland & Aspinwall to pay a portion of the installment at three per cent., and the remainder with the Rothschilds at three and a half per cent. The management of this matter was taken, as I have before explained, by General Taylor's administration, from the Secretary of the Treasury and transferred to the Secretary of State. So it stood when Mr. Fillmore came in. Mr. Webster contracted with the Barings, Howland & Aspinwall, and Corcoran & Riggs, to make the payment at three and a half per cent. At the time of making the contract, that was the only offer before the Secretary of State. The Rothschilds had previously submitted a proposition to give a premium of four per cent., but according to the terms of the proposition if not accepted before the 20th of May, it was to be considered as withdrawn. Subsequently they extended the time till the 1st of July; but the 1st of July passed without making the contract; and by the terms of the proposition itself, it was withdrawn. The only proposition, therefore, which was before the Secretary of State when this contract was made, was that of Corcoran & Riggs, Howland & Aspinwall, and the Barings.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the gentleman allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. BAYLY. I beg to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ALLEN,] and all others, that I hope they will not interrupt me. I fear I shall not be able to conclude what I have to say in my hour, and I cannot be interrupted.

Mr. ALLEN. I only desire the gentleman to allow me for but a moment.

Mr. BAYLY. I cannot. I was proceeding to say that the arrangement made by Mr. Webster was less advantageous to the contractors than the best one of Mr. Walker. Mr. Walker got four and a half per cent. for the first installment, but at that time the export duty in Mexico upon specie was ten per cent., while at the time of Mr. Webster's arrangement it was but four and a half per cent., as Duff Green states it, but five and a half per cent. as I believe the fact to be. Mr. Webster's arrangement was better than that made by Mr. Letcher at three per cent. for a part, and three and a half per cent. for the remainder; and yet Mr. Letcher maintained that his was better than Mr. Walker's.

I come now to the proposition of Duff Green, which Mr. Webster would not entertain at all. That proposition was to authorize the Mexican Government to draw drafts upon our Government for the amount of the installments, and for them to allow us four and a half per cent., which was stated to be the Mexican export duty upon specie. Green and his associates, as they state, were to receive three and a half per cent., which makes eight per cent. Now, I undertake to say, and to prove here, that that proposition was the worst for the Mexican Government, which was made. I shall come to its effect upon our Government after a while. Eight per cent. was to be paid before Mexico got a dollar.

But Green says in his memorial that Mexico would have made money by this arrangement, because exchange between the city of Mexico and New York was from ten to fifteen per cent. If it was ten per cent. they would gain two per cent., and if it was fifteen per cent. they would gain seven per cent. Now I have upon that point to say, that the man who says that the real exchange—I do not mean the nominal but the real exchange between the city of Mexico and New York—is either ten or fifteen per cent., propounds an absurdity, and nothing else. Everybody who knows anything upon the subject of finance, knows that, in the absence of legal obstacles, the real exchange between two places is no more than the cost of transporting the specie, including insurance, commission, and freight.

Now, sir, what is the cost of transferring specie from Mexico to New York? There is the export duty of four and one half per cent., as Green states it. An eminent banker, formerly a member of this House from New Jersey, [Mr. KING,] informed me that the cost of the transportation of specie from Mexico to New York is about one and a half per cent. Including the export duty of four and a half per cent., if such it be, the net exchange between New York and Mexico is six per cent.; and for the reasons I have stated, the man who says that a silver dollar is worth fifteen per cent. more in New York than it is in Mexico, propounds a simple absurdity. Now, sir, I know that in Mexico exchange on New York is quoted, when at par, at about fifteen per cent. And why? Because London is the centre of the moneyed operations of the world, and all exchange is quoted with reference to the London standard. In New York the nominal exchange on London, when it is in fact at par, is quoted at nine and one quarter per cent. Why is this? It arises from the different standards in the two countries. A pound is $4 44 in London. It is $4 84 in the city of New York, making a difference of forty cents in the pound, which is nine and a quarter per cent. within a fraction. When, therefore, you say that exchange between New York and Mexico is fifteen per cent., it is composed of the per cent. I have referred to of the export duty and the cost of exporting specie, viz: the six per cent. added to the nine and a quarter, making about fifteen per cent.; but the idea that the same dollar is worth fifteen per cent. more in New York than in Mexico, is, I say again, a simple absurdity.

Then, sir, Mexico would have got but the six per cent. in reality. By Green's arrangement she was to pay eight, and of course it was less advantageous to her than the proposition the Government adopted, which pays dollar for dollar in the city of Mexico. But, as I have heretofore shown, Mr. Green's proposition was not only worse in a pecuniary point of view for Mexico, whose guardian he would set himself up to be, but our Government could not have agreed to it without the negotiation of a new treaty. His proposition proposed to change the place, the time, and mode of payment, and to take a less amount than the treaty stipulated for. Now, it has been asked over and over again—it was asked by my colleague yesterday—cannot the two Governments vary this? Certainly the two nations can; but they can only do it in the mode established by their Constitutions; and as my time will not permit me to elaborate this point, as I could desire, let me put a single illustration: Suppose by a treaty negotiated between the United States and Mexico in the regular form by the two Governments, (I change the position of the two parties to make it more clear to the minds of members,) Mexico was bound to pay us, in the city of Washington, a given amount of money upon a given day: could the President of the United States—could the Secretary of State—could any other power than that which made this contract, vary it as to the time and mode of payment, and the amount to be received? Could the President receive a less sum at a different place and time? Why, the very statement of the proposition contains its refutation. Besides, sir, the mode of payment which Green proposed was the alternative mode contained in the treaty as negotiated, and by a solemn vote of the Senate was stricken out. The treaty, as sent to the Senate to be ratified, contained this provision:

"Certificates in proper form for the said installments, respectively, in such sums as shall be desired by the Mexican Government, and transferable by it, shall be delivered to said Government."

The Senate struck the article out.

Mr. Buchanan, in his dispatch of 18th March, 1848, to Messrs. Sevier and Clifford, says:

"It cannot be denied, that the twelfth article, as amended by the Senate, contains a positive and unconditional obligation on the part of the United States, to pay the Mexican Republic the sum of $12,000,000, in four annual installments of $3,000,000 each, commencing one year after the ratification of the treaty by the Mexican Government; negotiable or transferable certificates cannot, however, be issued for that amount."

Now, sir, will anybody say that the Executive alone can authorize a mode of paying these installments, which the Senate refused to consent to, and struck out of the treaty?

Why, sir, the Mexican Government preferred to have the whole indemnity of $15,000,000 paid down; but our Government, speaking through its constituted authority, would not agree to pay down, but agreed to pay it in installments, at stated periods. And the treaty-making power having decided that we would not pay faster than in annual installments, and upon the day named in the treaty, has the Executive alone power to say that we will anticipate this payment—that we will make them faster than the treaty provides for?

But, sir, to prejudice this case, these Greens have gone on to show that the Barings have made enormous profits. Their first error is in their statement of the amount of the third and fourth installments. They state that the third was $3,540,000, and the fourth $3,720,000, making the two together, $7,260,000. Now it so happens that the third installment was $3,360,000, and the fourth $3,180,000, making $6,540,000—a difference of $720,000. Here is a man who has been negotiating and writing about the payment for two years of a sum, the amount of which even he does not seem to know. But $720,000 is less than a million, and Duff Green only deals in millions. I have already explained that the real exchange is about six per cent. The contractors pay us three and a half, and it leaves to them two and a half per cent., which in Mexico is the usual percentage in similar transactions. It is precisely the percentage which Mexico, in the treaty of February, 1843, agreed to pay our claimants under that treaty, and Mexico and our Government had fixed upon two and a half per cent. as the usual allowance in such cases. My own opinion was, at the last Congress, and so I expressed myself, that, in consequence of the rise in the value of silver, compared with gold, they would not make two and a half per cent.; and the result shows that they have not realized that much by exchange. But it is said that we have enabled the Barings, by this arrangement, to shave the Mexican Government. How have we done it? It is said they are borrowing money of the Barings and pledging this indemnity. Suppose they are, it is their own act, for which we are not responsible. When the Barings go on the day of payment to demand of them a receipt, (our treaty requires it shall be paid in gold and silver, and the contract our Government has made in pursuance of this treaty requires that it shall be made in gold and silver,) and they go to the Mexican Treasury with anything else—with their notes or bonds—the Mexican Government have the power to refuse it, and the Barings will have forfeited the contract unless they pay in the funds stipulated in the treaty, or in something else equally acceptable to the Mexican Government. It is not in their power to force anything else upon them. As to the shaving, although the Barings are the agents to pay, the Government of the United States is the party to pay, and Mexico can hypothecate or mortgage this obligation of ours to pay to any other bankers. All this is an attempt to impose upon a House, a majority of whose members may be supposed not to have turned their attention to the subject.

Besides that, this proposition of the Greens was less advantageous to the Mexican Government than any other. I say it came before the Executive with a dark suspicion upon it—a darkness which has increased from the hour it was made down to this very day; and this is a part of the argument to which I wish to ask the especial attention of the American Congress. Why did the Mexican Government agree to give Duff Green and his associates three and a half per cent. to get our Executive to accept their terms? They had their Minister here. Does any one believe that if this was a bona fide transaction, that the Mexican Government supposed that they could approach the American Administration under more favorable circumstances through Green and his associates, as their agents, than by their own accredited Minister? Why give them $210,000 to prevail upon the American Administration to accept their offer, when they had nothing to do but to request their own Minister to make the application to the American Government?

Again, sir, Mr. Clayton had told the Greens, as his own letter published by themselves shows, that he could not negotiate with anybody in reference to this matter, but the Mexican Minister. How does it occur, then, that this man is engaged, with the bonus of two hundred and ten thousand dollars, to get the American Government to accept an offer from the Mexican Government? But that is not all. Mr. Clayton had made—and to this I ask the especial attention of the House—to the Mexican Government a more advantageous proposition of the same kind, through their Minister, which that Government rejected. Mr. Clayton, in his letter, says:

"Sir: I have this moment received your letter of the 14th instant, and, in reply to it, I have the honor to inform you that, some time in the latter part of last winter, or early in the spring, General Duff Green informed me that Mr. Marks could effect an arrangement with the Mexican Government for the payment of the two last installments of the Mexican indemnity, under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, reserving to the United States a premium of four and a half per cent., the money to be paid on drafts by the Mexican Government upon our Treasury. I had, previously, endeavored to negotiate with the Mexican Minister at Washington for the payment of the second installment (for which an appropriation had been made by Congress) upon this basis, my object being to take the matter out of the hands of speculators, by paying the money directly to the Government of Mexico. An offer through Mr. Rosa to the Mexican Government to pay it that installment, deducting the export duty (five and a half per cent.) on specie in Mexico, was declined by that Government."

The Mexican Government declined it. They had but a short time before declined to deduct the export duty on specie. What was our Government to think, when they came forward shortly afterwards through agents and agreed not only to deduct the export duty, but to pay three and a half per cent. additional to these contractors? Mexico declined a more favorable proposition when officially and authoritatively made, and yet these people come here and pretend to say that they had the authority of Mexico to propose a far less favorable arrangement. They are not only to receive three and a half per cent. more than the export duty, but a discount of the interest upon their drafts. Here is Marks's letter:

MEXICO, July 13th, 1850.

MY DEAR GREEN, (Washington city.) I have at last succeeded with the Mexican Government, and secured the two installments due by the United States, amounting to, with interest, $7,260,000. I inclose you copy of my proposal, which has been accepted, and the liquidation of the debt. The drafts of the Mexican Government against the Treasury of the United States are forwarded this day to Don Luis de la Rosa, the Mexican Minister at Washington. You will call on him on receipt of this; obtain and have them accepted by our Government. On their being accepted, you will pay into the Treasury of the United States, of the said drafts, $312,631 57-100, being at the rate of four and a half per cent. for difference of exchange, as agreed upon between your father and Mr. Clayton. You will see by this arrangement I have saved the United States over $70,000, as Mr. Letcher has invariably drawn for the installments already paid, at the rate of three and a half per cent.

It is very probable that the Mexican Government may not require any large sum of money for some time to come. We can always obtain cash for the drafts accepted by the United States, less the interest—six per cent. per annum—which the Mexican Government allow to us. Thus you see we make by the contract three and a half per cent.—say about $210,000; but out of this amount I will have to pay $70,000 here, which will leave $70,000 for each of us.

It is of the highest importance that the drafts should be accepted forthwith by our Government. Should there be any great delay, the arrangement will fall through.

I hope your father may be in Washington to assist you, as he had made all the necessary arrangements with Mr. Clayton and other members of the Cabinet for this business, and I have staked my reputation with this Government on the result, and the drafts must be accepted. We ask nothing of our Government, not even to advance a cent; on the contrary, we give them a positive profit of $70,000. After the drafts are accepted, you will return them to M. Luis de la Rosa, less the amount to be paid to the United States, (say $312,631 57-100,) and wait further instructions from me.

You will please answer this immediately on its receipt, directing care of Clason & Vies, New Orleans, to be forwarded to me; and if possible send a telegraphic dispatch to them before the 25th instant, to be transmitted to me, if merely to say "all is right."

I shall remain here, unless something of moment takes place, until I hear from you.

I am, your sincere friend,

J. D. MARKS.

P. S. As we will not require any banker to advance, nor no one to assist us, we cannot, of course, give any portion of this contract, nor money to carry it through.

Why did Mexico refuse, through their own Minister, a more favorable proposition, and then offer to Green and his associates three and half per cent. to effect what they declined? I now call attention to the letters he says he sent to the Secretaries of State and Treasury—imperial letters, such as no man but an Emperor would write, and none would expect to carry out who had not an imperial treasury. He proposes to negotiate for the whole valley of the Gila, and speaks of making a railroad from there to the Pacific; of filling that valley up with American settlers; and, to facilitate him in this magnificent scheme of his in negotiating with the Mexican Government, he asks, modestly, that our Government shall intervene in Mexican party politics. He asks our Executive to conciliate the powers that be in Mexico to aid his negotiation! Now, sir, I have heard a great deal about intervention of late—a great deal as to the intervening of our Government in the domestic policy of another nation; but I had never expected they would be called upon to intervene to advance a negotiation of Duff Green.

Here is the letter:

No. 1.—Mr. Green to Mr. Clayton.

WASHINGTON, March 12, 1850.

Hon. JOHN M. CLAYTON, Secretary of State:

DEAR SIR: Believing that the Gila route is better than any other line for a railroad connecting the Mississippi with the Pacific, I have engaged the services of a gentleman who has resided many years in Mexico, who has rendered important services to the Mexican Government, and has the confidence and good will of the Mexican authorities. He has been to Mexico, and met me in New Orleans, where he awaits further instructions.

He tells me that the Mexican Government is in great want of money; that the agents of Santa Anna and other disaffected persons are plotting a revolution; and that it is important that the present Government should be enabled to realize in anticipation the remaining installments yet to be paid under the treaty with Mexico.

Herrera and his administration are our friends. Santa Anna is, and ever will be, our enemy. If Herrera's government can be enabled to negotiate the installments yet to full due, it would give them the command of money, and thus strengthen our friends in power, as well by giving them money as by depriving Santa Anna and his partisans of the fund which they would otherwise receive if they can subvert and seize the Government before those installments are paid.

Under these circumstances, the Mexican Government desire to hypothecate the remaining installments, and will be compelled to submit to great loss, unless they can obtain from this Government acceptances on their bills, payable when an appropriation for the payment of these installments shall be made by our Congress.

The gentleman who is charged with my negotiation is an American citizen, well known in Mexico. He is a merchant in good credit, and can raise the money to purchase the installments yet to be paid, if you will accept the bills of the Mexican Government, payable as stated; and believes that such arrangement will greatly promote his negotiations for a large grant of lands, including the valley of the Gila, and extending the whole length of the northern boundary of Mexico, with the right of occupation and of making a railroad.

If he can obtain such a grant, the road will soon be made, and the grant densely inhabited; in which case the American population on that line will give to the Mexican ample protection from the American Indians, and thus relieve the United States from a large expenditure now required by the Mexican treaty. By accepting the bills as proposed, you serve our friends, do much to prevent a revolution in Mexico, which will bring our enemies into power, and secure to American citizens the profits of the negotiation, which must otherwise go to the agents of foreign bankers, who use their wealth to the prejudice of our people.

I hope, my dear sir, that these considerations will induce you to authorize me to say to the person who is charged with the negotiation, that you will accept the bills of the Mexican Government, as we desire, deducting from the payment the amount of the export duty on bullion.

Yours truly,

DUFF GREEN.

Well, sir, as this doctrine of intervention is one that is occupying the attention of the American public very much, I wanted to see what answer our Secretary of State gave to that letter. When I inquired at the State Department, they told me that not only had no such letter been received, but that it was impossible it could have been; for there was no trace of it upon the files of the Department. I have the letter here from the Department showing that it was not received, and that it is not possible that it could have been received. It is in these words:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

WASHINGTON, 17th January, 1852.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of yesterday, inquiring if there is a letter on file in this Department under date the 12th of March, 1850, purporting to have been addressed by Duff Green, Esq., to John

M. Clayton, Secretary of State. In reply, I have the honor to inform you, that I have directed a careful search to be made, the result of which, as reported to me, is, that no such letter is now or ever has been on file in the Department. The system in use here for the transaction of business, seems so well adapted for the security of the public and that of individuals, and imposes such checks and responsibilities upon persons employed in the Department, that it may be said to be impossible for any letter to have been received at the Department without being found either on the file to which it belongs, without being mentioned in the register which is kept of all letters received, or in the register of the Keeper of the Archives, with whom all letters are lodged when answered. The fact, too, that there is no draft or record in the Department of any reply to the letter to which you refer, renders it still more certain that it could not have been received.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
DANIEL WEBSTER.

To the Hon. THOMAS H. BAYLY,
House of Representatives.

That is not all. In one of his memorials, he tells you that Reverdy Johnson had agreed to carry out his arrangement. Here is Johnson's reply to his statement:

WASHINGTON, 30th January, 1851.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 28th, inclosing me a copy of a memorial of I. D. Marks to the present Congress, and calling my attention to a paragraph in it, in which my name is used, I have just received.

After stating what is said to have occurred between the late Secretary of State and the memorialist, in relation to the Mexican indemnity installments yet due, it then states that "subsequently, your memorialist was also assured by Mr. Johnson, then Attorney General, who had been charged by the late President with the payment of part of the previous installment, that if your memorialist could make such an arrangement with the Mexican Government (the arrangement referred to in a preceding part of the paper) it should be concurred in, and carried out by the Government of the United States."

This passage greatly surprises me. I have no recollection of ever having seen the parties at the time alluded to, or at any other time; and certainly, if mistaken as to this, never gave him, or to any person in his behalf, any such assurance; nor could I, with the least propriety, have given any. The subject was one with which I had no official concern. It is true that I did negotiate for a portion of one of the installments, but it was by the especial request of President Taylor, and with the assent of the Secretaries of State and Treasury. With that negotiation my connection with the subject terminated, and I, of course, had not, nor could I suppose any one here thought that I had, the slightest authority to give any such assurance.

With regard, your obedient servant,

REVERDY JOHNSON.

W. W. CORCORAN, Esq., Washington.

This memorial of Marks was Green's production.

This is still not all. Here is a memorial the Greens sent to the Committee of Ways and Means at the last session, and I will read one paragraph of it. It is written by them, in the handwriting of one of them, and placed in my hands by them:

"Sir: As it has been falsely rumored that the Mexican Government has abrogated the contract made with Mr. Marks, I beg leave to submit to your committee that the most recent advices from Mexico are contained in the instructions from Don Manuel Payno, Minister of Finance, to Don José Antonio Luaces, the confidential agent of the Mexican Government, now here waiting to reconvey the drafts, when accepted, to Mexico. These instructions clearly show that the Mexican Government, so far from abrogating Mr. Marks's contract, is very anxious that it should be carried into effect, and hopes that the drafts for the fourth installment, at least, will be accepted. In his last letter of instructions to Mr. Luaces, the Mexican Minister of Finance, says: 'The affair is very delicate, and I therefore recommend to you the greatest prudence and discretion, since I do not wish that it should be interpreted (that our purpose was) to oppose the operations of Mr. Webster, and much less that there should be manifested directly or in any way a mistrust, which does not exist. I also wish that it should not be said, as it is said, that individuals of the Government are to receive for themselves a part (of the profits) of the indemnity; for besides that this is not certain, it is an offence to the Government and the individuals who compose it. I charge you, therefore, that giving to the affair the aspect of good faith and frankness, which it has and ought to have, you proceed in everything with the greatest tact and discretion.' * * * I recommend that you use all necessary circumspection not to wound Mr. Webster, using for your guidance the fact that I have seen myself forced to negotiate with the agent of the Barings for some advances on account of the indemnity."

What these asterisks cover I do not know. From the character of what is disclosed we may conjecture the character of that which it was thought necessary to conceal. Why all this mystery in so plain a transaction?

Before leaving the memorial of the Greens to the President, I desire to call attention to the question of veracity which they say exists between Mr. Webster and myself. On the 10th of February, 1851, the Senate passed a resolution calling upon the President "to communicate to the Senate, if compatible with the public interest, all the information communicated to him by the Mexican Minister, M. De la Rosa, relative to the drafts drawn by the Mexican Government on the Treasury of the United States, under the contract made by that Government with I. D. Marks, and the wishes of the Mexican Government in relation thereto."

To this Mr. Webster replied, "that there is no information of the character referred to in this Department, nor is the Secretary of State aware that Mr. De la Rosa has at any time communicated to the President or to this Department any such information." And to this letter of Mr. Webster he annexes a letter of the Mexican Minister to him, covering four letters from the Mexican Government to their Minister. Well, what did I say? Subsequently, on the 26th of February, in reply to Mr. Burt, I am reported to have said "there has been a good deal of correspondence between the Mexican Minister, the Mexican Government, and Mr. Webster." Did Mr. Webster say that there had been no correspondence? In his message to the Senate, he transmitted correspondence attached to it. It is thus evident there is no issue between Mr. Webster and myself.

For the reasons I have given, the Government ought never for a moment to have lent its ear to the Greens.

Sir, our Government has had some dear-bought experience in conducting money transactions with Mexico through irresponsible persons. It will be recollected, that in 1844 our Minister in Mexico informed us that the April and July installments of the indemnity due our citizens from Mexico, under the treaty of 1843, had been paid to our agent, and paid in money, which the Mexican Government had great difficulty in raising. After this dispatch came in, these claimants went to the Treasury to get their funds, but they were informed that nothing had been received. The Mexican Government had our receipt for the money. Our Minister said that it had been paid, and had been paid in money.

The following is the part of Mr. Shannon's dispatch:

"The installments which fell due on the 30th of April and the 30th of July last, under the convention of the 30th of January, 1843, were paid to the agent of the Government appointed to receive and transmit the same, on the 27th ultimo. I am inclined to believe this Government will hereafter be more prompt in meeting its engagements under the above-named treaty than it has heretofore been; and if it should turn out otherwise, it will be owing to a real inability to raise the means. I am advised that it was with the utmost difficulty that this Government was able to raise the money to pay the two last installments."

That is what Mr. Shannon says.

I have here also the official dispatch of the Secretary of State of Mexico to Mr. Shannon:

[TRANSLATION.]

To his Excellency Wilson Shannon, Envoy Extraordinary, &c., of the United States of America.

NATIONAL PALACE, MEXICO, September 2, 1844.

The undersigned, Minister of Foreign Relations, has the honor of informing his Excellency the Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, that on the 27th of last August he was apprised by his Excellency the Minister of Finance, that the quarterly installment due on the 30th of April of this year, and that which fell due on the 30th of July last, had been paid to the agent appointed by the Government of said States, according to the terms of the Convention of January 30, 1843, and that this notice had been delayed in consequence of the vast amount of business which engrossed the attention of that Department.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion, &c., &c.
MANUEL CRESIENCIO REJON.

In November, 1844, Mr. Shannon again addressed his Government upon the subject of the payment of the Mexican installments. It is full of complaints of Mexico. In it he informs our Government that the October installment had not been paid, and he complains bitterly of it. Yet he says not a word about the July and April installments, which he before had informed his Government had been paid.

In consequence of the assurance that it had been paid, and paid in money, the American Congress passed the following provision:

"For paying the April and July installments of the Mexican indemnities, due in 1844, the sum of $275,000: Provided, It shall be ascertained to the satisfaction of the American Government that said installments have been paid by the Mexican Government to the agent appointed by the United States to receive the same, in such manner as to discharge all claims on the Mexican Government, and said agent to be a delinquent in remitting the money to the United States."

After the passage of the law to which I have referred, Mr. Polk, through Mr. Slidell and our Consul in Mexico, Mr. Black, instituted an inquiry in Mexico to ascertain, if possible, whether the contingency provided for it had happened.

He became satisfied it had, and the money was paid.

The appropriation was on the condition that the money had been received—that the Mexican Government had been fully discharged; and that our agent was delinquent in sending the money to the Treasury. Now, sir, who was that agent? It was Benj. E. Green, one of these memorialists. Here is the authority: On the 26th of April he was appointed by Mr. Tyler the agent to receive the April installment, and he importuned the Mexican Government almost daily for the payment of it, from the time it became due to the 24th of July. In his letter of the 24th of July he protests in the strongest manner against the failure of the Government of Mexico to pay the April installment. From the 24th of July nothing is heard from him. Why did his importunities cease from that day if the money had not been paid, as he says it was not?

It is true Green, by his power of attorney, was authorized to appoint a sub-agent. But he was on the spot, and ought to have been advised what his sub-agent was doing. Besides, he had positive instructions from the Treasury Department. Here they are:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 26, 1844.

SIR: It is the wish and direction of this Department that any payment made you, under the convention with Mexico, may be transmitted hither under the arrangement made by General Thompson with the house of Hargous, Brothers & Co. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JNO. C. SPENCER, Secretary Treasury.

B. E. GREEN, Chargé d'Affaires of the U. S. A.

From this instruction, it will be seen that it was contemplated by this Government that Green was to receive the money, and the agency of Hargous & Co. was to transmit it. But instead of that, he employed E. Voss to receive the money; and as it has turned out, I am told, greatly to our loss, that he employed him in his individual character, and the house of Hargous & Co. have refused to be bound for his acts.

I know that Judge Bibb, in January, 1845, stated that in the appointment of Green it was not designed to revoke the power before given to General Thompson. But we can judge of the intentions of the Government in 1844, as well as Judge Bibb, for we have their written instructions, which speak for themselves. Besides, this is a question of law, and not of intention; and surely no one will maintain that the power of attorney to Green was not a revocation of the prior one to Thompson, who had left the country. Green so understood it, for in his letter to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the 18th of May, 1844, he regards it as necessary to inform him that Voss was empowered to receive the money.

Green, in his letter to Mr. Calhoun of the 25th of January, 1845, says that the money never was paid except by orders upon an empty treasury. In other words, it was not paid at all. But, Mr. Slidell shows that by the arrangement which was made with Tayleur, Jamison & Co., the Mexican drafts were to be drawn in their favor, and they were to provide for the installments in "effective money." That is the terms of the arrangement which was acceded to by the Mexican Government on the 27th of August, the day they say the money was paid. The arrangement, apparently, was a very advantageous one to the house of Tayleur, Jamison & Co., and was a hard one on Mexico. It gave them in drafts upwards of $100,000 more than they have to pay in "effective money." And it was with reference to it, I suppose, that Mr. Shannon spoke when he referred to the difficulty Mexico had had in raising the money.

If, as Green says, his sub-attorney took drafts upon an empty Treasury, and gave a receipt in full without waiting to see whether they would be paid or not, he violated the treaty.

The treaty provided that the money should be paid in gold and silver; and was made so to avoid the danger of paper orders. The convention was first agreed upon for a payment in notes upon the American Treasury, and to pay down the whole indemnities at once. This article was changed by a subsequent convention from a paper payment to a hard-money payment, by a prompt payment of the whole extended into five years' quarterly installments in gold and silver. This was the convention; and after that, to take orders on the Treasury was illegal, and doing what the second convention was made to prevent. Green and his substitute had no more right to vary this treaty, than Mr. Webster has to depart from the letter and spirit of the present treaty, in the mode they ask.

I do not know whether the money was ever paid or not. Mr. Polk's administration decided that it had been paid, and that our agent was delinquent. Suppose it was not, still Benjamin E. Green is not relieved.

Why did he not inform Mr. Shannon of this? Why did he permit him to send the information that it was paid, when he says that it was not paid? Mark you, that Green was the principal agent and had preceded Shannon at that Court, as chargé d'affaires. Shannon had just arrived, and had been accredited but twenty days before. Green was his Secretary of Legation; and I have seen at the Department the original of Shannon's dispatch, saying that the installments had been paid in money, and that there had been great difficulty in the raising of it; and that dispatch was in the handwriting of Benj. E. Green. If, as he says, the money had not been paid, why did he not set our Minister right, whose dispatch he copied, the contents of which he therefore must have known?

Now, sir, I say, if the money had not been paid it was Green's duty so to have informed Mr. Shannon, and thus have prevented his being imposed upon by the Mexican Government. Will Green say he did inform him of the character of the payment? This will not relieve him. For if he found that Mr. Shannon was about to communicate false information to our Government, in respect to a matter in which he was the attorney, he ought to have remonstrated; and if that would have done no good, he ought to have apprised his Government of the true state of the case, even if it were necessary for him to resign for that purpose.

It may be asked, what motive had Mexico in wishing to deceive our Minister, and through him our Government? Mr. Green's own letters explain it.

Mr. Calhoun had instructed Mr. Shannon, in the event that the April and July installments were still unpaid, to "address a note immediately to the proper officer of the Government, calling his prompt attention to the subject, and urging, in the most decided language, the necessity of a strict compliance with the stipulations of the treaty." In other words, to make a peremptory demand. It seems from Green's letters that the Mexican Government were apprised of this. In his letter to Mr. Bibb of the 18th of December, 1844, he says:

"I have reason to believe that the note of the Mexican Minister of Foreign Relations of the 2d of September, was written in consequence of an impression that the Mexican Government, by failing to pay the installment which fell due on the 30th of April, had forfeited its right to pay by installments under the Convention of 1843, and that Mr. Shannon was going out with instructions to demand the whole amount of the indemnity under the Convention of 1843."

In his letter to Mr. Calhoun of 16th May, 1844, he says:

"Sir: I have the honor to inform you that no money has yet been paid on account of the installments due on the 30th ultimo. I send you (Nos. 1 and 2) a note which I addressed to the Minister of Foreign Relations upon the subject, and his reply, in which he promises it shall be paid on the 7th instant. Notwithstanding this, they still hold back, with their usual excuse, 'to-morrow,' expecting to hear from day to day of the annexation of Texas, which will offer an excuse for not paying at all."

The circumstances sustain these statements. Shannon arrived there, and on the 27th of August notified the Secretary of Foreign Relations that he was there, and asked when he should present his credentials. On that very day the Minister of Finance sent a dispatch to the Secretary of Foreign Relations saying that these installments had been paid. Mr. Shannon was received by the President on the 1st of September. On the 2d of September the Secretary of Foreign Relations informed him, in an official note, that they had been paid. Mr. Shannon is lulled, and he does not make the demand he was instructed to make. Green says they wanted to stave off the payment as long as they could, in the momentary expectation that Texas would be annexed, and when she was, that they could get clear of paying altogether. They wanted to dally and dally and to take the chapter of accidents. The circumstances show that they did not wish to get into a rupture with the United States. There was an impression upon their part, as Green himself states, that he came there to make a peremptory demand. He allows the Minister to be deluded, and, in consequence, fails to obey his instructions, by a compliance with which we would probably have obtained the money. The agent of the Government is his Secretary of Legation, and copies the dispatch in which he says it was paid. The American Government, under the supposition it had been paid, appropriated the money. Why all this? When he was cognizant of all the facts, why did he allow the Mexican Government to impose upon our Minister? Why, by imposing upon him, lull him into contentment, and prevent his making the demand which our Secretary of State had instructed him to make? Why play into their hands, and give them the coveted delay? Do men betray such trusts—do men connive at such deception upon the Minister, whose Secretary he was, and upon the Government whose agent he was—do they practice this sort of wrong upon their own Government, and play into the hands of a foreign Government, merely from a love of infidelity, without any other consideration than a love of infidelity? And these are the men who came before the American Government to attack the financial organs of the two Houses at the last Congress—the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of this. I am a lawyer of some experience. At a very early period of life, my State placed me upon the bench; and I have seen many a man consigned to the penitentiary upon slighter proof than establishes gross impropriety on Benjamin E. Green's part. These are the men who, when their schemes are defeated by an American Congress, come here to malign and traduce men, against whose fair names calumny itself had never before whispered aught of suspicion. Why should I care about what they say? No one escapes them who is in the way of their nefarious schemes. What man who has ever enjoyed the confidence of the people, to any extent, has not by turns been blackened by the praises of Duff Green, and complimented by his abuse? He was by turns the eulogist and traducer of General Jackson—the eulogist and traducer of Henry Clay—I will not say the eulogist and traducer of the humble individual who is now addressing you, because I shall not associate my name in company with those distinguished men. The abuse of Duff Green resembles the dews of heaven in this, and in this alone, that it falls alike upon the just and unjust, and nourishes all upon whom it falls. His praises, like the shirt of Nessus, consume whom they cover. Finding him the traducer of the best men of the country, I should feel flattered by being found in the same category, if it were not that I know, at the same time, there are none so high that he does not attempt to reach them with his malignant shafts, yet that there are none so low that he has to stoop to heap his calumnies upon them.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, obtained the floor—

Mr. GREY. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield me the floor for the purpose of making a personal explanation?

Mr. JOHNSON. I will yield the floor for a personal explanation, but for no other purpose.

Mr. GREY. I desire to read to the House a letter from Duff Green, in explanation of the connection of his son with the payment of the installment due by Mexico to our citizens as indemnity under the treaty of 1844. It as follows:

WASHINGTON, 20th January, 1852.
DEAR SIR: The correspondent of the Baltimore Sun insinuates that my son, Benjamin E. Green, was interested in, or profited by, the default made by the agents of the United States to pay one of the installments due under the former treaty with Mexico; and for which they gave a receipt in 1844. And I am told by several persons, that it is the purpose of Mr. Bayly to make that charge, by way of impeaching the integrity of my son.

The facts of that case, I believe, are as follows: Mexico, being indebted to certain citizens of the United States, agreed to pay them in annual installments. General Thompson, who was then the Minister of the United States in Mexico, appointed Messrs. Hargous & Co. the agents for the United States, to receive the money and transmit it to the United States. When General Thompson left Mexico, my son was left in charge of the Legation, and, under instructions from Mr. Calhoun, then Secretary of State, continued Hargous & Co. as the agents for the United States. When the installment in question became due, the Government of Mexico was in a state of revolution, and not able to make payment. Shortly after Governor Shannon reached Mexico, as Minister, the Mexican Government tendered Messrs. Hargous & Co. a draft for the amount, which, after consultation with Mr. Shannon, they accepted and receipted for. It is alleged that the draft was not paid, and that, as Hargous & Co. did not in fact receive the money, they were not bound to pay it over to the United States. Whether they ever received the money or not, I do not know; but you will see that my son was in no way interested in the payment, and that he had no control over it; because before the receipt was given, he had been superseded by Governor Shannon.

It is proper to state, that diplomatic intercourse was soon thereafter suspended between Mexico and the United States, and that the war followed soon thereafter; and it may be that the money was not paid to Hargous & Co.; but they ought to have the protested draft, if they did not get the money.

Should Mr. Bayly make the charge, as I am told he intends to do, I ask, as an act of justice to my son, who is absent, that you will have this letter read to the House, as a true exposition of the facts.

Very respectfully,
HON. BENJ. EDWARDS GREY,
House of Representatives.

Mr. BAYLY. If the gentleman from Tennessee will allow me, I will show him—for I am prepared to do it—that there is not a word of truth in that letter. I have got the official documents to do it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I wish to inquire whether these interruptions will come out of my time?

[Cries of "Oh no!" "Certainly not!" and "Let him go on!"]

The CHAIRMAN said that the interruptions would come out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. GREY. I wish not to interfere in the controversy between the gentleman from Virginia and Duff Green. With any personal controversy between them I have nothing to do. I desire merely to say a few words in relation to the agency of Benjamin E. Green in Mexico. It seems that he was sent there as Secretary of Legation to General Thompson, who was then Minister of the United States in Mexico. The Mexican Government owed to the citizens of this country a large amount of money. The Government of the United States, by a treaty made during the Jackson administration, assumed the payment of that debt to the individual citizens to whom the Mexican Government was indebted, and the Mexican Government agreed to pay the money to the Government of the United States in annual installments. General Thompson, our Minister in Mexico, appointed Messrs. Hargous & Co. the agents of this Government to receive that money and receipt for it. Well, General Thompson left Mexico, and Benjamin E. Green, as his Secretary of Legation, was left in charge of the legation; and he, as this letter states, at the request of Mr. Calhoun, then Secretary of State, continued Hargous & Co. as the agents of this Government, to receive and receipt for the money due to it. When the last installment became due, the Government of Mexico was in the midst of revolution and unable to make the payment; but shortly after the arrival of Governor Shannon, as Minister from this country, they tendered to Hargous & Co. a draft for the amount, which, after consultation with Governor Shannon, was accepted and receipted for. This was done on consultation with Governor Shannon, who succeeded General Thompson as Minister, and who on his arrival in Mexico superseded Benjamin E. Green in the charge of the legation. It is alleged that this draft was never paid, and that Hargous & Co., never having received the money, were not bound to pay it over to the Government of the United States. Now, if the records of the State Department show the fact that Benjamin E. Green had nothing to do with the taking of that draft, but that its acceptance was the result of a consultation between Messrs. Hargous & Co. and Governor Shannon, how can the fault be charged to him that that draft has never been paid? If it can be shown that Hargous & Co. receipted to the Mexican Government on taking this draft, after the arrival of Governor Shannon in Mexico, I know that the gentleman from Virginia will release Benjamin E. Green from any blame as to his course in relation to the matter. I know he will admit that the authority of Benjamin E. Green, who was left in charge of the legation when General Thompson left, terminated with the arrival of Governor Shannon.

Mr. BAYLY, (interrupting.) I know the gentleman from Kentucky by character; I know that he is utterly incapable of doing injustice to anybody, and he does me but justice when he supposes that I am incapable of doing injustice to Benjamin E. Green, and that, if it can be shown that I have done so, I will make the amende. I will do so. I will say to the gentleman, however, that I am familiar with this subject, and I assure him that he has been imposed upon by that letter as to the facts in this case, and that the receipt was given before Governor Shannon arrived as Minister in Mexico. Shannon on the 27th of August made known his arrival to the Government. The Minister of Finance informed the Secretary of Foreign Affairs on the 27th of August, prior to Shannon's presentation, that the money had been paid some time before, and that it was the pressure of business alone that had delayed the announcement.

Mr. GREY. Does the Mexican Government now contend that that draft was paid?

Mr. BAYLY. That is a very long matter. It has been investigated, however; and if I get time I will go into the whole matter.

Benjamin E. Green's power of attorney in this matter was not revoked by the arrival of Shannon; and Shannon, in a letter to the commission, expressly states that he had nothing to do with it. I have got all the facts here, and if I have an opportunity I am prepared to bring the whole of them before the country. I had not time to do it in my hour.

Mr. GREY. Do I understand the gentleman to say that Hargous & Co. said they had never received for this money?

Mr. BAYLY. They not only denied that they had received it, but they satisfied the Government that they had not done it; and four hundred thousand and odd dollars were allowed to them by the Mexican Commission here, without any reduction of the $270,000, because the Government was satisfied that they had not received that money.

Mr. GREY. If I am not greatly mistaken, the Mexican Government showed that they had a receipt from Hargous & Co. for the money. My understanding of the matter is, that Hargous & Co., as the agents of this Government, gave a receipt to the Mexican Government for the money due, but that they had not received the money because they gave the receipt for a draft which has never been paid.

Mr. BAYLY. The gentleman is mistaken. One ground upon which they claimed exemption was, that Mr. Voss, formerly a member of the house of Hargous & Co., was made the agent by Green, and that he gave the receipt in his individual capacity.

Mr. GREY. Then the fact is, that Hargous & Co. were the agents of this Government, but that their clerk, Mr. Voss, received this draft from the Mexican Government and receipted for it.

Mr. BAYLY. Green employed Voss; Hargous & Co. did not.

Mr. GREY. Then, if that be the case, the Mexican Government have no right to say that they have paid the money, because they have no receipt for it from the agents of this Government, Hargous & Co. No one in Mexico had a right to give a receipt for that money, except Hargous & Co.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to consume but a very small portion of the time of this committee in the investigation of the subject now under consideration. Although I presume it is not strictly in order to discuss this subject legitimately before the committee, yet I suppose it may be considered so. Nevertheless, I shall, to some extent, confine my remarks to the bill under consideration. I confess that the scene we have just witnessed, and the one which was witnessed in this House on yesterday, are rather extraordinary ones. Now, I have said that I would have nothing to do with the controversy between the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] and the Greens, or General Green and his son, and I intend to have nothing to do with it; but when we reflect for a moment, it will be apparent to some gentlemen upon this floor, and to others, when I refer to the discussion which took place during the last session, in relation to this matter, who it was that made the first assault, and who it was that dragged General Green and his son into this discussion. It will be seen whether they thrust themselves before the House, or came voluntarily here as parties in this matter. When we go back to the discussion which took place during the last session of Congress upon the question of appropriating three millions of dollars, how does the matter stand? We find that because these gentlemen tried to effect a negotiation for the payment of that installment of the Mexican indemnity, they were denounced in this House. Now, does it come with a good grace—is it very becoming for a statesman, occupying the high position which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] occupies, to travel beyond the limits of this Hall, to take up an individual and drag him before this House for the purpose of denouncing him in terms the strongest which the English language is capable of furnishing? But, as I have said, it is not my purpose to meddle with this controversy between General Green and General Bayly. They may fight it out. On this occasion General Green, and his son especially, has been brought before this House, and charges have been preferred against him by the gentleman from Virginia. Then, at the conclusion of his speech, he informs the House and the country that he is a lawyer of some experience, that he has served as a judge, and that upon testimony weaker than that which he has adduced upon this occasion against Benjamin E. Green he would have sentenced a man to the penitentiary. Why, this would be a violation of one of the fundamental laws of this Government. An individual has a right to be heard by himself or by means of his counsel. He is entitled to have an impartial jury, and an impartial judge, to decide in his case. But upon this occasion the prosecutor, jury, judge, and all are embodied in one person, and General Green and his son have been tried, convicted, and sentenced to the penitentiary by that person. Now, this is anti-American; it is directly at war with republican institutions, and in conflict with the fundamental law of the land. But for the purpose of making himself more clear, he holds up Green as a traducer and calumniator. That in times gone by he had even slandered and traduced General Jackson. Sir, I am well aware that I can say nothing to add to the fame of that illustrious man—a renown that will stand so long as an American heart beats with one pulsation of patriotism. It is not for me to pronounce a eulogy upon his name; but if we were to go back and hunt up all the individuals who had denounced the course of General Jackson and his principles during the last war, he would find a pretty large company to go with General Green in this respect. But why hold up General Jackson, who lives upon the pages of history with a fame above all other men—a fame that will outlive the assaults and shafts of calumny, from whatever quarter they may be sped—why then thrust forward Duff Green in this matter, because he did not happen to agree with General Jackson upon some questions? Has not the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] said about as hard things of General Jackson on former occasions as Duff Green ever did? It seems to me that he has. And I think the gentleman from Virginia is not the man to pronounce eulogies and hold up General Jackson's great character for the purpose of aiding him in his denunciations of others as the calumniators of General Jackson. Now, I repeat again, that, so far as this controversy is concerned, I intended to have little to do with it. But, as insignificant a man as Duff Green is, it seems that the gentleman from Virginia has been a good deal roused by him. There is a good deal of the gentleman from Virginia, physically, and I will add mentally, too. His mental powers are enclosed in a good deal of flesh and blood, it is true; but we have upon this occasion seen him physically and mentally roused to his utmost capacity. We have seen his wrath, physically and mentally, poured out upon even so insignificant a character as Duff Green or Benjamin E. Green, as the case may be. But I think he has been roused upon this occasion to make a display, rather than to produce facts which can make up any tangible argument against the Greens. However, this is a matter which he and General Green may settle between themselves. One thing is certain, there is considerable discrepancy between the facts he presents to the committee, in the bitter assault he has made upon this individual, which he has not been able to reconcile. There seems to be a tender point which the gentleman from Virginia evidently dislikes to touch upon, and he therefore assaults General Green upon another point, thereby diverting the public attention from the point which is so tender to him.

Mr. BAYLY, (interrupting.) The gentleman speaks of a point which is tender to me. Will the gentleman from Tennessee be good enough to tell me what that point is?

Mr. JOHNSON. I inferred it from the gentleman's argument.

Mr. BAYLY. But what is that point?

Mr. JOHNSON, (resuming.) If the gentleman will hear me till I have concluded my remarks, I shall come to it after a while.

Mr. Chairman, when we come to examine this matter closely, what connection had General Green or Benjamin E. Green with this transaction? Did they propose to make a contract with the Government? Not at all. Has the gentleman from Virginia produced any proof that they did propose to contract with this Government? Not a word. But he has assumed that they proposed to be contractors, when they did not. What, then, becomes of his whole tirade? What becomes of this long catalogue of epithets, which he has poured forth against these men, because they dare hold a correspondence with the Mexican minister, in relation to the best arrangement possible for the payment of this money? Why, is he for this to be held up before the American people, and denounced by every opprobrious epithet which the English language can supply? Is General Green a contractor, or has he proposed to become a contractor? Not at all. Why, then, abuse him? Why lug him into this discussion? Why hold him up before the country? Is it because the gentleman from Virginia wants to have the existing arrangement carried into effect, no matter what the consequences may be? It seems to me that this last is clearly the reason. And the gentleman from Virginia assumes to himself the prerogative of instructing—not only of instructing, but absolutely of dictating what shall be done in relation to these installments, who shall pay them, and how they shall be paid. That gentleman made an argument a few days since in relation to this matter; and what was it? He urged that this bill should be passed immediately, and passed in the shape in which it is; and why? He says that the time is drawing nigh when this money must be paid over to the Mexican Government. And the inference at least is, that unless the appropriation be made immediately for paying that installment, the result will be a great loss to the Government. Why, sir, some twelve months ago the same argument was made in this Hall. But the gentleman attempts to prove that this is wholly an Executive transaction, and he makes an issue upon that point. Now, let us examine this for a moment, and see how the matter stands. I offered an amendment, to convey my ideas of this thing, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the money to the Mexican authorities; and did I thereby propose to take it away from the Executive power? If it belongs to the Executive to conduct this transaction, does not the Secretary of the Treasury belong to the Executive Department as much as does the Secretary of State? And if the money be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury, would it not be as much an Executive transaction as if paid by the Secretary of State? I think so. What is the argument of the gentleman from Virginia upon this subject? He says that during General Taylor's administration, a controversy arose between Secretary Clayton and Secretary Meredith, not as to who should handle the money, not as to who should pocket the profits to be made by the operation, but as to who should escape the responsibility of directing the payment. Mr. Meredith did not want to be troubled with it—Secretary Clayton wanted to escape the responsibility—both wanted to get clear of it. But after the reorganization of the Cabinet, how did the matter stand then? We find after Mr. Webster had come in as Secretary of State, and Corwin as Secretary of the Treasury, the scramble in relation to this Mexican indemnity assumed a very different character. It was not as to who should get clear of the responsibility, but who should make the payment, who should handle the cash, and who should pocket the proceeds. I have been informed that a Cabinet meeting was held, and it was at length agreed that the Secretary of State was the most competent and suitable person, and because his position connected him more directly with the foreign relations of the country. What does this argument prove? It proves that with one Cabinet there was a dispute as to who should get clear of responsibility, and with another Cabinet as to who should take the responsibility and pocket the profits. What is the conclusion to be drawn from this? Is not the conclusion clear and irresistible to every sound, thinking man, that this House should hold the purse-strings of this nation, as well as originate all bills creating revenue? We are responsible directly to the people, and should not shrink from that responsibility. We should come up and say, in the law, who shall transact the business connected with the payment of this money. Are we afraid to do it? Are we afraid to take the responsibility, we, the sworn Representatives of the people—the guardians of the public Treasury? Are we so fearful of responsibility that we cannot merely indicate, in the act under consideration, the individual who shall pay the money over?

Mr. DUNCAN, (interrupting.) I rise to make an inquiry of the gentleman, if he will allow me.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. DUNCAN. I wish to have his authority for stating that the Secretary of State, under Mr. Fillmore's administration, contended for the privilege of paying the money.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not say so. I stated that there was a contest as to who should escape the responsibility under the new Administration, and that there had been a Cabinet council, which determined who should have the privilege.

Mr. DUNCAN. I understood the gentleman to say that a Cabinet council settled this matter, after General Taylor's death.

Mr. JOHNSON. Under Mr. Fillmore's administration.

Mr. DUNCAN. Well, I believe it was established, in a former discussion upon this floor, that it was settled by the Cabinet of General Taylor, before his decease.

Mr. JOHNSON. Precisely. I thank you for the correction. It was, then, settled by Cabinet council, and the succeeding Administration determined to carry out the decision of the previous Administration. Well, then, my argument is this: Here was a conflict of opinion, and this House ought to indicate in this act who shall pay over this money to the Mexican authorities. But I propose to take another view of this subject.

[Here a communication from the Senate was received by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., their Secretary, announcing the passage of the House bills authorizing the payment of interest to the State of New Hampshire, and providing for the printing of additional copies of the Journal and Documents; also, returning a joint resolution of the House in regard to the assignment of land warrants, with amendments thereto.]

Mr. JOHNSON, (resuming.) Mr. Chairman, I had just concluded in stating views conclusive why we should fix, in this act, the person who shall pay this money over; but there is another reason why we should do so. There is a power authorized, under the Constitution, of the United States, to make treaties, and in conformity with this power, in 1848, there was a treaty made with the Mexican Government, and the twelfth article of that treaty provides that we shall pay to the Mexican authorities, at specified times, certain amounts of money. Fifteen millions was the whole amount stipulated. A certain portion thereof was to be paid at the conclusion of the treaty, and the balance in annual installments at times fixed by the treaty. Now, this is the treaty, and we have agreed, so far as the treaty-making power is concerned, to pay money at certain times. What has the treaty-making power to do with it here? Is the treaty-making power conclusive and binding? I put this question to the House, and, humble as I am, to the country. Suppose, in the exercise of this treaty-making power, great abuses were to grow out of it, that treaties were made, and money stipulated to be paid over, which was wrong, and which would result in oppression and heavy taxation upon the people, so far as the payment of the money was concerned, I ask this House and the country, is there no conservative power; is there no point at which the abuses of the treaty-making power may be resisted? I know that the Constitution says that a treaty made in pursuance of the Constitution shall be the supreme law of the land; and it is conclusive, so far as the Judiciary is concerned. But how are the abuses of this power to be resisted? When a treaty provides that money shall be paid, I say that money cannot be paid until an appropriation is made by Congress. For the Constitution says expressly, that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, except in pursuance of an appropriation made by law; and hence all treaties providing for the payment of money, is subjected to the appropriating power. Has not this House—the Representatives of the people—the authority and power—and moreover, would it not be their sworn duty, if they believed that a treaty was wrong, that it was oppressive—to withhold the appropriation, and thereby defeat the compliance with, and the consummation of the abuses of the treaty? Where is the check—where the power to arrest the abuses of the treaty-making power? It must exist somewhere; if not, everything, so far as this Government is concerned, can be absorbed and swallowed up by the improper and dangerous exercise of this treaty-making power. We find in 1820, that the great statesman from Kentucky, in the discussion of the Florida treaty, introduced a resolution, in which this doctrine was boldly proclaimed; and he went so far as to say, that the treaty made at that period of time should be set aside, if Spain faltered in her course and refused to do us justice, and adopt the means necessary to maintain it. Well, some gentlemen may think this is a little foreign, and has no direct bearing upon this subject; but I wish to show the application I intend to make of it. Here is a treaty made, and money promised to be paid under it, at certain times, but subject to the other provisions of the Constitution, and subject to this conservative power. Then comes up another question. Here in the absence of law, in the absence of an appropriation of Congress, the Secretary of State—I mean before the appropriation is made—before the treaty is consummated, takes it upon himself to make a contract with British and American bankers, to pay over money which has not been appropriated by the laws of the country, and then after the contract is made, after the agreement has been entered into that they are to give a certain per cent., before the money is appropriated, then what is the result presented to the House? It is this: The contract is made, and the gentlemen are ready to consummate it—ready to pay over the money—and hence you are bound to appropriate it; and the Secretary of State comes here with all the influence he can bring to bear upon this Hall, and says, Pass the bill; let us make the contract fourteen months before the installment is due. Such was the case during the last Congress, to enable a set of bankers—of British bankers—to speculate upon this and the Mexican Government. But pass the law, appropriate the money to enable a set of bankers to have three millions of dollars out of the Treasury to operate upon, fourteen months in advance. When we see how this thing is, Mr. Chairman—when we see the appliances that are brought to bear—when we see this speculation in every phase of the act—when we see some or all parties have to be operated upon, it calls upon us to assert our prerogative, and say to you, Mr. Secretary of State, You shall not act in advance of appropriations by Congress, or assume to exercise such a power. You shall not dictate to the Representatives of the people, as to who shall pay the money; but we will specify in our act who shall pay it.

The argument is made by some that it is an Executive duty; and that the Executive should take the responsibility. Why, by saying in the law that this money shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury, does it change the responsibility? Does it exclude them from responsibility? Not at all. The responsibility is precisely the same, for it is still with the Executive branch of the Government. Should not we, in vindication of our position here as representatives, in view of all these facts—in view of the bargains and contracts made with British and American bankers—and certain letters on top of that, sent in here, stating that time should not be consumed in "needless discussion,"—I say, ought not we to give this money a proper direction? It is true there is a great deal said here that does not amount to much. But here is a communication sent in by the President, and by his Secretary of State to him, and which receives their sanction and authority, in regard to the duties and delays of Congress. And who was it sent by? We find it is signed by Barings, Brothers & Co., by T. W. Ward, their attorney; Howland & Aspinwall, and Corcoran & Riggs, an association of banking companies, and banking offices. Now, what a position are we placed in before the country? Here is a set of British bankers who have made a contract with the Secretary of State in advance of an appropriation by law; and because Congress is a little tardy in providing the appropriation, they send you in a lecture, to the effect that the passage of this bill should not be impeded by useless and idle discussion. We want this three millions—we want the per cent.—we want the credit and character it will give us. And hence we are asked to pass this bill under the operation of the previous question. Let us say they may have the money, and do not talk about it, and give utterance to so much twaddle.

Now, let us take another view of this bill. They say that the payment of this money is an Executive duty. How? Here is a treaty stipulating upon the part of this Government to pay so much, and at such a time; and here is a law appropriating the amount of money stipulated to be paid. Now, it leaves it just there. Now, I suppose that the President, or some one of his Cabinet, must run about, and look through all the acts that this House has passed, when money has been appropriated, without saying who shall make the payment. Why, do we not see it is vague and indefinite? There is a provision in the Constitution, that the President shall see that the laws be faithfully executed. How vague is that? Here is the law appropriating the money, and the general provision in the Constitution, which states it to be the Executive duty to perambulate about, and to take up the loose acts of Congress that have passed, and see that they be faithfully executed. Why not say in your law who shall make the payment, under the supervision of the President? Would you thereby change the responsibility? By this means, do you not make it direct; and is it not intelligent and proper so to do? Suppose, for illustration, that Congress were to pass an act to-morrow, appropriating $20,000,000 for the purpose of erecting a new Capitol. That is a law, and under the Constitution the Executive is bound to see it faithfully executed. In the one case it is precisely as in the other. Would not the country say—would not intelligent, practical business men of the country say—define in your act who shall apply that money to the object indicated? Does this change its character, admitting that it is the Executive duty? Does it not keep it still Executive, and retain his responsibility to the Congress and the country? To me it seems so most clearly.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] informed us in his speech that Mr. Walker received four per cent. Now, so far as money transactions are concerned, I mean to speak irrespective of party. In the first instance, the gentleman from Virginia—and I do not mean anything personal in what I am about to say, but only wish to show the strange position that he assumes—strives to show that it would have been impolitic for the Government to have anything to do with General Green; and from his argument it would be inferred that he was a faithless, wild, and visionary man, and that Benjamin E. Green has been found defaulting in transactions with the Mexican Government, depriving him and his father of all credit whatever. This is what he attempts to do. How do the facts stand when the question is put direct to him? Does Mexico assume that the money has been paid over? What is the response? There is no such assumption.

Mr. BAYLY. The gentleman from Tennessee is entirely mistaken. Mr. Rejon, in his letter of the 2d of September, 1844, states that he was informed by the Minister of Finance, upon the 27th of August, that the money had been paid a long time prior to that, and excuses himself for not informing our Envoy sooner by stating that the notice had been delayed in consequence of the vast amount of business which had engrossed the attention of his Department. I will give you the letter.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let me see whether I understand the gentleman. Does not that grow out of this transaction, going upon the idea that drafts had been given with the view of payment?

Mr. BAYLY. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. JOHNSON. Has the money ever been paid by the Mexican Government?

Mr. BAYLY. An agent had no right to receive anything but gold and silver, for that was the stipulation in the treaty. Mr. Shannon had gone out there to enforce that treaty; and on the day after his arrival—the day that he was recognized—he was informed that the payment had been made, and made in money, to raise which the Government had experienced great difficulty. Mr. Shannon sent that information to our Government, and, assuming it to be true, we made the appropriation to pay the individual claimants.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, Mr. Chairman, then it all resolves itself into this: that it was paid by a draft, when the law required that it should be paid in silver. This was a departure common in matters of that character. He—the agent—agreed to receive in payment this draft. When the draft fell due, the Mexican Government failed to meet it; and all that we can make out of the Green transaction is, that he has transcended his authority to some extent in receiving a draft instead of money. But does that prove that he has one dollar of the money in his pocket?

Mr. BAYLY. It was said that the money had been paid.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is that upon the record—that money had been paid to and received by the proper authority of the United States? If the facts are that way, I should like to know it.

Mr. BAYLY. I will show them to the gentleman, if he desires it. I have the official report of the Mexican Secretary of Foreign Affairs, and also the message of Mr. Shannon to this Government, based upon it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Was the money paid before or after Mr. Shannon's arrival there?

Mr. BAYLY. Before; and if the gentleman will allow me, I will read the following paragraph from Mr. Shannon's official dispatch of the 21st of September, to show that the installments referred to had been paid to the United States agent in Mexico on the 27th day of August:

"The installments which fell due on the 30th of April and the 30th of July last, under the convention of the 30th of January, 1843, were paid to the agent of the Government appointed to receive and transmit the same, on the 27th ultimo. I am inclined to believe this Government will hereafter be more prompt in meeting its engagements under the above-named treaty than it has heretofore been; and if it should turn out otherwise, it will be owing to a real inability to raise the means. I am advised that it was with the utmost difficulty that this Government was able to raise the money to pay the two last installments."

That is what Mr. Shannon says.

I have here also the official dispatch of the Secretary of State of Mexico to Mr. Shannon. It is very short, and if the gentleman will indulge me, I will read it:

[TRANSLATION.]

To his Excellency Wilson Shannon, Envoy Extraordinary, &c., of the United States of America.

NATIONAL PALACE, MEXICO, September 2, 1844.

The undersigned, Minister of Foreign Relations, has the honor of informing his Excellency the Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, that on the 27th of last August he was apprised by his Excellency the Minister of Finance, that the quarterly installment due on the 30th of April of this year, and that which fell due on the 30th of July last, had been paid to the agent appointed by the Government of said States, according to the terms of the Convention of January 30, 1843, and that this notice had been delayed in consequence of the vast amount of business which engrossed the attention of that Department.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion, &c., &c. MANUEL CRESLENCIO REJON.

Mr. JOHNSON. He says, according to the terms of the convention. I understand the gentleman to say that he was bound to receive the money in gold and silver, and to state that in its stead he had received a draft which was in violation of his duty.

Mr. BAYLY. I said no such thing. Mr. Shannon states in his dispatch that it was paid in money, to raise which there was great difficulty. It was paid before Mr. Shannon arrived there. Mr. Green copied that dispatch, for it is in his own handwriting. Mr. Green was the agent, and Mr. Shannon never was.

Mr. JOHNSON. Do I understand the gentleman to say Mr. Green, instead of receiving the money, received a draft? for that is the point.

Mr. BAYLY. These documents do not show it. In the investigation which was instituted to see whether reclamation could not be made, the Mexican Government said they had given him drafts, but then Shannon says that it was paid in money.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Shannon speaks according to the terms of the convention.

Mr. BAYLY. You are mistaken; that is what the Mexican Minister says.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is not material. There is a general jumble, great intricacy in this matter, that I will let the gentlemen straighten out to their own fancy. I think that when the whole subject is boiled down; that when we get to what it really is, we will find that Mr. Green received a draft from the Mexican Government; and so the gentleman charges him with traveling outside of his duty in receiving it; and that the Mexican Government failed to raise one dollar to pay the draft. That is about the whole transaction.

Mr. BAYLY. Some of these drafts—

Mr. JOHNSON. If the gentleman will wait a moment—

Mr. BAYLY. I suppose the gentleman desires to be corrected.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is one thing I do not understand with all this explanation, which may be, perhaps, in consequence of the dullness of my intellect, and the great glare of the gentleman's, which benights mine. Do I understand that the Mexican Government as assuming that the money was paid to Mr. Green, and received by him as the American agent?

Mr. BAYLY. If the gentleman will allow me—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JOHNSON] has expired.

Mr. ORR. I noticed the watch when the gentleman from Tennessee commenced his remarks. It lacked twenty-five minutes of one o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is mistaken. It was about two minutes after two when he commenced. The gentleman from Tennessee yielded the floor to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. GRAY,] and also to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY.] The gentleman inquired whether it would be taken out of his time. The Chair assured him that it would.

Mr. ORR. It was the time at which the gentleman from Tennessee commenced speaking to which I alluded.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will state to the Chair, that when I asked the question, I understood the response to be, that it would not come out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. When the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JOHNSON] made the inquiry, whether it would come out of his time? a good many members in the Hall said "No! no!" After the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GRAY] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] had finished, he proceeded with his remarks, and his time would have expired at about two minutes after three o'clock; but there was an interruption of some three minutes in the reception of a message from the Senate, for which credit was given. The Chair has no discretion in giving credit, and a gentleman, when his hour has commenced, cannot yield the floor for personal explanation or otherwise, in committee, in the opinion of the Chair, except by unanimous consent, as the rules in committee cannot be suspended. If there be no objection, the gentleman can proceed.

Mr. BAYLY. I hope there will be no objection to my replying.

[Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. JOHNSON, by unanimous response, was permitted to proceed.

Mr. Chairman, I was about to conclude, and try to make my escape from this general entanglement in which this transaction seems to be involved. As far as that is concerned, it is wholly immaterial—if the facts are as stated by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY]—whether this money has been paid and received by the agent of the United States, and he is proved to be a defaulter, or whether he has embezzled it. If either, I want to know why the proper steps have not been taken to bring him to justice. I say the action of the Government, and the history of this whole transaction, prove that it is just as I have stated.

There was a draft received, and the draft has never been paid. That is about the whole of it, when it is reduced to what it really is. I care nothing about that. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] says that Mr. Walker obtained four per cent. in the transaction, in paying over this Mexican indemnity. He informs us in the speech he made the other day, that this arrangement made with Corcoran & Riggs, Baring & Brothers, to pay three-and-a-half per cent. for the use of the money fourteen months, was as good an arrangement as the one made by Mr. Walker. This is what he asserted the other day, and here it is in his printed speech. I assume that such is the fact. When we were called upon to pass the law fourteen months in advance, was it not understood that the money was to be taken out of the Treasury?

Mr. BAYLY. No—far from it. The very reverse was understood, and not a dollar was to be taken from the Treasury.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the law had passed last Congress, would not the money have been thereby appropriated, and was it not in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury to give his draft covering the amount of the appropriation when he saw proper? Why, what is the reason and inducement for engaging in the transaction? Is it not because they can get the use of the capital—is it not because they can get the use of the credit which this large amount of money would give them? What did they agree to pay three-and-a-half per cent. for? Was it not for the use of the capital—for the benefit of the credit and the per cent. to be realized by the use of it? If the money was not to be taken out of the Treasury—if the money was not to be paid over until it fell due, why pass the law fourteen months in advance? It seems to me to be the height of folly to place at the discretion of the Secretary of State three or four millions of dollars. Was there no danger to be apprehended from this? What did we see the other day? We saw a liberal distribution of money among the soldiery of France, and we saw the highest officer of government dissolving the House of Representatives publicly. The maxim is true, "Give me the money and I can get the men—give the men and I can get the money." We are told that if you pass a law fourteen months in advance, placing some three or four millions of money in the hands of individuals, the money would be secure—and that good security could be given. If the money was not to be taken out of the Treasury—if it could not be paid over—what security had they? The money was the best security they could have, locked up in the Treasury—the best place in which it could be kept. No, it was all speculation. I infer it from the transaction; I infer it from the business habits of the men—from the money transactions of the world. It was to make money—to pocket the per cent.; and who was to get it I do not pretend to say. I have heard one thing; I know that rumor says that a former Secretary of the Treasury made money. I do not pretend to say how much, or how little. And while they talk about Duff Green's insolvency, who never had or proposed to make a bargain with the Government, they never talk about his being a visionary. I expect that perhaps General Green has been unfortunate in money matters, and has not been successful since he expended a large estate. But if I am credibly informed, others have been unfortunate in times gone by, and some of these bankers came well nigh it, if they had not taken the benefit of the insolvent law; but they have been since successful and prosperous in business. They had the funds of the Government to pay out in Mr. Walker's administration, and the opportunity of purchasing a large amount of stock. Somehow or other, they got very rich, as events prove—Walker in the bargain, as I am credibly informed. Rumor now says that he has amassed a very large fortune. This is all predicated upon rumor; but I think it is reasonable to infer that Mr. Webster would like to realize a little percentage in this way. If rumor be true—as we go into things of this sort—I never understood that Mr. Webster had acquired a character for much more prudence and economy in the management of financial affairs than a great many other men. I do not think he has an extensive reputation for matters of this kind. I think, if rumor is to be taken as true evidence, that Mr. Webster has been about as loose, prodigal and extravagant, in the management of his own financial affairs, as much so as men generally are.

I am for the insertion of the amendment to this bill. I say, we are not called upon to violate a great principle, to appropriate money for a contract made in advance, which is not fully complied with. A treaty cannot be complied with, and money cannot be paid until the House of Representatives shall make appropriation by law; and we ought to teach Mr. Webster, and all those confederated with him, that they cannot go in advance of your authority. We ought to teach him, that he shall not tamper with the Treasury of the nation. Are we to sit here as puppets, who are to speak and vote just as somebody puts the speech in our mouths, or asks us to vote? While this bill is under consideration, you find this and the other individual dropping soft words in our ears, as to the precise point to bear—the exact argument to make. All that kind of thing is in the ears of members, and is all innocent and harmless, provided they get what they want. All this has an influence. Then say these insolent bankers, who are keeping their circulars before you, You shall not impede the passage of this bill by endless discussion; you who are talking about the people's money, away with your idle gabble—your tittle-tattle—your fiddle-faddle—here stop and shut your mouths.

Humble as I am, I will resist all this influence; so far as I am concerned, and in behalf of my constituents, I say it is an encroachment upon the dignity and prerogative of the representatives of a free people. Whigs and Democrats should, in this transaction, prescribe by law—not shrink from responsibility—and say who shall pay this money over; and then hold them responsible for the faithful discharge of their duty. From the frequent interruptions since this discussion took place, so far as I am concerned, I have been diverted in fact from the regular points I intended to make. If I had been permitted to go on without interruption, I should not have consumed more than thirty minutes. But I must allude to one more matter before I sit down. When we come to look at this transaction—when we come to look at the proceedings of the Secretary of State heretofore—when we connect it with the reasonable inference of speculation—I say it behooves us, as the representatives and faithful guardians of the public interests, to define clearly in our laws the individuals who shall pay this money over to the Mexican Government. To insert this amendment, and place this matter in the hands of large speculators, looks to me like being dragged and whipped into measures. I say, fix it upon the Treasury of the United States. But the gentleman tells us, that this officer has nothing to do with foreign affairs. Is he not, in fact, an officer more intimately and directly connected with the money transactions relating to foreign governments, than any Secretary of State?

Is there any man here who doubts the capability of the Secretary of the Treasury to negotiate and have this money paid over upon as good terms as the Secretary of State could do it? Mr. Walker made arrangements for the payment of two installments of this indemnity, and will anybody say that it was not as well done as if it had been done by the Secretary of State? or that the present Secretary of the Treasury cannot do it as well? I say that out of respect to ourselves, to our position, and to our constituents, we ought to take this matter out of the hands of an individual who has assumed the high prerogative of making a contract for the payment of this money before the bill is passed appropriating it.

There are many other things which I desired to say, but as my time has nearly expired, I will give way to some other gentleman.

Mr. EDGERTON next obtained the floor, but yielded it to

Mr. SWEETSER, who moved that the committee rise.

The question was put and agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman [Mr. Jones] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 46, providing for carrying into execution in further part the twelfth article of the treaty concluded with Mexico at Guadalupe Hidalgo, but had come to no conclusion thereon.

On motion by Mr. GROW,

Ordered, That the petition and papers of James F. Green be withdrawn from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

CLOSE OF DEBATE ON THE INDEMNITY BILL.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire that the House shall fix some time for closing the debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the Mexican indemnity bill, and with that view I offer the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk:

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, That all debate in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on bill No. 46, providing for carrying into execution, in further part, the twelfth article of the treaty concluded with Mexico at Guadalupe Hidalgo, shall cease at —o'clock, on —, if the committee shall not sooner come to a conclusion on the same, and the committee shall then proceed to vote on such amendments as may be pending or offered to the same, and shall then report it to the House with such amendments as may be agreed to by the committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will move to fill the blanks in that resolution by inserting three o'clock to-morrow afternoon.

Mr. DUNHAM. And I move to insert one o'clock to-morrow.

Many MEMBERS. "Oh no, that's too soon."

Mr. HOUSTON. I believe I am entitled to the floor. I will move the previous question on that resolution; but at the same time, I do not mean to press it to a vote this evening. I merely desire that members shall come here to-morrow morning prepared to fix a time at which the debate shall close. I wish it to close as early as convenient; but it is not my purpose to shut out any reasonable amount of debate. I now move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and the House adjourned until to-morrow, at twelve o'clock.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 22, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. L. F. MORGAN.

PETITIONS.

Mr. SEBASTIAN presented a report and resolutions, adopted by the New Orleans Chamber of Commerce, relative to the causes of the explosion of steam boilers, and the means of their prevention; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DAVIS presented the memorial of William H. Bartoll, and citizens of Marblehead, Massachusetts, representing that the sea-wall at the southwest part of Marblehead Harbor, which prevents the waters of Boston Bay from encroaching on said harbor, is in a very dilapidated condition, and praying an appropriation for repairs of said wall; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MORTON presented the petition of George Jennings, William T. Jennings, and George S. Jennings, praying that Thomas D. Jennings may be allowed to enter a certain tract of land settled by his father; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Also, the petition of William B. Davis, praying for remuneration for losses at Indian river, Florida, during the Indian disturbances in 1849; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. MORTON. I also beg leave to present the petition of John F. Myrick and the assistant marshals of the northern district of Florida, asking additional compensation for their services in taking the Seventh Census in Jackson and Calhoun counties. It appears, from the number of memorials which have been presented to the Senate from marshals and assistant marshals, from all portions of the country, that the square-root system of estimating the mileage of the marshals, introduced into the census act on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. Underwood,] operates badly; or, at least, that these officers have forgotten their mathematics and do not understand how to work it out properly. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I rise to state that that mathematical rule, which was incorporated into the census act at the last Congress, has worked more admirably than any rule which has ever applied by Congress. It has prevented everything like fraud and cheating. You have prescribed a rule by which, when these officers have reported the number of families which they have enumerated, you can prevent everything like an exorbitant demand for mileage with mathematical certainty. The act of 1850, providing for the taking of the census, actually allows more for the enumeration than any prior act of Congress. This dissatisfaction has resulted from the application of the mathematical principle to which the honorable Senator has referred, to prevent the extraordinary charges for mileage, which have been heretofore made by the census marshals. The rule works admirably.

Mr. MORTON. I would say, in reply to the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky, that the rule may work admirably for the Government, but very badly for the marshals. One of the marshals for Florida, as he represents in his memorial, traveled upwards of one thousand four hundred miles, was laboriously and assiduously engaged for three months, and that the amount of compensation which he received was a hundred and odd dollars. This rule may work admirably for the Government and for the benefit of the Treasury, but certainly it does not afford the marshals a proper compensation. It reminds me of one of Aesop's fables in relation to the boys who were throwing stones at the frogs: it was enjoyment to the boys, but death to the frogs. So this rule, in its operation, may work advantageously to the Government, but it has certainly operated disadvantageously to the marshals. The laborer is worthy of his reward; but these officers have not received proper compensation for their laborious services.

The petition was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. SMITH presented the petition of the children and heirs of John Fanning, a surgeon's mate in the revolutionary war, praying compensation for his services; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. FOOT presented resolutions passed by the Legislature of Florida, in favor of a distribution of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States among the States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a resolution passed by the Legislature of Vermont, in favor of a grant of public land for the endowment of hospitals for the indigent insane; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I have a memorial of sixteen printed pages—it is from H. C. Allensworth, of Kentucky. The object of the memorial will be fully explained by the reading of a single paragraph:

"Your memorialist further represents, that the award in his favor by the American Commissioners, under the convention of 1839, computed up to the close of the last board, amounted to $2,446 38. For that amount he claimed an award from the last board, which, however, arbitrarily reduced his claim to $850, making a difference of $1,596 38."

He asks Congress to pay him this amount, because the last board on Mexican claims he alleges did not do him justice. I believe these memorials have been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I ask that this may take the same direction.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I have also the memorial of John B. Amos. The petitioner represents that he contracted to carry the mail from Bowling Green to Glasgow, in the State of Kentucky; that this line was to connect together the alternate lines from Louisville to Nashville, one passing through Bowling Green and the other through Glasgow, by means of which connection the people in the western part of Kentucky had a daily communication with Louisville. After he made this contract, he complains that the Government contracted for a direct daily line from Bowling Green to Louisville, which deprived him of passengers on his cross-connecting line. He has taken testimony and got certificates to show that he has lost a large quantity of money by this arrangement made by the Government. When this arrangement was first made he says that he applied to the Postmaster General for additional compensation, but the Postmaster General refused to give it to him. He then applied to be released from the contract. That also was refused. He therefore claims that the Government violated its contract, and he asks Congress to grant him relief. I move to refer the memorial to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

FLOGGING IN THE NAVY.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, there lies upon your table a petition relating to corporal punishment in the Navy, which was presented some time ago, and was, on my motion, postponed until to-day. I was desirous of saying something in relation to it, and I am as ready to say it now as at any future time. But it has been suggested to me by several Senators that they desire to speak upon it, and that it would therefore be better to have it taken up now and assigned a special day for its consideration. I move that the memorial be taken up for the purpose of having a day fixed for its consideration.

The motion to take up the memorial was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I now move that the further consideration of the memorial be postponed to this day week, and that it be made the special order for that day, when I hope we shall finish it.

Mr. GWIN. The Committee on Naval Affairs are suspended in their action on this very question, because it is under discussion in the Senate. If the Senator from New Hampshire who has the floor, and the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. STOCKTON,] who wishes to obtain the floor, will permit the memorial to be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, we will very soon bring the subject before the Senate. The committee is now waiting for the discussion in the Senate to be stopped. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will postpone his remarks until the committee shall have reported upon the subject. I do not wish to interrupt the debate. I have merely made this suggestion.

Mr. HALE. This matter has been before the Senate for the last six or eight years. A provision in relation to this subject has generally been put in some of the general appropriation bills, and was not reached until the final hours of a session. The subject therefore has not received the deliberate attention which it deserves. I am glad that the Senator from New Jersey moved in this matter at so early a period. I am prepared to say what little I have to say upon the subject, just as well as I shall be hereafter. It was not on my own account that I asked for a postponement, but at the request of other Senators. Having made these remarks, I am perfectly willing to leave the question to the Senate.

Mr. GWIN. I do not wish to interrupt the debate at all, but, as I stated to the Senator, the Committee on Naval Affairs are delayed in their action by the discussion in the Senate on the subject. The Naval Committee intend to bring the subject before the Senate in a very short time, either by a bill to restore flogging, or to provide a substitute for it. The committee will act promptly. We are now delayed in our action by the discussion in the Senate, and if it is agreeable to the Senator from New Hampshire, I move to refer the memorial to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion to refer was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. SMITH, it was Ordered, That the petition of Samuel W. Chilson, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. BELL, it was Ordered, That the memorials of members of the Bar of East Tennessee, on the files of the Senate, relating to the appointment of a separate judge for that district, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. MILLER, it was Ordered, That the petition of Samuel S. Marcy and others, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, it was Ordered, That Elisha Hampton and others, have leave to withdraw the documents on the files of the Senate, relating to their claims.

On motion by Mr. BRODHEAD, it was Ordered, That the petition of Mary E. D. Blaney, widow of George Blaney, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. GWIN, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate the petitions of citizens of San Francisco, California, presented January 2, 1832, in relation to the establishment of a branch Mint at that place.

On motion by Mr. UNDERWOOD, it was Ordered, That William Tell Zollickoffer have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can now state more at length than I could yesterday the facts under which this application is made. I stated to the Senate yesterday that an unfavorable report had been made upon this individual's memorial, but that it had never been acted upon by the Senate. I can now state in addition, that an application was made to the Pension Office, and that a pension was actually granted to Mr. Zollickoffer. Hence he does not want any further action in the Senate. He, however, wishes his papers to be returned to him, that he may be enabled to show that a pension ought to have been granted to him at the Pension Office something like a twelvemonth earlier than the Commissioner of Pensions allowed. It is under these circumstances that he asks a withdrawal of the papers.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. BORLAND, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Mrs. E. A. McNeil, widow of the late General John McNeil, reported back the same without amendment.

Mr. UPHAM, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the memorial of Ira Day, of Vermont, submitted a bill for his relief, accompanied by a report.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Claims be authorized to employ a clerk to said committee during the present session, at the usual compensation.

Mr. BORLAND, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the motion to print two thousand additional copies of the report of the Secretary of War in relation to the inundations of the Mississippi river, reported thereon; and in concurrence therewith, Ordered, That three thousand additional copies be printed of the said report—three hundred of which for the use of the Topographical Bureau.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill, to be entitled "An act to revive for a limited time 'An act in relation to donations of lands to certain persons in the State of Arkansas;'" which was read a first and second time by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to release from reservation and restore to the mass of the public lands certain lands in the State of Arkansas; which was read a first and second time by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ICE BOATS ON THE POTOMAC.

Mr. HUNTER, in the absence of the Senator from Texas, [Mr. Rusk,] and agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution to provide for the employment of ice boats on the Potomac; which is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the Postmaster General be and he is hereby authorized, in addition to ordinary steamboat service on the Potomac, to contract with the Washington and Fredericksburg Steamboat Company for an efficient ice boat, or ice boats, being kept up for the conveyance of the mail during the winter months, provided the additional expense to be incurred by the Department for keeping up such ice boat or ice boats shall not exceed $20,000 per annum.

The resolution was read a first and second time and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

REVENUE FRAUDS.

Mr. HUNTER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish for the information of the Senate a detailed statement of all cases where seizure and confiscation in pursuance of law may have taken place on the ground of under valuation, or fraud, either in the invoice or entry made or attempted to be made at the custom-house of any collection district in the United States, since the tariff act of the 30th of July, 1846, went into operation, describing any such goods, and stating the place or country from whence imported; together with a like statement of all seizures and confiscations and prosecutions, if any, that may have taken place in pursuance of the directions to collectors and other officers of the customs contained in the circular instructions issued by the Secretary of the Treasury under date of the 12th of October, 1849, in the following terms to wit: "Where the value declared in the entry shall, on due appraisement of the goods, be found to be so far below the foreign cost or market value as to raise a presumption of being fraudulently invoiced, seizure and confiscation of the goods should take place under the provisions of the act of 2d March, 1799, and prosecution of the offending party under the nineteenth section of the tariff act of 30th August, 1842, instituted."

GENERAL GEORGE TALCOTT.

Mr. HUNTER, in the absence of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish, for the use of the Senate of the United States, a copy of an original letter, on the files of his Department, from Colonel Benjamin Huger to General George Talcott, bearing date at Fort Monroe Arsenal, November 5, 1850.

CREDITORS OF THE WESTERN CHEROKEES.

Mr. SEBASTIAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be and he is hereby directed to communicate to the Senate copies of all correspondence between his Department, including the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and persons claiming to be creditors of the Western Cherokees, since the last session of Congress.

CAPTAIN WILLIAM K. LATIMER.

On motion by Mr. HALE, that two thousand additional copies of the charges and specifications before a Court of Inquiry against William K. Latimer, a captain in the Navy of the United States, and the accompanying papers, which were ordered to be printed, be printed for the use of the Senate—

Ordered, That the motion be referred to the Committee on Printing.

BOOKS FOR NEW SENATORS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. BADGER, to supply each of the new members of the Senate with the same number and description of books as were furnished to each of the members of the Senate of the last Congress: and the resolution was agreed to.

SPIRIT RATION IN THE NAVY.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. SUMNER, on the 19th instant, directing the Committee on Naval Affairs to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the spirit ration in the Navy of the United States, and at the same time of increasing the monthly pay of all the enlisted men in the service; and the resolution was agreed to.

BILLS PASSED.

The following engrossed bills were severally read a third time and passed:

A bill to extend the time for selecting lands granted to the State of Wisconsin for saline purposes;

A bill for the relief of the widows and relatives of certain officers and seamen of the United States brig Washington, who were lost overboard in a hurricane;

A bill to authorize the State of Illinois to select the residue of the lands to which she is entitled under the act of 2d March, 1827, granting land to aid that State in opening a canal to connect the waters of the Illinois river with those of Lake Michigan; and

A bill to admit the Hermaphrodite brig Sylphide to registry.

REPORTS OF SENATE PROCEEDINGS.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. NORRIS on the 20th instant:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be and he is hereby authorized and instructed to audit, and from time to time to settle, the account of John C. Rives for the reports of the Senate proceedings and debates published in the Daily Globe, at $7 50 per column.

Mr. NORRIS. I suppose that the Senate understands fully this whole subject; but still I will make a very brief explanation. As long ago as 1846, a proposition was made in the Senate that the then editors of the Globe, Messrs. Blair and Rives, and the editors of the National Intelligencer, should publish reports of the debates in the Senate. By that resolution twelve copies were authorized to be taken by each Senator, of both publications. The editors of the National Intelligencer refused to publish so small a number at the price proposed. The price was six dollars per copy for the long session, and three dollars per copy for the short session. Messrs. Blair and Rives accepted the proposition, and the work was published by Blair and Rives, and subsequently by Mr. Rives, up to this time. Those publications at that time, as I understand, contained merely synopses of the debates, except the Appendix to the Congressional Globe, in which were published speeches at length, revised by those who made them. In 1847, the Senate employed Dr. Houston to make full reports. He went on throughout the long session of 1847-'48, and then his contract was given up. In 1848, the Senate made a proposition to the editors of the National Intelligencer and the editors of the Union, to publish the debates in full at $7 50 per column. Those papers continued to publish the debates in full up to the close of the last session of Congress. At that time the editors of the Intelligencer gave notice that they would no longer, on their part, continue the contract; and they have abandoned it altogether. It was then understood that the editors of the Union would likewise abandon the contract on account of the price which the Senate paid not being sufficient, as was alleged.

Mr. Rives, at the commencement of this session of Congress, employed a corps of reporters to make up these reports, and they are now published daily in the Daily Globe, and laid upon our tables. Of the manner in which these reports have been made, the Senate is able to judge. I presume that no more efficient corps of reporters can be found anywhere. So far as I have examined them, they have been made with great accuracy and promptness. It is necessary that these reports should come from some source, in order to enable Mr. Rives to fulfill his contract for the supply of the Congressional Globe. Mr. Rives commenced the undertaking at this session, without any authority on the part of the Senate, and I have introduced this resolution to test the sense of the Senate, whether they will continue the reports which he has been making. I hope they will; for I believe it important that the reports of the debates in the Senate should be faithfully made, and put in a form to be preserved. I hope the resolution will be adopted.

Mr. WALKER. If I understand the proposition, it is to do nothing more in regard to the Daily Globe than we have heretofore been doing with regard to the National Intelligencer.

Mr. NORRIS. Nothing more.

Mr. WALKER. I am in favor of it; and I think that if we have ever had good and prompt reports of debates since I have been here, they have been in the Globe during this session. The leading Reporter for that paper for this session can perform almost a miracle in the way of reporting, for he can report me literally when I speak in my most rapid manner. I have been astonished at the correctness of the reports for the Globe, and I should regret exceedingly to see them discontinued.

Mr. HALE. I concur in everything which has been said in favor of these reports; but there is one thing which I wish to see corrected. We hire reporters to report what is done and said in the Senate; but we shall never have precisely that so long as the practice is tolerated of allowing members to revise their speeches. In these revised speeches I frequently find omitted things that were said, and I find put in things that were not said. This offer has been very kindly made to me by the reporters; but I told them to take what I say just as I say it. I do not want to make a speech afterward. If it is nonsense, let it be nonsense.

I decidedly object to this revising of speeches to go out as speeches that are made; and I hope some mode will be adopted by which the very faithful and accurate reports we do have when they are not revised or corrected, will be allowed to go as they are reported; and that Senators will not be permitted to send out as said what is not said. I hope the resolution will pass.

Mr. GWIN. I wish to say a single word upon the point raised by the Senator from New Hampshire. It is highly probable that that Senator may be so distinctly heard as to be reported accurately on all occasions, but I say very candidly that I cannot be; and I have found it necessary to add to the reports of my speeches that which I intended to say, whether I said it or not. I do not speak for display; but if I did not sometimes revise, as I have intimated, I should be put in a wrong position before my constituents. The Congressional Globe is an official work. It is to be put into the archives of the country, and I have found it absolutely necessary, when speaking on questions of importance to my own constituents, to see that I am put right.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that according to the rules, the resolution must have three readings. The rule of the Senate is, that all resolutions proposing amendments to the Constitution, or to which the approbation and signature of the President of the United States may be requisite, or which may grant money out of the contingent or any other fund, shall be treated in all respects in the introduction and form of proceedings on them in the Senate in a similar manner with bills. This is a resolution to provide for auditing and settling accounts, and therefore appropriates money, and must have three readings.

Mr. BADGER. I wish merely to say that I hope this resolution will pass, and expressly for the benefit of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE.] I know of no gentleman who, it seems to me, is pursuing a course more adverse to his own interests and public reputation, as deservedly high as his is, in opposing this resolution.

Mr. HALE. I do not oppose the resolution. I am in favor of it.

Mr. BADGER. I understood the Senator to oppose so much of the proposition as authorized the revision of speeches.

Mr. HALE. There is no such proposition in the resolution.

Mr. BADGER. The Senator from New Hampshire so commonly speaks to the subject before the Senate, and so seldom wanders from it, that I really supposed that something of the kind was up for the consideration of the body. I think it is very much to be regretted that the Senator has not taken the pains to revise some of his speeches. I will not say that they need any addition; but some of them very much stood in need of the inverted stylus; and I know no gentleman in this country, considering the large fame which he enjoys, who has suffered more from want of the expunging process, in some of the speeches which he has made in this Chamber. My regret for him on this account is so great, that, if he is not willing to take the labor of striking out unnecessary passages for himself, I would be almost willing to take that labor on myself, though I very rarely do it in my own speeches.

Mr. HALE. In answer to that I would say, that I do not, like some other young gentlemen, come here to make a display of myself by talking. When I talk it is for the country. Let those gentlemen who are anxious for a rhetorical reputation, pore over the midnight lamp, and put prepositions into their speeches, and add other ornaments of rhetoric; but do not let them find fault with the practical business-men of the Senate who come here to do the business of the country, because they have not been able to run a race with them in rhetorical declamations. I am perfectly willing that the Senate should set apart a day when these gentlemen shall come in and display themselves. Saturday afternoon might be a very convenient time. [Laughter.] I am perfectly willing that a corps of reporters should be here and understand that they are only to make the skeletons; and that the ornaments are to be put in afterwards by the gentlemen themselves. Though I have no objection to that, what I want is, that when we have a corps of reporters to keep a record of what is said, we should have what is said. I do not want to trust to the fertile imagination that may be licked into shape over the midnight lamp afterwards, and put in as being said on the spur of the moment. I am but a plain blunt man. I speak what occurs to me at the time I speak. If it is not in the ornate form in which the elaborate productions of the eloquent Senator from North Carolina appear, perhaps it is my misfortune. I do not make speeches for schoolboys to declaim at academical exhibitions, and to have a star affixed, and "J. P. Hale" put against the piece. I have no desire for anything of that sort. I merely speak for my constituents and for the country. I speak the suggestions of my own heart in the plainest way in which they occur to me. I am not desirous of any reputation, which the honorable Senator thinks I have jeopardized by not looking over my speeches after they have been delivered. That is all I have to say.

Mr. BADGER. Why, here is a most eminent example of the propriety of the honorable Senator's revising his speeches. What would the honorable Senator himself, what would any other man of taste think of what he has just said about "licking a fertile imagination into shape?" I hope he will correct that anyhow. [Laughter.] But the honorable Senator compels me, which I did not desire to do before, to assign an additional and much stronger reason than I did assign, why I wished he would look over and expurgate his speeches. I mentioned a reason which affected him personally, and it was a very grave and serious one. But there is another and higher reason. I wished it for the sake of the country, for a great many inflections have been imposed upon it by the honorable Senator, which, I have no doubt, in his calmer and more judicious moments, if he ever has any such, he would have stricken out.

Mr. HALE. One single word more. The reason the honorable Senator assigns, shows that he supposes that the country reads my speeches, and, therefore, he thinks that they ought to be expurgated. He would, therefore, seem to imply, that some speeches are made here, which the country does not trouble itself about, even so much as to read. That I regard as a compliment. [Laughter.]

Mr. BADGER. I would say that I do not wish to continue this contest with the honorable gentleman for the last word. His wit is getting low, and there is nothing left of the wine but the lees. That is all I have to say.

Mr. HALE. You had better not have said that.

Mr. CASS. I desire to say but one word. It will be recollected, that at the last session this subject was before the Senate, and a proposition was distinctly made that no Senator should revise his speeches. Well, if by not revising is meant, that a Senator is not to look over the notes of the reporters, and correct them where errors can be found, it is a species of tyranny to which no Legislature in the world would submit. I am precisely in the same condition as the honorable Senator from California. It is difficult for the reporters to report me. It is not their fault; it is mine. From some defect, or owing to my hasty enunciation, I cannot be heard as distinctly as many Senators. I know from experience, that I cannot be exactly reported on this account. If a Senator was not to be allowed to look over his remarks and correct an egregious mistake when he found one, no one would submit to it. If mistakes can be found, are these reports to be like the laws of the Medes and Persians, unalterable? Cannot I put myself right, if I find an error in regard to my position? How far a Senator should go in the operation of revising his remarks, must depend upon himself. He ought to put in nothing concerning anybody else, or anything which would convey a false idea of what he said. But to say that a Senator shall not revise or correct to any extent the notes of the reporters, is to put him in a position that no one would submit to.

The PRESIDENT. The resolution has been read a first time. Shall it have a second reading?

Mr. HALE. I do not want to put myself in a false position. I have no sort of objection to a Senator's looking over his speech and making right that which he said. What I object to is erasing what he did say, and putting in what he did not say.

Mr. BADGER. Does any one do that?

Mr. GWIN. Name the Senator who does it.

Mr. HALE. I do not suppose that it is a criminal matter; I suppose it is a matter which every Senator thinks he has a right to do. I may be mistaken in fact, but I have looked over the last long speech made in the Senate, the speech of the honorable Senator from Florida, [Mr. MAL-

LOREY,] with some care, to find a remark in it to which I had replied; but I could not find a word of it in the speech of the honorable Senator. The poor remarks which I made were published as a reply to something which, by the reports of the Senate, did not appear ever to have been said. That is one instance, but it is not a solitary instance. I do not mention this as a matter of reproach to the Senator from Florida, because it is a thing which is frequently and commonly done. What I complain of, and what I think ought not to be done, is, that Senators are allowed to erase what they said, and substitute what they did not say. I do not complain of anything to which the honorable Senators from California and Michigan allude, to make correct what they did say; but what I complain of is, that our reports show things to be said which are not said.

The resolution was then ordered to a second reading, read a second time, and the Senate proceeded to consider it as in Committee of the Whole.

No amendment being proposed, it was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

RAILROADS IN IOWA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the special order, which was a bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the State of Iowa in aid of the construction of certain railroads in said State.

To this bill there was an amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands, and the question at the adjournment yesterday was on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. FELCH. There are one or two verbal amendments which I wish to make. In the ninth line of the first section, speaking of the right to take "timber, stones, &c.," I wish to strike out "and," and insert "and" between the words "timber, stones," so as to make it read "timber and stones."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FELCH. I wish further to amend the amendment by inserting in the nineteenth line of the second section the word "right" after the word "preemption." The word "right" is an omission of the printer.

The amendment was agreed to, and the bill was then reported to the Senate.

Mr. ATCHISON. If the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DODGE] will not object, I will move to strike out all after the word "States" in the sixth line of the fourth section—that is "free from toll or other charge," &c. I make this motion because I believe that this imposition on the line would be wrong in itself—that it would be an imposition of a burden upon this road that should not be required. There is no equivalent in this bill for any such reservation—at least none that I am aware of. If there is any such, I would be glad if the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, or some other gentleman, would point it out. Now, sir, it is well known that a large quantity of Government stores in the Quartermaster's Department and the Department of the Commissary is now transported by the Missouri river to the western frontiers of the States of Missouri and Iowa, for the supply of the army, not only on the frontiers of Missouri and Iowa, but upon the upper flat on the whole route to California and New Mexico. These supplies are transported by the Missouri river, and thence across the plains of New Mexico; and at various points military posts are to be established on the route to California and Oregon. They can receive supplies from no other source; and I cannot therefore but think that this immense amount of stores to be transported free of all cost and charge is an imposition on this railroad for which no equivalent whatever is provided in the bill. For these reasons I move to amend by striking out the words which I have designated.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I appreciate the motives of my friend from Missouri in offering the amendment to which he has alluded. I concur with him in every word that he has said in reference to that provision, but I am so anxious for the passage of the bill that I would rather take it with some defects than risk it by pressing such an amendment. We have been working to get this bill for two or three years past. Our State has held convention after convention on the subject, and our Legislatures have again and again instructed us to press it, and to give it all our attention, and for that reason I shall have to oppose any amendment which may retard its passage.

Mr. ATCHISON. Well, I am not particular about the amendment. I will withdraw it.

Mr. DAWSON. I regret that the Senator from Missouri has withdrawn his proposed amendment, as this is a question which is to go before the country, and I wish that the principle upon which we act may be fully understood. The principle first laid down by the Senator from Missouri is, that the grant of land which is made really confers no favor on the State of Iowa, and but for the moral influence which might result from giving this land to that State, he would not accept it.

Mr. ATCHISON. I said no such thing as the Senator states.

Mr. DAWSON. The proposition is, that it will be of no advantage. I want to place this subject properly before the country. The principle is this: that giving alternate sections of land for the purpose of aiding in the construction of these railroads, increases the value of the other sections one hundred per cent., and that the land will be sold for $2 50 per acre. If the Government lands appreciate to that extent, the lands belonging to the State of Iowa will increase in value also to the same extent. The price of the public lands to be given by this bill will amount, at $2 50 per acre, to four and a half millions of dollars; and of course the railroad company will be reimbursed to that extent; they will get four and a half millions of dollars by this bill.

The question I propose is this: is not such a grant a decided benefit to the State of Iowa? Will not her citizens receive an appropriation equivalent to $4,500,000, and have a railroad built extending from Keokuck to Dubuque? This result, then, will arise, that the State of Iowa will receive, out of the public lands, a revenue annually for all the transportation over that road, equivalent to the necessary expenses of supporting her government, and the people of Iowa, by a proper administration of the proceeds from this road, will be exempt from State taxation. And how? By appropriating the proceeds of the gift of the public lands. And while she is thus relieved from taxation, the other States will be left without any aid whatever. But, Mr. President, gentlemen say we are merely throwing ourselves upon a principle without being controlled by it. From Keokuck to Dubuque, in Iowa, is the finest section of the State, and all the public lands are nearly taken up upon the route directly between these two points. As the Senator from Missouri [Mr. ATCHISON] said, the citizens have already gone on in anticipation of these railroads being constructed according to the routes surveyed, and taken up the public lands. This bill is discussed upon the principle, that the whole of the lands between the two extremes of the road belong to the public lands, and that when you give away one section to aid in constructing the road, you increase the value of the rest, while the fact is, all the land is taken. What will be the next proposition? Why, at the next Congress, perhaps, there will be an application similar to the one made by Illinois, and one made by another Senator. They say you intended to give alternate sections on the line of the proposed road or canal; but the public lands are all taken up; we have got about one third or one fourth of the one million eight hundred thousand acres of land granted, and now we call upon Congress—to do what? To decide, as we did yesterday, to authorize them to select their lands anywhere in the State. Now, that is the principle on which you stand, that you increase the price of the public lands; and what is the consequence? You get two thirds, if not three fourths of the lands distant from the railroads. Is it not abandoning the principle on which we first started, when we give away the public lands to make roads from them. I do not suppose that my opposition will avail anything. I have been here long enough to apprehend that the bill will pass. I know there is a most extraordinary complication of interests in favor of the principle of giving away these lands. While some wish the lands to be given to the States in which they lie, there are those who wish to see the revenue of the country derived from taxation; and because they desire to justify the increase of a tariff for that purpose, these two interests combine, and will always control this question. And what becomes of the public lands? They go to the new States, and are used up by the States where they lie, and their prosperity is greatly increased. Now, there are railroads through all that country, and the whole country is going on to prosper more than ever before. I do not regret that; but what I say is, amidst their prosperity, whilst they go on so finely, let them remember this, that the proceeds of the public lands, and the public lands themselves, belong equally to all the States of this Union; let them, while we act liberally towards them, act liberally towards us who belong to the old States. If you are determined to take the course you are pursuing with respect to the public lands, do it in a spirit of magnanimity and kindness and liberality. Say to the old State of North Carolina, Every one of your railroads has been built with your own money; say to her, that although she has thousands of acres of barren land, and her people are sparsely settled over the State, yet the people of North Carolina have carried a railroad through a pine country immediately in the neighborhood of the sea-shore for hundreds of miles, and this by the labor of their own hands. And when you go to the fine rich lands on the waters of the Missouri, what do you find? You find railroads everywhere all taken from the public lands, and not a dollar from the pockets of the citizens, for which land, taken for the purpose of building the roads, North Carolina contributed as much as other States. I say to my younger sisters, Take this property, but at the same time do it with magnanimity; feel some regard for, some attachment to, the old States which gained your independence and gave you birth, and gave you the liberty to control and manage these lands to-day. Say to them, with magnanimity, We will divide honestly and fairly with you, and we will not combine with the Representatives of the new States, or others who favor that particular interest which desires that the avails of the public lands, up shall never go into the treasury of the country. If you will come to that, you will have no opposition from me. I appeal to the Senate if I have uttered an illiberal expression with regard to the public lands; and I believe that my friend from Iowa, [Mr. DODGE,] if he were in my position, would occupy the same ground that I do on this question. Why? Because I stand upon the principles of truth and equity. I stand upon the ground that these lands belong to the people, and that the people, either in their individual character, or their representative character, as the people of the different States, are entitled equally to the lands and the proceeds of the lands. Is there a Senator here who can lay his hand on his heart and say it is not true? Is there one? Not one.

I wish to be understood. I have been opposed to the distribution of the public lands. I was opposed to it when I was in the House of Representatives; but my opinions have changed, and I am willing to divide these lands among the States for purposes of internal improvement and the education of the people; and I maintain that when we go upon that principle, every part of this country is entitled to the same share. Let this bill pass, and let the impression of justice be made upon the Senate, and say that we are all entitled, that we will adopt a plan by which old Virginia and Massachusetts, and every State in the Union, shall come in for her proper share.

Mr. HALE, (in his seat.) And New Hampshire.

Mr. DAWSON. Yes, and even New Hampshire. These are my views about this matter, although I make these remarks with no hope that this bill can be defeated. If the number of acres were five millions instead of eighteen hundred thousand, I suppose it would be given. And some of the States have got seven millions of acres, and they say the property is increased in value, so as to be worth double the Government price, which makes the whole value given to one State, about $18,000,000. And yet my friend from Missouri, when he was making that liberal speech yesterday, and saying in his fine, manly voice, that he considered this as conferring no very great favor, and talked about the public property being transported free of charge, and seemed perfectly indignant that Congress should ask any compensation for the public lands, knew the very great advantage that Missouri would derive from it. He is laughing in his sleeve at the habits of the people of the old States, and at their sleepy condition. We are divided in the old States; and why? There are two interests—the tariff and anti-tariff—and the question is, whether we will hold on to the public lands to derive a revenue from them or not. Some say, let the lands go, and then we will have a tariff; and our Democratic friends in the Western States, who are so anti-tariff, are favoring the tariff party. Why? Because they get the benefit of the public lands, and consider them of more benefit than the injury they will receive from a tariff. Interest is at the bottom, and controls every one of them—

A SENATOR. More or less.

Mr. DAWSON. Yes, more or less. Why do I oppose this bill? Not that I expect the bill will be defeated. All I ask is this: I want Congress to be brought up to the point; because I intend to move, at a particular day, for a division of the public lands among the States—that the lands themselves may be divided, and not the proceeds of the lands. And why will I do this? That the public lands may be fairly settled, and the proceeds be divided among whom? Among those who are entitled to them, the people of these States, and not the people of any particular portion of them, and under a general division. And in making that division, I will be liberal to the younger members of this Confederacy, as we have always been, by giving them all reasonable advantages; and at the same time say to them, we do not desire them, because we are thus liberal, to strip us of every right, and then remind us, when the Indian treaties come up, and we are paying annuities year after year to the Indians, that we pay them to get more land to make railroads, while the lands are paid for out of the taxes imposed upon the whole people. Sir, if the people understood this subject, they would not submit to it, because you tax them annually, and throw the money into the Treasury to buy lands from the Indians, to give to particular States to make railroads, thereby making the people of the whole country pay for these railroads, and not the people who own them. I regret that I have detained the Senate so long. I have made these remarks, not with the expectation of defeating the passage of this bill, but that the object of it might be made known to the country, and that the people may understand what we are doing.

Mr. ATCHISON. I will say but one word on this subject. The Senator from Georgia admits that this grant is right and should be made, but that Georgia must have her share of the public lands. That is the sum and substance of his argument. Let him bring forward his bill for that purpose, and then we will discuss it.

Mr. DAWSON. That is not the question. We are for the promotion of the interests of the whole country. I see that by the arrangements you have made, you have determined on this course; but it is in violation of the rights of the old States of this Union. You have the power to pass this bill, but if it is done I consider it as done by force; and I say if you do this in the use of the power you have, exercise that power with becoming justice and propriety towards the other States.

Mr. HUNTER. I have very little to say on this subject, for I feel assured, as the Senator from Georgia has expressed himself, that this bill is destined to pass. And yet, sir, I am so strongly impressed with the necessity of adopting some system in relation to the disposition of these public lands, that I feel bound to say a word or two in relation to the bill before it passes.

I have listened to the arguments of gentlemen who have spoken in favor of this bill, not only yesterday, but on prior occasions, and they have failed to convince me that we are doing equal justice to all the States of the Confederacy when we make such a disposition of the public lands as is here proposed.

My friend from Missouri endeavored yesterday to prove that we were giving nothing away when we were disposing of from fifteen to eighteen hundred thousand acres of land to the State of Iowa; and I was really afraid that before he was done he would endeavor to prove that we had brought ourselves into debt, and would ask that we should relinquish the remaining alternate sections for the purpose of paying for the transportation of those troops and stores for the provision of which in this bill he complains so much. And yet, if he will look to what has been given, and to what is asked to be given, of the public lands for internal improvements in the shape of railroads and canals, he will find that we have given and are continuing to give a very great deal. I will not refer to what has been given heretofore for the construction of canals, because I do not propose to enter into the matter in detail; but I will just look to see what it is that the gentleman calls nothing, by referring to what has been done in relation to railroads, and what is proposed now to be done. Last session of Congress we passed an act similar to this for the construction of a railroad in Illinois, and we were told that we had granted more land for the building of that road than is now asked for by this bill. We have this act which will require from fifteen to eighteen hundred thousand acres to satisfy its provisions, and we have another granting the right of way to the State of Missouri and a portion of the public lands in aid of the construction of a railway from Hannibal to St. Joseph, in said State. These are all bills which are destined to pass if this bill should pass in the Senate. We have, also, a bill granting the right of way to the Florida, Atlantic, and Gulf Central Railroad Company through the public lands of the United States, and appropriating lands to the State of Florida in aid of the construction of the said railroad and branches.

Then, again, we have a bill to grant to the State of Missouri a right of way and a portion of the public land for the purpose of aiding in making a railroad from St. Louis to the western limits of the said State.

And a bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the States of Florida and Alabama, to aid in the construction of a railroad from the waters of Pensacola Bay, in Florida, to Montgomery, in the State of Alabama.

Also, a bill granting to the State of Wisconsin the right of way and a donation of the public land for the purpose of locating and constructing a railroad from Milwaukee to Prairie la Crosse, in Wisconsin.

And another bill granting to the State of Wisconsin the right of way and a donation of public land for the purpose of locating and constructing a railroad from Fond du Lac to Janesville.

Then we have another bill granting to the State of Alabama the right of way and a donation of public land for making a railroad from Selma to Tennessee river.

Also, a bill granting to the State of Mississippi the right of way and a donation of public land, for the purpose of locating a railroad from Brandon to the eastern border of said State, in the direction of Montgomery, Alabama.

Then we have a bill granting to the State of Michigan the right of way and a donation of public land, for the purpose of constructing a canal or railroad across the peninsula of Michigan.

Then we have another bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the State of Arkansas, in aid of the construction of certain railroads in said State.

And yet another bill, sir, granting to the State of Arkansas the right of way and making a donation of land, to aid in the construction of a railroad from Helena to Fort Smith; and there is still a third bill granting to the State of Arkansas the right of way and a portion of the public land to aid in the construction of the Arkansas Central Railroad, from a point on the western bank of the Mississippi river opposite the town of Memphis, by way of Little Rock, to a point on Red river, on the border of Texas.

Mr. BORLAND. The Senator is surely mistaken. There is only one bill reported.

Mr. HUNTER. There is only one bill reported, but there are others under consideration.

Mr. BORLAND. No, they are not under consideration, for I believe that they have been reported upon adversely.

Mr. HUNTER. And besides all these bills which I have named, there is still another, proposing to grant lands and the right of way to the States of Indiana and Illinois, in aid of the construction of a railroad from a point on the Ohio river opposite to Louisville, in Kentucky, to a point on the Mississippi river opposite to St. Louis, in Missouri. These are all bills which have been introduced during the present session; and yet, sir, when we shall have passed all these bills, we shall still hear it said that we have granted nothing. And what is to come into the public Treasury from the public lands when all these bills shall have passed? Sir, every dollar which would be available from these lands will in this way be granted on a partial system in the distribution of the public lands. I say "partial," because very large amounts of land are distributed to those States in which they lie, while nothing is given to the old States.

But, sir, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. SMITH] used another argument in favor of the bill. He said that everybody was aware that the construction of such improvements added to the wealth and developed the resources of a community and increased their capacity to pay taxes. Certainly that is the case. But what is the result of the argument? The same argument would apply to the construction of railroads in Virginia, and in Massachusetts, and in Connecticut. Sir, if we are to use this argument we might as well go broadcast into the general system of internal improvements. I will admit, however, that there is to a certain extent a principle on which a discrimination may be made between railroads passing through the public lands in relation to which the United States is interested as a land-owner and railroads of another description; but these projects have long since departed from that principle, for they are not confined to the location of lands upon the lines of these railroads, but are allowed to go into the State and select them elsewhere to the distance of fifteen miles. No longer ago than yesterday we passed a bill in relation to the grant formerly made to the State of Illinois, and allowing that State to locate a certain portion of such grant anywhere within the State. And, sir, this will be the end of it. We shall have applications for permission to locate lands in any portion of the States where these lands lie, for the purpose of making railroads. Some gentlemen, too, have complained that we are allowed to charge double price for the alternate sections which remain to the Government. But, sir, how long is that to last? Suppose that these lands should prove unsaleable at that price, how soon will we have applications here to reduce the price? And it will be done, sir; and, if necessary, other sections will be granted in order to continue these improvements.

But, sir, I have admitted that there is a principle upon which some discrimination may be made. How are we to test that principle, and how are we to apply it properly? Why, we are to suppose the United States Government to be as in the situation of any other land owner. What would any other land owner do when such a proposition as this was made to him? Would he give away the alternate sections and have no stock in return for it? If he acted on the principle of ownership, would he not be entitled to as much stock in the company as this land is worth? Is it not, to the extent to which this subscription goes into the value of the railroad, a pure donation to the new States? Is the stock which represents the value there any principle by which they are entitled to it, any more than the old States? All that the owner would be called to do, would be to subscribe his share, and when you depart from that principle you make an absolute donation to the new States, and you cannot deny that the same principle would require you to make a similar donation to the old States. If gentlemen mean to confine themselves to that principle they should confine the grants to lands lying along the line of the railroad, and give Government whatever stock they are entitled to on account of the donation. Then it would come within that principle. But at present these bills do not come within that principle. Now, Mr. President, our Democratic friends in the new States are pressing us rather hardly in the old States. We have resisted the system of the distribution of the public lands; we desire to do so still; we wish to stand upon the old Democratic Republican ground in relation to this matter. And yet how long can it be done if our opponents are enabled to point to such appropriations and say here they are distributed partially, that some States get what they want and others get none. How long can we in the old States resist such appeals as these unless something like justice and equity is resorted to? I am willing to consider the public lands as a public trust, a public fund to be administered for the benefit of all, not merely with reference to revenue, but also with reference to the settlement and improvement of the country. I am willing to try a fair system of preemption and gradation, and that, perhaps, after they have been exposed for sale for some time, it may be best to cede them to the States in which they lie to promote the settlement of the country. I am willing to distribute them with reference to both objects, a revenue and the settlement of the country. But when we consider it with reference to revenue, I want it administered equally and fairly. But the best way, in my opinion, is not to give it up to the States, but to hold it in a condition that it may be applied to the fund for defraying the public expenditures. Then it will be administered fairly to all; then we shall have discharged our obligations to the new States as well as the old. I acknowledge that the United States should not keep the lands locked up forever, looking entirely to the policy of deriving a revenue from them. I acknowledge we are bound to look to the settlement and improvement of the country. I am willing to deal liberally, but I am not willing to have a system of partial distribution. If anybody is to get the benefit of these lands, I would be rejoiced to see my friend from Iowa carry his bill. It is from no opposition to him or to his State, but from a desire to see some fair, equal, and just system adopted in relation to this matter, that I oppose the bill.

And there is another thing to be looked to. While we are squandering away the public lands, we are adopting almost every project, no matter how wild and visionary, in order that the public lands may be dispensed with as a source of revenue. Sir, the time has been, when, so far as our financial system was concerned, our public lands were the basis on which reposed our public credit. That time may come again at some future day; and the time will come, if we embark in a general system of internal improvements, when we shall have to look to this source to maintain our system of public credit. I believe, therefore, that it behooves us at some early day to look seriously into this question, and to adopt some uniform system, which will take these public lands without the range of those loose systems of experiments, which every one seems to think we may indulge in in relation to them. It has been said that we had better do this than some other things which have been done with the public lands. Far better I admit; but yet when we have the power to choose what is right, let us not stand here choosing between evils, but rather let us come together and mature a system. If we do not, it will work to the other result, and we shall soon see the majority of this country clamoring for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the States, and it will be a clamor that cannot be resisted. Now you have heard the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Dawson] saying that, though he opposes any such system, that will be the only way which will enable his State to obtain her just share. I hope that some of our Western friends who are familiar with the subject will consider the matter, and mature some system in which we may all unite.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The State of Illinois has been referred to in the course of this debate, and therefore I feel bound to say a word or two in explanation. The allusion to the bill passed yesterday for the State of Illinois, authorizing a selection of lands away from the line of the canal to which it applied, is not at all applicable to the bill under consideration. The reason why these lands were to be selected elsewhere than on the line of the canal, was that Congress had granted them nearly twenty years ago to the State of Illinois for making a canal, and the United States afterwards sold a part of the lands thus granted, received the money, and put it in the Treasury. And now you only give us refuse lands elsewhere, less valuable than those originally granted, and that, after we had made the work in compliance with your own act of Congress.

With regard to the bill granting lands to the State of Illinois at the last session, I have also a word to say. That bill involved the same principle as the one now under consideration. Hence it was perfectly fair to refer to that bill in illustration of this. But I deny that what has been said in regard to donations, special favors, and partial distribution of the lands to the new States, has the slightest foundation in the bill before us, or the act of the last session, granting lands to Illinois. Sir, it is not a question of the distribution of the public lands among the States; it is not a question of donation. If it were either, I should be opposed to it. I am opposed to the distribution of the public lands, either by a partial system or a general system. I am opposed to aiding a State by giving lands as a donation. The friends of this bill do not rest it upon any such grounds. We ask the opponents of the bill to meet us in argument upon the grounds which we assume, to answer our arguments in favor of it, and not to answer imaginary objections of their own. The ground upon which we place it is this: The Government of the United States is a great land owner; she has vast bodies of land which she has had in market for thirty or forty years; and experience proves that she cannot sell them. Shall she keep them thirty or forty years longer, and then not be able to sell them? What advantage will they be to the Government while they are thus held? The difficulty in the way of the sale does not arise from the fact that the lands are not fertile and susceptible of cultivation, but that they are distant from market, and in many cases destitute of timber. No matter how fertile and productive they may be, still they are valueless, unless the produce will bear the expense of the transportation to market. It is on account of the distance from market and absence of timber you cannot sell the lands, and cannot have them brought under cultivation.

The question, then, is, "What are you to do to remedy the evil and enable you to sell your lands and get the money for them into the Treasury, and also to bring the country into a state of cultivation?" Let me ask each Senator what he would do if the case were his own? What would you do if you were the land-owners yourselves? Suppose you owned three hundred miles square of land which you could not sell, and that you found, as is often the case, that the more land you owned, the poorer you were in consequence of the payment of taxes on these lands; and suppose that I would say to you, "Give me alternate sections of six miles through those lands, on condition that I will make a railroad through them, and enable you to sell the remaining lands for double the price which experience had proven you could not get for the whole;" would you not gladly adopt the proposition, as being a good arrangement for your personal interest? Would not the half of the lands thus remaining to you be worth more after the road was made than the whole would be before it was constructed? That is the simple question; and viewing it as such, I am satisfied that there is not a single Senator on this floor who would not gladly make the arrangement if he were the individual land-owner. And if this would be a good arrangement for any Senator here, why would it not be a good policy for the country, and for the Government of the United States, to adopt as land-owners? Mr. President, we insist that these grants in aid of the construction of railroads, enhance the value of the land fund. Instead of diminishing the revenue that will be derivable from public lands, we contend that it will increase it; instead of diminishing your fund by this course, we increase its value; instead of depriving you of anything which is really valuable to you, we show you a way whereby you can make that valuable, which under your present policy is entirely valueless. This is the ground on which we defend this policy; and if it is not defensible on this ground, there can be no justification of the grant.

Now take this particular case. Here is a proposition to make a railroad through the centre of the State of Iowa. If you make this grant you will double the value and double the price of the alternate sections; and you will thus obtain for one half all that you pretend to ask for the whole. Now, I submit to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] whether, with a road running through them, the lands are not better worth two dollars and a half per acre than they are now worth a dollar and a quarter without such road? But he will, perhaps, reply, that experience will show in the course of time that they will not be worth two dollars and a half, and that then applications will be made to reduce the price. But if they are not likely to be worth two dollars and a half per acre with the road, will they ever be likely to yield the Government a dollar and a quarter per acre without it? If, then, the road doubles the price of your adjacent lands you lose nothing; and I doubt whether there is a man within the sound of my voice who does not believe that the construction of this road through these lands would more than double their value, and enable you to sell them quicker at that price than the price you now ask for them without the road.

But, sir, with regard to this bill, and others of a like nature, the argument is stronger than in the case of the Illinois bill. It is this: The road will not only run through your public lands and increase their value along the line, but in this case it will run from the Mississippi river to the Indian territory, and thereby open a market for all the lands which you have west of the Missouri river to the Rocky Mountains. And I insist that the construction of a railroad through the State of Iowa to the Missouri, would enhance the value of your lands west of that river more than ten times the value of the lands granted in aid of the road. The same would be the result in regard to the east and west lines through the State of Missouri, and also in regard to the Arkansas road, and I presume generally in regard to the other bills which have been referred to by the Senator from Virginia. These bills, however, are not now under consideration. It will be time enough to judge of them when they come up for action. Besides, sir, more than one half of your transportations on account of your army and the Indians, is aiming to go to that Indian territory west of Iowa, Missouri, and Arkansas. These roads run through the very section of country over which your supplies and munitions must be transported. The Government, therefore, has a peculiar interest in the construction of these roads.

But the Senator from Virginia has told us that the question would stand in a different position in his view, if we were to be confined to the lands which lie on the line of the road. Why, sir, this is the very proposition of the bill. The grant is confined to the line of the road. It asks for alternate sections of the width of six miles on either side, with a stipulation that you shall not go beyond fifteen miles, in the event that any of the land has been sold in the sections to which you would be entitled by the bill. I ask, then, if the construction of a railroad in a country distant from market does not enhance the value of all land within fifteen, or even thirty miles? Are not the beneficial influences felt to the extent of even fifty miles? If, then, we select the land no further than the benefits extend on each side of the road, the principle applies with its full force. We might extend this limit from fifteen to fifty miles, and then find ourselves clearly within the circle of the beneficial influences resulting from the road, in enhancing the value of the remaining lands. But we wished not to go into extreme cases; we wished to confine ourselves to the principle, that the United States is in fact receiving more benefit from the granting of the lands than they are likely to lose by the grant, and that the public domain, as a common fund, will thus be enhanced rather than diminished in value by reason of the grant.

In reference to the remark of my friend from Virginia in regard to the great number of bills proposing similar grants, I have only to make the same answer which Mr. Calhoun once made on this floor to the same objection. He then said, that the principle being right, and it being the true policy of the Government to make grants in aid of the construction of railroads through the public lands, the longer the road the greater the benefit to the Government; and hence, the objection was an argument in favor of the grant.

Now, sir, if the principle is right, if the line of the road conforms to the wants and interests of the Government and the country—if the Government is to derive more advantage than injury by aiding in its construction—the fact that the State is also to be greatly benefited, is no argument against the passage of the bill. But, as I have already remarked, we will judge of the bills for other States when those bills come up for consideration. So far as I have examined them, I think the Committee on Public Lands have exercised a wise discretion in preparing and reporting them. I have not examined them all, but so far as I have been able to investigate the subject, they have exercised a sound discretion, both with regard to the lines themselves, and the benefit to be derived by the Government of the United States.

But the whole difficulty in the way of these bills is this: While we have not the slightest trouble in demonstrating that the Government of the United States is to be the gainer by these grants, still it is said that the States also are to be gainers. Gentlemen do not seem to be able to comprehend how it is that two parties can make a contract by which both parties will be benefited. Why, sir, it is only upon that principle that the world is benefited by the exchange of different productions. The whole system of exchange and of commerce is predicated upon the principle that the exchange is beneficial to both parties. If one party must necessarily be cheated while the other is benefited, it would do away with all trade and commerce at once. It is true, that while these grants are beneficial to the United States by enhancing the public domain and bringing a larger amount of money into the Treasury, they do at the same time immensely benefit the States to which they are made. Is it any objection, that while the General Government promotes its interest, it thereby confers peculiar benefits upon the new States? We do receive advantages—peculiar advantages—which the balance of the Union do not participate in to the same extent. But is that a valid ground of objection? The same objection would apply to the millions expended at Norfolk and Old Point Comfort—to all large public works—to the navy-yards and fortifications throughout the country—wherever the public money is expended for public uses. These fortifications and navy-yards are constructed for the public benefit. Yet the immediate localities of these vast works and expenditures derive a peculiar benefit which is not common to the other portions of the country. Is it any argument against the establishment of a navy-yard, that it confers a local benefit in addition to the public interests which were the objects of its establishment? The same argument may be urged against all custom-houses and public buildings which have been erected for national purposes in different parts of the country, and even against the location of the capital of the Union here. Would it be a sound argument for the remote and border States to say that, because the national capital is located upon the banks of the Potomac, where millions of money are annually spent and squandered, and because the people all around are receiving peculiar advantages which do not extend to the Pacific, or even to the valley of the Mississippi, nor to the great lakes or the St. Lawrence, the capital must be removed for no other reason than that its location necessarily confers local and peculiar advantages upon a few in its immediate vicinity which cannot be participated in by all portions of the Union? Or will you pull down your public buildings and destroy all the public works which have been erected for great national uses, upon the same leveling principle? It is impossible to construct public works for purely national objects without producing local benefits.

So it is with these grants of land in behalf of railroads. The national pecuniary benefit results from the speedy sale of these lands at a price which could not otherwise be obtained. The States receiving the grants, not only participate equally in this national advantage with their sister States, but in addition derive a peculiar and special benefit, as a consideration for making the roads which produce all the advantages, both national and local. It is on this principle that the friends of this policy justify and defend it. We are firmly convinced, that if there were no local benefits resulting from the passage of these bills—if their merits depended solely upon the fact, that they enhanced the value of the public domain and increased the revenue, we would have no difficulty in defending them.

I feel at liberty to speak more freely on this subject now, for the reason that my State has no longer any peculiar or special interest in this system. Illinois has been well served; she asks no more. If you make any more grants to Illinois for railroads, you will do it on the application of delegations from other States, for the purpose of connecting the great line of roads to the east and the west of us, and not as a special favor to Illinois. I claim, therefore, to be entirely disinterested in my advocacy of this bill. No delegation can be more unbiased by local and selfish interests. We have seen the practical workings of the system, and desire to see it extended to other States, because we approve of its application to our own. We wish to repay the Federal Government the service she has rendered us, as well as herself, by extending the system to Iowa, Missouri, and Arkansas, and every other State, where the same principles and reasons will apply.

Mr. DAWSON. I would ask the Senator a question. How much has Illinois been provided for? How many acres of the public lands has she received?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The grant last year, according to my recollection, although the precise amount has not been ascertained, because the lands are not definitely located, amount to about two and a half millions of acres in round numbers. That is the whole grant. I will remark, therefore, that Illinois has been benefited to that extent. The Senator from Georgia wishes it to be understood, that because we have got two and a half millions of acres of the public lands, and thus have been benefited; therefore, the Government has been cheated to that extent. I have shown the argument to be unsound. We admit that we have been benefited; but that does not prove that the Government has been cheated. We prove that the Government has been benefited by the same operation. I would like to see him answer that position, instead of repeating the objection that one party must have been the loser, merely because the other was the gainer.

In regard to this policy, I would say that I do not wish to carry it to any extravagant extent. I only wish to apply it where we can show that it comes fairly within the principle which I have so often stated. But gentlemen say we must have a general system; and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. DAWSON] wants a system to reach his State. If he complains of this being partial, and wants one that will apply to Georgia, I will make him a proposition. We will extend the same principle precisely, in hac verba, of this bill to Georgia, and enact that all the lands belonging to the Government of the United States within fifteen miles of all the lines of the Georgia railroad are hereby granted to the State of Georgia.

Mr. DAWSON. If the Senator will then allow me to introduce a bill like the one he did yesterday, that where there are no lands belonging to the United States on our railroads, we may go into all the public lands and locate, I will accept the proposition.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will adhere to my proposition, and give him the benefit of the bill to which he refers. The bill which we passed yesterday granted lands to the State of Illinois in lieu of those which you had taken from the State after having previously granted them in aid of the construction of a canal which we have completed at a cost of nine millions of dollars. Whenever you will show that the United States owned lands in Georgia, which they granted to the State, and afterwards took possession of and sold a part of them for the benefit of the United States, we will pass an act of Congress to make up the deficiency from lands elsewhere, according to the bill of yesterday.

Mr. DAWSON. Very well.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Therefore I think the Senator from Georgia and myself will come to an amicable adjustment of the question. The fact is, the Senator from Georgia, and gentlemen from other States where there are no public lands, forget that they once had a proprietary to the use of every acre of the lands within the limits of their respective States. We do not complain of that. It was their legal right, and we were willing that they should appropriate all the lands within their limits. But after having thus appropriated to their own use all the lands within their own States, we do not deem it generous in them to deprive us of this pittance to the new States, when we can show that they are not injured by the act which benefits us. When we bring forward a bill which benefits us at the same time that it promotes the public interests, the Senator desires a fair division by extending it to Georgia. How can the principle be applied to Georgia, or any other State where there are no public lands? How will the Senator contrive to double the value of and the price of the alternate sections so as to make value of the remaining half equal to the whole, if you donate lands in the distant Territories to make railroads in the State of Georgia? Will the Senator explain how he will bring his case within the principle of this bill? The moment you apply the provisions of the bill to a State where there are no public lands, you abandon the principle which sustains and justifies this bill.

When the Senator from Georgia desires to secure lands to his own State to make railroads, where the United States have no public lands to be benefited or enhanced in value by the roads, he thereby admits that his objections to the system would be very soon removed if his State could participate in what he denounces as a system of plunder. The argument which he has submitted would be conclusive if directed against a bill to make grants to States where there are no public lands; but the argument entirely fails when applied to a bill for Alabama or Arkansas or Mississippi or Louisiana or any other State where there are public lands to be doubled in price and value by the construction of the roads.

The system proposed by the Senator from Georgia would apply all public lands and their proceeds to railroads in other States, and thus cut off entirely from the National Treasury that source of revenue. Such a system would produce the necessity for increased burdens and taxation upon the people to supply the deficiency in the revenue. That is the precise result which the advocates of this bill wish to avoid. We in the western country are opposed to any increased taxation, and to any system of measures which would produce such a necessity. We wish to husband and enhance the value of this land fund, and derive all the revenue from it which a wise and just policy would bring into the Treasury. We wish to see the public lands sold, peopled, and cultivated. Where a trial of twenty, thirty, or forty years has shown that the lands will not sell, in consequence of the distance from markets and from timber, we wish to make railroads through them, and bring markets and timber into the center of those vast prairies, and thus render them valuable, and cause them to be sold and cultivated. We believe this to be a wise and just policy, and wish to see it prevail, until Congress shall consent to donate the lands to the actual settlers.

I am sorry that I have been compelled to detain the Senate so long; but I have thought it due to the occasion, and to the part I have heretofore acted in promoting these grants of public lands in aid of railroads, to make this explanation of the views and principles upon which the policy rests, although my own State no longer has any special interest in the system. We only wish to do to our neighbors what has been generously done to us, in sustaining a policy by which everybody will be benefited and nobody injured.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am a member of the Committee on Public Lands, and have had these railroads under consideration in connection with the subject generally. I have been thinking a great deal as to what was the proper mode of administering this great fund, and I have come to the conclusion that I would, as speedily as I could, prepare and present, by way of amendment to some of the railroad bills which we have under consideration, a proposition to grant to the old States of the Union so much land for the purpose of internal improvement within their respective States as may be necessary. If I submit a proposition of that sort, as I expect to do, I intend to make something like a distribution among the old States, in proportion to their federal population, of an amount of these lands that will bear some proportion to those which are granted to the new States for railroad purposes and purposes of internal improvement.

I think that this is a suitable occasion, after the remarks which have been made by other gentlemen, to bring to the attention of the Senate some considerations in respect to the proper mode of administering the public lands. And first, I wish to notice the proprietary idea which is advanced here as being the legitimate foundation upon which we can appropriate the public lands for works of internal improvement. If you will recollect the past history of appropriations of this sort for purposes of internal improvement connected with the idea of ownership on the part of the United States as the proprietary of these lands, you will discover one remarkable peculiarity, and that is this: That this proprietary idea limits the appropriations for the purposes of internal improvement to the States within which the lands lie, and does not allow you to appropriate lands for internal improvements when those improvements are situated out of the State in which the lands lie. Now, sir, I never could see the reason for that difference. If the United States are to be regarded as the proprietor of all the public lands in those States where there are public lands, and as proprietor it be legitimate to make a canal or railroad for the purpose of enhancing the value of the lands situated in the States, why may they do that and be precluded from the right of making a road leading to those States by which the emigrants are to reach the lands to make purchases? The original appropriations, made for the Cumberland road were justified upon the ground that, as a proprietary of the land in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, through which it was proposed to make the Cumberland road for the benefit of those States, it was just as legitimate to appropriate land or money to make the road leading to those public lands as to make the road within the States where the lands themselves were situated. And you will remark, that in the progress of events—in this age of progress of ours—we have repudiated the old notion that it would be proper and legitimate to appropriate money or land to make a road leading to where the public lands are situated, and now the doctrine seems to be that it is only legal, under the proprietary notion, to make an appropriation within the limits of the States where the lands themselves are situated. As a proprietor, I never could see any reason for such a difference. But under this idea that you can only legitimately make appropriations in the States or Territories where the lands are situated, you are entirely cut off from making an appropriation to connect the railroads which run through Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, to connect us with New Orleans and Chicago, running down to Cairo from the lakes to the mouth of the Ohio. You cannot unite these great public works under the proprietary idea. Why? Because there happen to be a little point of Kentucky and a narrow strip of Tennessee projecting down to the Mississippi river, between the road in Illinois and the road in Alabama and Mississippi. The mind that can come to such a conclusion, and reason upon the proprietary idea so as to determine that you cannot even connect works, that under the proprietary idea you built, by running across the little strip of land in Tennessee and Kentucky to have them united, seems to me to be strangely constituted. Yet this has become the fashionable doctrine of the day.

Mr. President, the Senate knows that gentlemen who entertain the political principles that I do, believe that we can legitimately appropriate either lands or money to the construction of any work which we think of national importance. That was once the doctrine of this country. I hope it is not altogether exploded yet. In times past we did appropriate money out of the public Treasury for works of internal improvement. In times past we have appropriated lands to purposes of that sort. As a member of the Committee on Public Lands, I have acted upon these principles, and I intend to continue to act upon them, as I hold them to be correct. And, sir, wherever I perceive an object which I believe to be of national importance, I shall vote for an appropriation of either money or lands for its construction. I shall do this upon no narrow policy. I shall do it upon no sectional consideration. But while I intend thus to act liberally in promoting objects for the improvement of the country, whether with lands or with money taken directly from the Treasury, I still feel that something like justice ought to be done to all the States of the Union in the administration of this great fund. If you will not return to the system of distributing the money arising from the sales of the public lands among the States, I do not perceive that there is any other way by which we can obtain that justice than by uniting upon a proposition such as I propose to submit in the course of the discussion on some of these bills, to make a distribution of the lands themselves. I know full well that my friends from the new States will rise like one man and say that the proposition to allow Kentucky, or North Carolina, or any other of the old States, to become a proprietor of a part of the soil within their States, is most horrible. I foresee that just as soon as the proposition is submitted, there will not be a man upon this floor who represents one of the States in which any portion of the public lands is situated, but will rise up and protest against the very idea of allowing any other State to become an owner of any portion of the lands in his State. When that shall be done, I shall wish those gentlemen to point out, if they can, the difference between allowing a State to hold land within your territory; and allowing an individual to hold it, when that individual does not choose to settle upon and improve it. An individual may purchase as much land as he pleases in any of the States where the public lands are situated. He may never move upon it or improve it. I know that the policy of my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. WALKER] would be to lighten the reins in such a manner, that this thing should not be done in reference to individuals. But, sir, you may, when this proposition which I contemplate shall be submitted, require the States, if you please, to sell within a limited time. You have never thought proper to put individuals of the country under any restrictions yet. But it will be premature now to go into a lengthy argument upon propositions which are merely existing in the imagination. My main reason in rising was to notice some of the arguments which fell from the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS.] It is suggested to me that I should give way to a motion to adjourn. I shall leave that to the Senate, as I am prepared either to go on now, or wait until tomorrow.

Mr. DAWSON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HALE. Before that motion is put, I wish to make another motion.

Mr. DAWSON. I withdraw the motion, if the Senator will renew it.

Mr. HALE. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. DOWNS. I hope the motion will not be agreed to. Friday is private bill day. We adjourned over last week, because we were almost through the private bills which had been reported, but since that time there have been several reports made. I hope we shall sit to-morrow.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I now move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I hope the motion will be withdrawn for the purpose of allowing us to go into Executive session.

The motion was withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT. The motion to go into Executive session cannot be received until the bill before the Senate is disposed of.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I move that the further consideration of it be postponed until to-morrow. The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. DOUGLAS, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after a short time spent therein, the doors were reopened.

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 22, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. Mr. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

FOUNDATIONS OF THE CAPITOL.

Mr. McNAIR. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee appointed to examine into the stability, firmness, &c., of the foundation of the extension of the Capitol, be authorized to send for persons and papers.

Mr. McN. said, it is really necessary that this resolution should be adopted; we cannot get along without it. I hope the House will indulge me in its introduction and adoption.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, objected.

Mr. McNAIR. I wish the gentleman from Georgia would withdraw his objection. It is really impossible for the committee to proceed without the power asked in the resolution.

Mr. STEPHENS. I cannot withdraw.

ASSIGNABILITY OF LAND WARRANTS.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of the joint resolution No. 1, heretofore reported from the select committee, to which the same was referred, with an amendment explanatory of the act of 1850 granting to certain officers and soldiers bounty land, &c.; the pending question being on the motion submitted by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DENHAM,] to commit the said joint resolution and pending amendments to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and on which question the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CLARK] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BRIGGS. I rise to a privileged question.

CLOSE OF DEBATE ON INDEMNITY BILL.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I desire to inquire if the resolution offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] yesterday, to close debate upon the Mexican indemnity bill, does not come up first, as the unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. The Chair was not present when that resolution was offered.

Mr. HOUSTON. It was a resolution closing debate upon the Mexican indemnity bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is not the first business in order; but that that resolution will come up as unfinished business after the morning hour.

Mr. JONES. The resolution for closing debate on the Mexican indemnity bill was the pending question when the House adjourned. I ask for my own information. Suppose the morning hour should be spent in that business, and when it was concluded, some gentleman should move to go into consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table, would this resolution come up as unfinished business? I think not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not know of the existence of the motion to which the gentleman refers, for he was not in the House at the time of its adjournment. The Chair understands, however, that that resolution is to close the debate upon the Mexican indemnity bill. He desires to inquire whether it was pending when the House adjourned?

Mr. JONES. It was. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] introduced the resolution and moved the previous question, and pending which the House adjourned.

The SPEAKER. Then the resolution is in order, and comes up as unfinished business.

Mr. BRIGGS. I rise to a question of privilege. I desire now to call up the resolution which I offered a few days since, in reference to the legality of the seat which the Delegate from Utah [Mr. BERNHISEL] occupies upon this floor.

PROPOSITION TO CLOSE DEBATE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman, that he first permit the resolution of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] to be disposed of. The previous question has been demanded upon it.

Mr. BRIGGS. I have no objection.

Mr. SWEETSER. Is it in order to move to lay the resolution, for closing debate, upon the table?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. SWEETSER. Then I make that motion.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope I shall be indulged in a single remark. I desire that the House shall understand the precise point I had in view in making that motion. I presented the resolution yesterday, with a view of bringing the matter before the House. I moved the previous question, but at the same time I intimated to the House that I did not desire to press a vote upon it. I said then that I would withdraw the call for the previous question, and leave the House to determine its own time for closing the debate.

Mr. SWEETSER. I will withdraw the motion to lay upon the table, with the understanding that the debate shall go on.

Mr. HOUSTON. I withdraw the call for the previous question. As I stated on yesterday, I do not wish to entrap any portion of the House by that motion. I only desire that the House shall fix upon some time.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEETSER] withdraw his motion to lay upon the table?

Mr. SWEETSER. No, sir; I must adhere to it.

The question was then taken, and decided in the negative.

So the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. MEADE. I move to amend the resolution, so as to provide that debate shall close at three o'clock to-morrow.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 24, 1852.

NEW SERIES.... No. 23.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the resolution as amended; and being put, it was adopted.

ELECTION OF THE DELEGATE FROM UTAH.

Mr. BRIGGS. I now desire to call up the resolution touching the legality of the seat which the Delegate from Utah holds. I ask that the resolution may be read.

The resolution was then read by the Clerk, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be instructed to inquire into the election of John M. Bernhisel, the present Delegate from the Territory of Utah—whether said election was held according to law, and whether any bribery, corruption, or other illegal means was made use of by said Bernhisel, with Brigham Young, or any other persons, to secure the said election and return; with power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. B. I said the other day all that I think necessary to say for the present upon this subject. I only desire to explain the object I had in view in presenting this resolution to the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. With the consent of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Briggs,] I desire to make a suggestion. If that resolution is called up this morning, the presumption is that it will give rise to debate. If it proves true that a debate will grow out of it, I presume the whole morning hour will be consumed with it. Certain it is, that the gentleman from that Territory will desire to be heard upon it. I would suggest, therefore, that inasmuch as debate has been closed upon the Mexican indemnity bill, whether it is not best not to consume time in the discussion of this resolution, but proceed at once to that bill.

Mr. BRIGGS. In answer to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Houston,] I will say, that if I was satisfied that much of the time of this House would be consumed in debate upon this resolution, I would not object to its lying over until another day.

Mr. DEAN. I merely wish to say that this resolution will be debated whenever it comes up. Myself and others desire to be heard upon it. I would suggest, therefore, to my colleague [Mr. Briggs] that he allow it to lie over.

Mr. BRIGGS. Considering that there has been a postponement of one day for the discussion of this Mexican indemnity bill, I hardly think that it would be intrenching upon the time which would be consumed by any member upon that subject. I think the time fixed upon for closing debate upon that question will allow gentlemen to discuss it to their entire satisfaction. I shall therefore feel bound to press the consideration of this resolution.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I think, in this matter, we should consult the wishes of the Delegate from the Territory of Utah. I have no doubt that whatever may be his wishes in relation to the time for considering this resolution, they will be at once acquiesced in by this House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Briggs] to this fact: The resolution which he has introduced here, at least by implication, reflects upon the mode by which the Delegate from Utah Territory has obtained his seat upon this floor. Now, it strikes me that it is due to that Delegate that he should be heard in explanation of the charge, or implication, thus brought against him. I desire to say further, that it is important that this matter should be discussed, and well understood, before we proceed to act upon it. I am for giving the gentleman from Utah a chance for a fair fight.

Mr. BERNHISEL. For the information of the House, I beg leave merely to state, that I received the news of my nomination on my way home last year; that I had no competitor at the election, and received every vote cast for a Delegate to Congress; and that the election did not cost me one dollar in money, as has been erroneously reported and circulated here. The certificate of my election, giving the number of votes, and signed by the Governor and countersigned by the Secretary of the Territory, and having affixed to it the broad seal of the Territory of Utah, I ask leave to send to the Clerk's table, to be read for the information of the House. I feel no inclination to oppose a resolution of inquiry offered without any evidence to sustain it, but I cheerfully leave it to the disposition of the House. I ask for the reading of the communication.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the communication can be read.

No objection being made, the communication was then read, as follows:

Territory of Utah, Executive Department:

I, Brigham Young, Governor of said Territory, do certify, that at an election held in and for said Territory on the first Monday of August, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and fifty-one, being the fourth day thereof, in pursuance of a proclamation issued by me for that purpose, for a Delegate to represent the said Territory of Utah in the Congress of the United States, one thousand two hundred and fifty-nine votes were polled, and that John M. Bernhisel received the unanimous one thousand two hundred and fifty-nine votes, as appears by the returns of said election filed in the Executive Department.

Therefore, I do hereby declare the said John M. Bernhisel duly elected Delegate of the said Territory of Utah to the thirty-second Congress of the United States.

Given under my hand and the seal of said Territory, at Great Salt Lake City, this thirtieth day of [L. S.] August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-one, and of the Independence of the United States the seventy-sixth.

BRIGHAM YOUNG.

By the Governor:

B. D. HARRIS, Secretary.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE. I move to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If the gentleman will withdraw that motion for one moment I will renew it.

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS. I shall vote to lay the resolution upon the table, and I wish to give my reasons for such a vote, and why I consider this resolution improper. I did not understand the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Briggs,] who offered this resolution, to say in his place that he indorsed it; and he does not come before the House now and say that he believes there has been any fraud or corruption upon the part of the Delegate from Utah. On the contrary, he says he knows nothing about it. I am utterly opposed to this House entertaining for one moment loose accusations, with no other foundation than rumor, against any person occupying a seat on this floor, even as a question of privilege. If these things be true, let some member who knows the facts come forward and make distinct allegations, or let some individual present a memorial touching the matter. That would be the proper course—

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman allow me to explain?

Mr. STEPHENS. Certainly, sir.

Mr. BRIGGS. The gentleman from Georgia does not understand me, if he says I do not believe there was corruption in the return of the present Delegate from Utah. I do believe that there was corruption. That certificate of election which has been read was of an election held in direct violation of the law organizing that Territory. It was an election in pursuance of an old custom, or law, which existed in that Territory before the organization thereof. Although the signature of the Secretary of the Territory is attached to that certificate, it has been stated to me by gentlemen returned from there, and conversant with this matter, that that signature was obtained from Mr. Harris by the direct order of the Governor of that Territory, and against the direct protest of Mr. Harris against giving his official signature to that document; and also, that his name was attached to that paper, which purports to be a certificate of election, when the returns of election had not come in; that he was directed to attach his name and the official seal of Secretary thereto before the result of the election was ascertained. I said the other day, I believe, that I was averse to the discussion of the merits of the question before the House, and that facts had been stated to me convincing me that there was gross corruption there; and that I wished the matter to go to the Committee of Elections, who could summon witnesses before them, in order to ascertain the facts in the case. I do not know the facts personally, though they were stated to me by gentlemen of veracity.

Mr. STEPHENS. The charges, the gentleman makes barely amount to this—that he believes that the Delegate from Utah has been elected in violation of the organic law of the Territory, or not in conformity thereto. That resolution makes an inquiry whether the Delegate himself did not use bribery.

Mr. BRIGGS. Not at all.

Mr. STEPHENS. I ask for the reading of the resolution again. I think there is something about bribery in the resolution.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection it will be read.

There being no objection, the resolution was read as above reported.

Mr. STEPHENS. That is enough. There is a direct imputation against the gentleman occupying a seat upon this floor from that Territory, and calling upon a committee to investigate whether bribery and corruption had not been used by him, or some one else, to procure his seat upon this floor, and yet the gentleman from New York will not state that he believes such to be the fact. He might just as well offer such a resolution touching myself or any other gentleman upon this floor. I am opposed to any such proceedings without distinct charges, sustained by some known party who, by making them, becomes responsible for them.

Mr. BRIGGS. In respect to corruption, then, I am unwilling, at all times, to indorse rumors with regard to the misconduct of any gentleman, especially when occupying a seat here. Although he may not hold his seat legally, yet while he is here I recognize him as a member until it is proved to the contrary. It has been said that there was money corruption there, and that money was paid to Brigham Young as a condition upon which he should obtain a seat here. I do not know it; I cannot prove it, but it has been so stated.

Mr. STEPHENS. The gentleman does not make that charge himself; he does not indorse the rumor; nor has anybody, by memorial, called the attention of the House to the subject. If any person will take it upon himself to do so, it will be time enough for us to act. I am utterly opposed to this House taking up out-door rumors. If any gentleman feels authorized to make distinct charges of this character against that Delegate, let him come forward, and I will be willing to give him a full hearing and aid in having an investigation; but not without. So far as the other point is concerned—that is, that the present Delegate may have been elected contrary to the organic law of the Territory—I believe the rules of this House furnish ample provision for all necessary and appropriate inquiry—it is the duty of the Committee of Elections to inquire into such matters. The standing rule of the House (No. 77) provides, that

“It shall be the duty of the Committee of Elections to examine and report upon the certificates of elections or other credentials of the members returned to serve in this House; and to take into their consideration all such petitions and other matters touching elections and returns as shall or may be presented, or come into question, and be referred to them by the House.”

Now, if any outside persons wish to make such a complaint, let them petition this House, and let such petitions be referred to the Committee of Elections, whose duty it is to inquire into every case and see whether there is bribery or not.

I move now to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. CARTTER. I ask the gentleman from Georgia to withdraw the motion.

Mr. STEPHENS. I will a moment, for explanation only, or for the presentation of any fact which he may have to state in regard to the subject.

Mr. CARTTER. I wish to state merely that this case is like all other cases.

Mr. MEADE. I rise to a question of order.

It is, that members be made to take their seats. I cannot hear the gentleman from Georgia, nor can I see his lips move. I might, perhaps, guess at his words if I could see his lips moving, but there are so many men standing and obstructing my view, that I cannot see.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has made vigorous efforts to preserve order, but it is impossible for him to succeed, unless it is the pleasure of the House to aid him in the preservation of order.

Order being restored,

Mr. CARTER (resuming) said: All I wish to say is simply this: that the case presented to us here is the form in which such cases are always presented to this body for an investigation. It seems to be treated by gentlemen as a prejudgment, when it is merely the initiative to the inquiry. The proposition made by the honorable member from New York [Mr. Briggs] is to refer to a standing committee, constituted for the purpose of investigating and determining these questions, the subject of the right of the member from Utah to a seat on this floor. There is nothing in the resolution of the member from New York except matter necessary to direct the attention of the committee to the investigation. Now, I am as much in favor as the honorable member from Georgia of a deliberate and impartial investigation of the subject, though I do not concur with him in this, that we ought to close our eyes to the question of investigation. He says the subject comes here without any authority even to open an investigation. Why, sir, we have now lying upon the table of this House a report from the returning officers, save one, implicating the conduct of that community; and if I recollect right, implicating the conduct, or alluding to the mode of the election of the Delegate from Utah. Are we to disregard these intimations that there is something wrong in Utah? If we are, sir, it occurs to me that the country is involved in the result of letting that people run wild in their relations to this Government, and at the same time claiming a control over them. I would not prejudice this case, though before that resolution is finally submitted to the House, I shall be under the necessity of adding another inquiry to it, and that is, whether polygamy is tolerated in the Territory of Utah, justified by them, and whether the honorable Delegate upon this floor is liable to the suspicion that he is a polygamist. I do not presume he is.

[A Voice. What if he is?]

Mr. CARTER. I am inquired of, upon my right, what if he is? If he is, there is one vote upon this floor that will vote him out of this Hall. [Laughter.] That is the answer to that question. I will not consent silently to sit upon this floor with any man who openly defies the laws of his country as a polygamist.

Mr. FITCH. I must call the gentleman from Ohio to order. He is speaking of matters not now before the House, and is indulging in a strain of personal remarks which the rules of this House will not warrant.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman as charging the gentleman from Utah with polygamy.

Mr. CARTER. Not at all. I was merely supposing it might be so. If it is so, I have but one vote to give upon this floor. We cannot close our eyes to the fact, that these things are whispered, and more than whispered; that they come to us under the authority of the report of the disfranchised officers whose duties there have been foreclosed by violence, as they say. I do not propose to prejudice this question, but I do propose to lend what little energy I have in an investigation of them, without fear, favor, or affection.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to lay that resolution upon the table, with the hope that it may succeed.

Several MEMBERS. Withdraw the motion.

Mr. HOUSTON. Appeals are made to me by members to withdraw my motion, but I cannot yield to them.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I wished to call the gentleman's attention to one fact, before the motion to lay upon the table is made. My colleague—the mover of this resolution, [Mr. Briggs]—had expressed a desire, if debate arose, that the matter might lie over until another day. And I think it is due to him, as well as the Delegate from the Territory of Utah, that it should, after what has occurred. I ask that it may, by universal consent, be passed by at present.

Mr. HOUSTON. I cannot withdraw my motion to lay upon the table. I will ask of the Chair whether it is in order for me now to move to suspend the rules, and that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from New York. I learn that this is a question of privilege, and that it has been so decided by the Chair. The gentleman from New York can then, by leave of the House, withdraw his resolution, and introduce it hereafter at any time he thinks proper.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope that course may be taken.

Mr. BRIGGS. If I have that power, I will be happy, with the consent of the House, to avail myself of it.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, the gentleman possesses that power over the resolution.

Mr. BRIGGS. I then withdraw it.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. BARRERE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as correctly enrolled, "A joint resolution providing for the binding of certain documents," and also "An act authorizing the payment of interest to the State of New Hampshire, for the advancement of money for the use and benefit of the United States in repelling invasion and suppressing insurrection at Indian Stream," in said State; which received the signature of the Speaker.

On motion by Mr. MOLONY, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the House, for the purpose of presentation in the Senate, the petition and papers of Orris Crosby.

GRANT OF LAND TO INDIANA AND ILLINOIS.

Mr. MOLONY gave notice of his intention to introduce, on to-morrow, or at an early convenient day, a bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the States of Indiana and Illinois, in aid of the construction of a railroad from Lafayette, Indiana, across the Grand Prairie, via Middleport, to La Salle, in Illinois.

CALL FOR INFORMATION IN REGARD TO THE

MEXICAN INDEMNITY.

Mr. DISNEY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution, which I send to the Clerk's table to be read, in order that the information asked for may be placed before us before the expiration of the time to which debate upon the Mexican indemnity bill has been limited. If gentlemen want the information let them obtain it in time.

The CLERK read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to this House copies of the notes addressed to the Department of State by the Mexican Minister, Mr. De la Rosa, (on the subject of the payment of the Mexican indemnity,) in the months of February and March last, together with statements of any information which may have been verbally communicated to his Department by the Mexican Minister, in regard to the wish of the Mexican Government as to the payment of the money here, and a settlement of the terms upon which it was willing to receive it.

The question being put, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote just now taken upon the adoption of the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Disney.] I do it because it proposes to call for the verbal conversation which took place between the Mexican Minister and our Secretary of State. I think that it is improper to call upon the Department for verbal communications made in casual conversations.

Mr. SWEETSER. I move to lay that motion upon the table.

Mr. BROOKS called for the reading of the resolution; which request was complied with.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would inquire of my colleague over the way, if it would not be more in conformity with the usage of the House to address the resolution to the President of the United States—that he be requested to communicate the information, if not incompatible with the public interests?

Mr. DISNEY. I have no objection to comply with the suggestion.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio withdraw his motion?

Mr. SWEETSER. I do not.

The question being taken upon the motion to reconsider, upon a division there were—ayes 80, noes 64.

Mr. EVANS called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken on laying the motion to reconsider upon the table, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 103, nays 73; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Charles Allen, John Appleton, Ashe, Averett, Thomas H. Bayly, Bartlett, Bissell, Bocoock, Buell, Busby, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Caskey, Churchwell, Clark, Colcock, Daniel, Dawson, Dean, Dimmick, Disney, Dow, Durkee, Eastman, Edgerton, Edmundson, Faulkner, Fitch, Fitch, Florence, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Giddings, Green, Grey, Grow, Hall, Hamilton, Isham G. Harris, Hart, Hendricks, Henn, Hibbard, Holladay, Thomas Y. How, Ingersoll, Ives, Jenkins, Andrew Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, Preston King, Kurtz, Leitcher, Lockhart, Mace, Mann, Humphrey Marshall, McCorkle, McDonald, McMullin, McNair, Meade, Milson, Mojonny, Morrison, Murray, Nabers, Newton, Olds, Orr, Andrew Parker, Samuel W. Parker, Peaslee, Penn, Phelps, Polk, Price, Richardson, Robbins, Robinson, Russell, Scurry, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Smith, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stevens, Stone, St. Martin, Stratton, Sweetser, Thurston, Townshead, Tuck, Venable, Watkins, Addison White, and Wilcox—103.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, Allison, William Appleton, Barrere, Bell, Bibbhaus, Bowie, Bowne, Brenton, Briggs, Brooks, Burrows, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Chandler, Clingman, Cobb, Conger, Cullom, George T. Davis, Dockery, Duncan, Dugham, Evans, Ewing, Fowler, Henry M. Fuller, Gentry, Gilmore, Goodenow, Goodrich, Harper, Haws, Hascall, Haven, Hillyer, Horsford, Houston, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Hunter, Jackson, James Johnson, George W. Jones, Kuhns, Martin, Miller, Miner, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Morehead, Outlaw, Pennumaker, Porter, Rantoul, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Schoonmaker, David L. Seymour, Alexander H. Stephens, Strother, Stuart, Taylor, Benjamin Thompson, Walbridge, Ward, Washburn, Welsh, Wells, Alexander White, Williams, and Yates—73.

So the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

Mr. DISNEY. I now ask the unanimous consent of the House to make an alteration in the phraseology of the resolution. I owe it in justice to myself to say that I wrote it hastily at my desk, and that it is not in the form I should have wished if I had had more time to draw it up. I ask leave so to alter the phraseology as to make the call directly on the President. It would be more respectful and proper to do so, but I can only do it by the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. STUART objected.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio to make another modification, and that is, to submit it to the discretion of the President whether the communication of this information is compatible with the public interests.

Mr. DISNEY. But I cannot make any modification, for there is objection.

Mr. STUART. I will withdraw my objection if the gentleman will strike out that part of the resolution which requires the Secretary of State to communicate the verbal intercourse between him and the Mexican Minister.

Mr. DISNEY. I intended my alteration to embrace the modification suggested by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Houston], and to insert the words: "if compatible with the public interests," but I cannot alter the resolution if there is objection.

Mr. CARTTER. I have no objection to that, provided there is no other modification.

Mr. DISNEY. I do not ask to make any other.

Mr. STUART. I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. DISNEY. Then I will so modify my resolution as to make the call directly upon the President, and to insert the words "if compatible with the public interests."

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia, objected to the modification.

ASSIGNABILITY OF LAND WARRANTS.

The SPEAKER stated that the first business in order was the report of the select committee on the bounty land bill, and that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Clark] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. CLARK. Perhaps it would have been but justice, had I stated yesterday that the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. Dunham], who offered the substitute to this bill, declared that it was not his design to cut short the compensation to which these land officers are supposed to be entitled. He contended that if they were entitled to compensation, they should present their claims to this House. I have but very little to say upon that branch of the subject in addition to what I have already said. I commend the motives of the gentleman in admitting the claims which I have urged. But I believe that unless compensation shall be provided by this bill, it will never be made at all—that will be the result. Whence the necessity of converting the two Houses of Congress into two great auditors' offices, to settle and adjust claims which can be better settled and adjusted at the proper auditor's office?

When I concluded my remarks on yesterday, I was considering the argument of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. Tuck,] in which he was deprecating speculations in the public lands, and urging Congress to such a course as should cut them short. I can assure that gentleman I am as much opposed to speculations of that kind as he possibly can be; but we differ in the mode by which the object is to be accomplished. I have said that there was but little speculation in public lands in that part of the country from which I come. But let us take the gentleman's hypothesis, and grant, for the sake of the argument, that there will be speculation in these lands, and that, too, by means of land warrants. Now, the fact must not be lost sight of, that the location of warrants, as the law now stands, is confined to lands which were in market at the time the law restricting their location was passed. Another fact, also, must be borne in mind, that settlers must have lands, and they will secure them by means of warrants also; because they can be had materially cheaper in that way. Now, is not the conclusion a necessary one, that the speculator and the settler will be thrown together in their appropriations? In other words, speculators will hold large bodies of land in the midst of the cultivators of the soil, keeping it from the hand of improvement, and thus preventing progress in the advantages of society, schools, and those various and cherished institutions which can be had only by those who live in the association of neighborhood. This condition of things brings the cultivators of the soil and speculators together with adverse and prejudicial interests: it is the interest of the settler that the lands around him should be settled and cultivated; it is the interest of the speculator to retain his lands until time and the improvements around him—improvements which he did not make—shall give them an enhanced value. If, therefore, as is insisted, there must be speculators in the public lands, it is clear to my mind, that it would be best to open to them the whole domain, which would prevent them from crowding in upon settlements already made, to the injury of the growth of those settlements. Liberty to the speculators to go far distant for their locations would work as a kind of safety-valve to sections and neighborhoods already considerably advanced in improvement.

Again: if it be true that the public domain must be cursed with the blight of speculation, how would it be removed by confining the location of warrants to restricted limits? Let it be remembered that the thousands of immigrants who seek homes in the far distant States and Territories of the West must not only have lands, but they must have them as cheap as they can be bought; they will, therefore, provide themselves with warrants, and take their lands within the limits prescribed, even though they should be compelled to take land of secondary value, because they have not the ability to purchase with cash. To this course they are driven by the law of necessity. Now, what is the consequence? Precisely this: the cultivators of the soil are withdrawn from the most eligible portions of the Government lands, and they are left entirely open to speculators, to absorb them with their cash capital, without restraint or competition; and as they could select the best lands, their inducements to appropriate them with cash, would be even greater than to embark into speculations with warrants, when they would be compelled to encounter an active and progressive competition; so that, view the subject in either light, it will be impossible to cut short speculation by the restriction of warrants to limits less than the whole area of public lands in market. These remarks are not designed to remove any intrinsic difficulty, as I understand the subject. I do not believe there is speculation enough in the public lands to cause alarm, or to call for any remedial measures of legislation. The gentleman from New Hampshire contends that the true policy is to confine the location of warrants to certain narrow bounds, in order to prevent speculation. I have merely endeavored to show that the direct tendency of such a course would be in aid of speculation. Sir, the way to prevent speculation, in case there was danger on that subject, is to throw the doors wide open, and let the immigrant and the settler go with the speculator, without hindrance or clogs, and the one will see that the other shall do little or no harm.

Another objection which the gentleman from New Hampshire raised to the adoption of that section in the substitute which provides for the creation of a new class of warrants, was found in the act of 1847, pledging the proceeds of the sales of the public lands to the payment of the loan of $23,000,000, created by that act; and this objection was made to apply as well against that section which permits the location of warrants on all lands in market, as to that which provides for the issuance of new warrants. Is the gentleman aware of the length to which that argument would carry him? It would repeal, by implication, all the existing acts for educational purposes, and purposes of internal improvement, so far as they are to work prospectively. If it be true that that act is a mortgage of all the public lands, what becomes of your sixteen sections—your grants of seventy-two sections to endow a university in each State, which, if not given by a standing law, is almost equally as effectually done by precedent of long standing? What becomes of that provision of law by which five hundred thousand acres are to be given to each State upon its admission into the family of States, for purposes of internal improvement? According to the argument, the mortgage would cover and destroy all these munificent donations for the most praiseworthy purposes. And, moreover, would the gentleman contend that the act of pledge covered all the Mexican territory which has been acquired since its passage? And yet this is the legitimate result to which his argument leads. I do not by any means suppose it would be a violation of the spirit of that act to appropriate a limited portion of the public lands to advantageous and worthy purposes, if by such a course you do not materially affect the security intended by the act itself. Now, the income of cash sales for the year 1850 was more than $1,800,000, and in 1851 it was more than $2,000,000, independent of lands taken up with warrants—a sum sufficient to discharge the whole debt in eleven or twelve years, independent of interest; and yet the funded portion of that loan has twenty years from the date of the act to run. It is admitted that the argument would be good against a system which should propose a sweeping disposition of the public domain, or the greater part of it.

These views constitute about all I have to say upon the subject. I cannot see why the Government should have two standards of value of the public lands—one cash value, and one scrip value. I was not a little surprised at the views of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Bissell] upon this part of the subject. He contended for the restriction clause, and yet he was pleased to inform the House, that he was in favor of a pending bill which proposes to give lands gratuitously to actual settlers. Now, it seems to me, that this was a manifest contradiction and injury. It proposes to give those who had performed no service for their country, as the soldier had; who had given no consideration, as the assignee of the soldier had done, when he purchased his warrant,—a far more advantageous position, when it suffered them to take the fattest of the land, while it confined the soldier and those who purchased of him to lands of secondary character, and finally to the leanest picking. It seems to me that this is sheer injustice.

Besides, it is a system of restriction, without merit, and odious. It confines a large class of the most meritorious men, by reason of uncontrollable necessity, to narrow limits and compulsory choice. It seems to me that this is not only failing to make progress, according to the prevailing spirit of improvement and liberality—that it is not even holding to the advantages of a stationary position—that, in the language of a great man, it is "treading some steps backward"—that it is in principle an attempt to galvanize the old policy which was attempted to be fastened upon the country forty years ago—and I believe it is the federal policy, too—of requiring a given township to be sold clean out, before another should be accessible. I believe the sun went back upon the dial Ahaz ten years, but the gentleman had made his go back nearly half a century.

Perhaps it will be said that those who have necessity for land have the same means for acquiring it aside from warrants that they had before. And so they have. It may be said that settlers in new countries have flourished under the system which has heretofore prevailed, and what is to prevent their prosperity now? Sir, it is in American character to flourish, no matter what may be the superincumbent load of difficulties upon it. The virtues inherent in that character, the indomitable energy and will, and the far-reaching enterprise of our people, warrant it. But does that constitute a reason why you should surround them with difficulties; or, in other words, fail to remove them when it can be so cheaply and so justly done? I know that thousands go to the new lands of the West, who, when they have reached their destination, have not a dollar with which to purchase a plank to cover their heads from the storm, or purchase a bushel of meal for the subsistence of their families. They are compelled to go upon credit, if they have any, and if not, they are forced to labor one day for their neighbors to procure these things, and the next for themselves. To this class fifty or a hundred dollars was no insignificant sum. This class you can materially benefit by giving them the largest liberty in the location of warrants; and I maintain they ought to have it. I do not see for what reason you should have a double system—a cash value and a warrant value for lands. Is it worthy the liberality and the high character of the Government? Is it dealing equitably by all? It is not, in my opinion. Throw the doors, then, wide open, and let all who go upon the public lands select such as they please, with whatever will purchase those lands. Then will you confer a boon which will be effectual—which shall be blessed and blessing.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, announcing that they had passed the following bills, viz:

An act to extend the time for selecting lands granted to the State of Wisconsin for saline purposes;

An act for the relief of the widows and relations of certain officers and seamen of the brig Washington, who were lost on board in the hurricane;

An act to authorize the State of Illinois to select the residue of the lands to which she is entitled under the act of the 2d of March, 1827, granting lands to aid that State in opening a canal to connect the waters of the Illinois river with those of Lake Michigan; and

An act to admit the hermaphrodite brig Sylphide to registry.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. Believing, as I do, that the passage of this bill will be rendered more certain, and be facilitated by its reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I have arisen, not for the purpose of participating in the debate which has sprung up upon the various features in this bill, but with the view of moving the previous question on the motion pending to refer. Before I make that motion, however, I will ask the unanimous consent of the House—for I believe it cannot be done but by such consent—that this bill be made the special order of the day in the Committee of the Whole House for Monday next.

A Voice. Monday week.

Mr. HARRIS. It is suggested that Monday next is not a proper day. I will say on Tuesday next, and from day to day until it is disposed of.

Mr. TUCK. I object.

Mr. MEADE. If the gentleman from Tennessee will allow me.

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly, if the gentleman wishes to explain.

Mr. MEADE. I desire to inform the gentleman from Tennessee, that there is a bill from the Senate containing provisions similar to those in this, and which, from a slight glance, appears to me to be preferable to this. I think, therefore, it would be wise in us to bring on the consideration of the two bills together, and that when the business on the Speaker's table is taken up that we refer that bill to the Committee of the Whole, together with the one now pending, so as to consider them both together, and then choose the one that seems to be best.

The SPEAKER. It can be done only by unanimous consent.

Mr. MEADE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House; and if it be granted the House can refer both bills together.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection, but I would prefer, if the unanimous consent of the House is granted, to refer the bill of the Senate upon the same subject to the Committee of the Whole, and make the two a special order.

Mr. BISSELL. I feel constrained to object to that.

The SPEAKER. It cannot be done, as it is objected to.

Mr. HARRIS. I will—

Mr. ORR. I believe I have the floor. The gentleman has moved the previous question, and I do not see how he can occupy the floor under such circumstances.

Mr. HARRIS. I have stated that to be my intention, and I will do it before I take my seat. I move the previous question.

Mr. ORR. I move the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HARRIS. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. HARRIS. Is it in order, then, to go into Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. When a gentleman can obtain the floor for the purpose of making the motion, it is. The decision of the Chair, the other day, was, that a gentleman could not deprive another of the floor for that purpose.

The question was then taken, and on a division there were—ayes 87, noes 32.

So the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. The first bill before the committee is the annual message of the President of the United States and the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON.]

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to take up the bill No. 46, making an appropriation to pay the indemnity to Mexico; which motion was agreed to.

MEXICAN INDEMNITY.

Mr. EDGERTON. I do not intend to take up much of the time of the House in the discussion of this question. I shall not probably avail myself of my privilege, and consume the hour to which I am entitled. I will not say, as did the honorable gentleman from Virginia, that I am a lawyer, for I am not; that I am a judge or have been a judge, for I have not; but I have been a juror, sir, and I never yet pronounced my fellow man guilty of a misapplication or embezzlement of money, when I knew he never had received it. Perhaps if I had had more experience in matters of this kind, I would not speak thus. But, sir, I care nothing for experience. I have no respect for experience, or regard for expediency. Experience never taught a man a better road, but only enabled him to avoid the dangers of the old one.

By the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, the United States became bound to pay the Government of Mexico fifteen millions of dollars—three millions down and the balance in annual payments. The history of the payment of the first installments has been detailed by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BARLY.] The last is yet to be paid. As no money can be drawn from the Treasury except by appropriation of law, this bill, now under discussion, was introduced by the Committee of Ways and Means, and its immediate passage urged by the necessity of the case. Yes, it is urged by the Committee of Ways and Means, when it is reasonable to believe that there is something connected with it that requires disclosure; and it is urged by other parties; and because other parties have urged the passage of that bill upon this floor, my voice is heard here to-day. Had it not been for this paper which I hold in my hand, emanating from men—I will not dignify them by calling them financial operators—but men who are the fund-mongers of this country, I should not have spoken upon the question. How is it? The moneyed power of Europe, the moneyed power of this country, speak to-day in dictatorial terms to the House of Representatives of the United States. They urge upon us—not because they have an interest in the matter, for they disclaim any interest—the immediate passage of this bill, and say there should be no more “useless discussion upon the bill.” Has it come to this; that this moneyed power stands up and dictates to the representatives of twenty-four millions of people, that they shall pass or not pass a law? And do they dare, in their unparalleled impudence, to come here and say that the discussion of this question is needless? Yet that is the language of their paper.

They say the passage of this bill should not be impeded by needless discussion. For one, I am determined, as a representative of a portion of the American people, to proclaim here upon this floor, that I am ready to impede the progress of this bill with all kind of needless discussion. I hope there are other members upon this floor, who will give these fund-mongers specimens of such needless legislation, as will satisfy them that they have no connection with the American people—that this is a Government of the people, and not of any moneyed power. Who are these men? Baring, Brothers & Co., and Corcoran & Riggs—whose banking-house stands opposite to your Treasury, a fungus upon it, growing rich and enlarging itself by what it robs from that which it destroys—and Howland & Aspinwall, and others, plunderers of the Treasury. They are the men who dictate to the American Congress, that the passage of the bill shall not be impeded by needless discussion. Had it not been for this paper, and some rumors which have been circulated in the public prints, as I have said before, I should not have spoken upon this question. But it has been charged, that there may possibly be some fraud, or impropriety, connected with the passage of this bill; and I hold it to be my duty—to be the duty of every representative upon this floor—when imputations are thrown out, as to the character of any financial transaction, that they should be examined and probed, and that everything connected with the finances of the Government should be closely inquired into. It has been charged, that a contract has been made between the Secretary of the Treasury and these bankers, in relation to the disposition of the money—that they have been appointed the agents of this Government for paying this money to Mexico. Ours is a Government of laws. We have laws creating and prescribing the duties of our officers. We have financial officers connected with the administration of this Government, and I take this position, that without the special authority of law, it is not in the power of the Executive department to substitute any officer to discharge the duties that devolve upon it. Is there any authority of law for making this contract? Is their contract, in reference to which information has been asked this morning of the Department, binding upon the Government of the United States—is it binding even upon the other parties to it? Certainly not; for the parties themselves—Corcoran & Riggs, Howland & Aspinwall, and Baring, Brothers & Co.—expressly say that they do not conceive themselves now bound as contractors—that they are released from all obligations under the contract; and so they are. He cannot, and never could, nor could any other Secretary of the Treasury, or Secretary of State, make a contract which would be binding upon the Government, or even upon the other contracting parties. In the debate upon this question the other day, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BRADDOCK] made the following remarks:

“But no contract was made, and no contract could be made which would bind this House in any manner whatever. It was not in the power of any department of this Government to make a contract for the negotiation of its payment before an appropriation upon the part of Congress had been made. The Government could make an arrangement only after the appropriation had been made.”

How, then, would this Government have been placed in regard to the contract, had there been a failure on the part of the alleged contractors to have performed their part of it, by not paying the money? If the United States had placed in the hands of these contractors a portion of this money in advance of its payment to Mexico, and that without receipts or discharges on the part of Mexico, and these contractors refused or neglected to pay to that Government, would it be justified in demanding that additional payment should be made in consequence of their failure? Beyond a question. There is no doubt of it; because the contracting party, in case they had misapplied the money, might have stood up and said to you and the Secretary of State: “You have made a contract with us that you had no right to make. It was not binding upon the Government, and consequently not binding upon us, the other contracting party.” There is another view of this question to which I will allude. I will admit for argument the right existed on the part of the Secretary of State, to make the contract, but I will say, although the right did exist, it was an improper act on the part of the Secretary, and I say so for this reason: This being a Government of the people alone, it should not be the Government of any moneyed power; that should have no influence in the Government, and particularly not if that moneyed power be a foreign one. How is it with these moneyed powers? They now control the entire destinies of all the nations of Europe. They are seeking to control the destinies of this nation. They are attempting to undermine the liberties of the people; and the whole history of the moneyed power, since the beginning of the world, will show that it was never the advocate of human rights and human liberties. The moneyed power throughout the world was always the agent of the oppressors of human liberty and human rights. Who are these contractors? They are the very same men controlling the Governments of Europe, upholding, by their money, the corruptions of the old monarchies. The very same men, governed by these same feelings, now say to the representatives of the American people, You must not discuss this question, because it is needless—improper. Why, who does not know, in the history of this moneyed power, that it invariably corrupts the Government—that it corrupts the masses; that it lays its mighty hands upon even talent and intellect, and sacrifices them with its power of corruption. The brightest genius this Government ever beheld in his palmy day, when the fire of talent beautified and illumined him, the victim of this moneyed power—sacrificed upon its altar. It is because of this moneyed power, so insidious in its character, supporting and encouraging, as it does, sappers and miners upon your Treasury, that I take this position. I stand upon this floor to-day and say, to this House of Representatives—say to the American people—that I am bound to impede this legislation of Congress. I stand here, not the advocate of legislation by Congress, but as the sworn opponent to the action of Congress, saving for one thing, and that is, to pay the debts of the Government. I will legislate for no other purpose but to pay our debts, and “to provide for the general welfare.” But I will provide for the general welfare solely by paying the debts of the Government; and, if it be necessary, I will levy taxes for that purpose, and for that purpose only. To that end only can Congress levy taxes for the general welfare. This Congress legislates too much. We have too much legislation before us, and by whom is it brought here? By whom are the various projects coming up here for the purpose of robbing the Treasury advocated and sustained? Why, by men under the influence, under the control of, and whose destinies hang upon, this moneyed power. We legislate, as I have said before, too much. The moneyed power seeks, not only here, but everywhere, to centralize power in Governments. It is the great advocate of the centralization of power. Every act of this Government which tends, in the least, to the centralization of power, or that takes anything from the States, which they can do, I will oppose. I stand here the advocate of the right of the States to protect its citizens in everything they require. The people have no claim upon Congress. This Congress has no right to pass any law which the people of one section of the country can say benefits them, and which another section can say does not benefit them. The Legislatures of the several States can do all the acts necessary for the prosperity, the glory, and dignity of the country.

What has the action of Congress added to the glory of this country? Have the tariff acts passed, which have been so much talked about, added one particle to the wealth and power of the country? Has any other action of Congress added wealth and power to the country? The wealth and power of the country are produced in another quarter. It is in the States themselves—in the people—that they are produced, and it is the legislation of the several States, developing the resources of these States, that has made this country what it is. I stand here to-day, not the advocate of the glory, power, and wealth of the States consolidated, but the advocate of the glory, wealth, and power of the States independent. We are independent of every power upon the face of the earth except one. It is this moneyed power, which has come up here and stands now in your House of Representatives, and says you shall not impede, by needless discussion, the passage of a bill by which they can plunder your Treasury. We should be independent of that moneyed power. How can we be independent of it? Why, sir, it is very simple. We can do our own business. The financial operations of this country can be conducted without the aid of foreign capitalists. We have the wealth ourselves; we have the talent ourselves; we have the financial knowledge ourselves. Let us connect that talent—that financial knowledge with the government of the country, and not rely upon foreign aid—upon foreign moneyed powers for any operation. Now, in relation to this simple transaction. It is alleged that it is necessary to pay this money to Mexico; that there should be an agent appointed, and that agent should be the moneyed power of Great Britain—that which is connected with the perpetuity of the monarchies of Europe. It is alleged that this power should be our agent to transact the simplest business transaction in the world. This moneyed power invariably attempts to throw a cloud of mystery around its operations. In connection with this payment there should be no mystery. It is the simplest business transaction under heaven, and there is no need of employing an agent, and that agent a moneyed power, not responsible to the Government. We can do the business ourselves. We want no agent, other than him who is appointed by this Congress.

But, sir, there is another view of this question. It is said, and I believe said truly, that the Mexican Government does not require this money to be paid in the city of Mexico. By the treaty, we are bound to pay the money in the city of Mexico, and in the gold and silver coin of Mexico, and nothing else. Under the strict letter of the treaty, we have no right to pay it in anything except in the gold and silver coin of Mexico, and in the city of Mexico. But it is said that Mexico does not want it there. As a simple financial transaction, profitable to themselves, and without any loss to us, of course they did not want it there. Now, the question is, can it be paid elsewhere? I hold it is perfectly immaterial, as far as this Government is concerned, where the money is paid—in what it is paid—provided we obtain an acquittance in full from the Government of Mexico. How did the agents of this Government, appointed by the Secretary of State, pay the money in Mexico? Why, they sent an agent to Mexico for the purpose of raising the required funds, in the language of their letter. That gentleman proceeded to Mexico, remained there nine months, drew his bills of exchange upon England, France, and the United States, and upon those bills of exchange paid the entire $3,500,000, with the exception of $300,000, which he borrowed upon bills to be negotiated afterwards. Now, is it not plain that this payment was not made in the city of Mexico, and that it was not made according to the terms of the contract, in gold and silver coin, but was made in bills of exchange drawn against the fund, which they did not take, and which they were enabled to meet by advances made to them contrary to the law by the officers of this Government. They did advance over one million of money, and that, too, when the Mexican Government had not presented one single acquittance. Now, I charge here, there having been a change already made in the terms of this treaty, it is not necessary, as alleged by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY], that the strict letter of the treaty should be kept, and the agent required to pay the money in the city of Mexico, and in the gold and silver coin of Mexico. It can be paid here. The treaty has already been violated in its strict letter—the money has not been paid as required by the strict letter of the treaty, but it has been paid in bills of exchange; which these agents, in violation of good faith, took advantage of the necessities of the Government, and made usurious rates of interest upon. What do the agents of this Government say? They say the result of these exchange operations, with all the attendant risks, was a profit of about one per cent. upon the amount, and that the contractors made no other profit except the loaning to the Government of Mexico money of their own. That money of their own, was money advanced by the Government of the United States, and loaned out to the merchants and Government of Mexico, at exorbitant rates of interest. Well, they intimate that the money was loaned out at the legal rate of interest. But mind the phraseology—it accords with the fact that money was loaned out at the then current rates of interest in Mexico, and the current rates were fixed by the wants and necessities of the Mexican Government, and such rates were known to be from fifteen to twenty-four per cent. They made no loans at the legal rate of interest, but they made them at the current rates of interest, and they were fixed and established by themselves.

Now, I come more immediately to the discussion of the bill itself, and as to what shall be the action of Congress in relation to it. It is known that we have money to pay to Mexico. Shall we appoint as agent for us in this matter, a foreign moneyed power, which is every day seeking to corrupt, undermine, and control our legislation; or shall we appoint our own agents under the authority of law, responsible to ourselves, to transact and carry out this simple business transaction. That is one view of the case. For my part, I would attach to this bill an amendment, that the money should be paid by agents responsible to the Government. We have those agents already appointed—the financial agents of the Government. If we have no one appointed, we can appoint one. Another proposition is, that we should permit the Mexican Government to do the simplest business act in the world, that is, draw upon us themselves, accompanying their drafts with acquittances and full discharges of the United States from their liability under the treaty; and we could then pay these drafts out of the Treasury or accept them hereafter for payment. Is there any objection to this course? The honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] intimates there is, because we cannot change the treaty. The treaty requires that the money should be paid in the city of Mexico, in the gold and silver coin of Mexico. How have the previous payments been made? Has not the treaty already been violated? Has not the Mexican Government itself violated the treaty, and our own Government violated the letter of the treaty? If it be necessary to carry out this three million transaction through the medium of an agency; if it be deemed inexpedient to appoint a Government agent, or allow one of the officers of the Government under our own control—responsible to us—to make the payment; if it be deemed inexpedient or improper, or not in conformity with the strict letter of the treaty, that the drafts shall be drawn by the Government of Mexico upon our Treasury accompanied by the acquittances—I say, if these things be deemed impolitic or unnecessary, let us do another act of justice to ourselves, that is, if agents be absolutely necessary, employ our own people, our own money, and our own financial men. Do not let us connect ourselves with the Government of Great Britain, or those who are its agents. Do not let us connect ourselves with those who are every day seeking to break down our national enterprises. Why, how is it? We have claims before us here of those connected with most important national enterprises, in which they charge that the moneyed power of Great Britain, the Government of Great Britain, into which the Barings & Brothers are so closely interested, are seeking to break down our lines of steamers, simply because they are the best on the face of the earth. And here we are sustaining by our legislation an attempt to make money out of our own people, by which they can break down our national enterprises.

Now, sir, if we have to encourage anybody—if we are bound to add to the wealth of any man, let him be one of our own men. Let those men connected with these lines of steamers transport the money to Mexico. If there be any money to be made, let them make it, and let us not have to make an extra allowance to them for the losses which they sustain by the corrupting power of this money of Great Britain, which is breaking down, as I said before, our national enterprise.

I must confess, viewing this question in all the lights in which it can be viewed, that I was much surprised at the action of the Committee of Ways and Means upon this matter. Why should that committee, in view of all these facts, and in view of the rumors which are afloat in connection with Corcoran & Riggs, Baring & Brothers, and these other fund-mongers, hurry the action of this Congress? And I regret exceedingly that the proposition has been sustained to cut off the debate upon this question. We need light upon every moneyed transaction. There is nothing connected with the finances of our country that does not require investigation; and, before we act upon this bill, let us investigate and ascertain who it is that makes contracts and transacts the financial business of the country with these banking-houses, by which they are making immense sums of money out of us. Let us see if these contracts be made according to law, or in violation of law. If they are dishonorable to us, and dishonorable to those by whom they are made, let us know it, and let the American people know it. They have a right to know it; and it is our duty, as their representatives, to call for, and persist in calling for, every species of information which can give any light as regards these moneyed transactions. I, for one, am from this day forth for a war to the knife upon any act by which these banking-houses of Baring, Brothers & Co., Corcoran & Riggs, Howland & Aspinwall, or any other banking-house shall have any connection, in any shape, with the action of this Government. It is not necessary. It is in violation of law—it is in violation of the principles of our Government that we should have moneyed institutions connected with us, attempting to control us, dictating to us, and yet not responsible to us.

Mr. GREY, (interrupting.) With the permission of the gentleman from Ohio, I desire to make a brief personal explanation in relation to a matter which was brought up when this bill was under discussion yesterday. The charge was then made against a gentleman of my acquaintance, for whom I have the highest respect, that he had, in his official capacity as chargé d'affaires of this Government in Mexico, been guilty of embezzlement. I do not quote the precise words which were used, because I do not remember them, but it was said that many men had been sent to the penitentiary for offences less in violation of the laws of the country and the laws of morality. When that charge was made, I read a letter in explanation of the conduct of that gentleman. The honorable member from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] who made the charge, made it with the highest authority that he could possibly give to it. He made it from his place upon this floor, and at the outset of his remarks he stated to the House the positions that he had occupied in his own State, and the manner in which he had been indorsed by the Legislature and people of that State, in order, I presume, to give force and weight to the charges which he was about to make. This House and the nation understood, and will understand from that speech, that Mr. Benj. E. Green, when he was chargé to the Mexican Government, was guilty of collecting the sum of $275,000 as agent of the Government of the United States, for which he has never accounted to that Government.

Now, sir, the executive documents of the Twenty-eighth Congress prove this fact, that Mr. Green was not the agent to receive that money, but that he was authorized to continue the agents who had been appointed by General Thompson, who was his predecessor. Green was Secretary of Legation to Waddy Thompson, the Minister to Mexico, and after Thompson left, he was continued there as chargé d'affaires. He was instructed to make Hargous & Co. the agents of this Government to collect this money, and transmit it to the United States. He did so, and Hargous & Co. gave receipts for drafts, which drafts have not been paid. I will show, by letters of Waddy Thompson himself to this Government, that he appointed Hargous & Co., and this man Voss, who was a member—and a prominent and influential member too—of the firm. General Thompson, in his dispatches to this Government, says that he is greatly indebted to Mr. Voss, the member of the firm who resided in the city of Mexico, for his power and influence, not only in inducing the Mexican Government to pay the money, but also in enabling them to pay it.

I shall read from some of these documents, and I have no doubt that the gentleman from Virginia will, when he hears them read, withdraw his charges, because I think his recollection is greatly in fault. The gentleman seemed to be under the impression yesterday, that Governor Shannon had not arrived in Mexico at the time the drafts were received. I will show, by a letter from Shannon himself to the Department of State, that he was in the city of Mexico at the time the money was paid. The gentleman was equally in fault about other things. He said that Mr. Calhoun was not at that time Secretary of State.

Mr. BAYLY, (interrupting.) The gentleman has misunderstood me. I said that the instructions from Mr. Green were from Mr. Spencer, and not from Mr. Calhoun. Green was appointed by Mr. Tyler, and he went out under instructions from the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Spencer.

Mr. GREY. I will show that Mr. Green's appointment as agent to receive the money was from President Tyler, and Mr. Calhoun the Secretary of State. I think that the gentleman is also in error in his remembrance of these documents, and I will read them to correct him. I will read first from the report of Judge Bibb, the Secretary of the Treasury at that time. Here is Judge Bibb's response, as Secretary of the Treasury, to a resolution of Congress:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 25, 1845.

SIR: I have the honor to submit to you the following report on the inquiries contained in the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 31st ultimo, requesting you to furnish certain information in relation to the installments of indemnity payable by Mexico, under the convention with that Republic in April and July last:

This Department can only furnish the information called for, as to "who is the agent of the United States to receive said payments; under what authority he exercises the power of agent; and whether any, and what, information he has received from said agent on the subject."

On the 6th of August, 1843, the Hon. Waddy Thompson was apprised that he had been appointed by you the agent of the United States to receive the whole of the indemnity. The power conferred on him, and then transmitted, authorized him to appoint a substitute; and, by virtue of that authority, he substituted the house of L. S. Hargous & Co., by whom all the installments heretofore paid were received and transmitted to the United States.

In April last, B. E. Green, Esq., then chargé d'affaires of the United States, was specially empowered to receive the installment falling due on the 30th of that month; and he was instructed by this Department to make a similar arrangement with Messrs. Hargous & Co. as had been done by the Hon. Waddy Thompson. This power was not intended as a revocation of that to the latter gentleman, but merely to prevent and meet any objection that might be urged to the substitution of Messrs. Hargous & Co. being considered by the Mexican Government as at an end after Mr. Thompson had returned to the United States. The power to that gentleman was considered by the Department as permanent until revoked, as will appear by the documents annexed to this report. The letter of Mr. Green, herewith submitted, states all the information on the subject of those installments which have been received from him since his appointment.

I have the honor to remain, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEORGE M. BIBB,
Secretary of the Treasury.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. EDGERTON. How long is the gentleman going to take to make this personal explanation?

Mr. GREY. A very short time longer. I shall have done as soon as I have read these documents.

Mr. EDGERTON. I cannot allow you more than five minutes more.

Mr. GREY. I appeal to the courtesy of the gentleman from Ohio, and of the House, to allow me to make this explanation.

Mr. BAYLY. I would suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky, that it would be inconvenient for him to go into this matter as a personal explanation; but when the gentleman from Ohio gets through he can obtain the floor; and I hope he will, and he will then have a whole hour to go into it fully.

Mr. GREY. I think it is due to me that I should have an opportunity of making an explanation in relation to the letter which I read yesterday, and I appeal to the House to allow me to do it.

Mr. EDGERTON. I think this personal explanation has occupied enough of my time, and I must claim the right to proceed with my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio claims his right to the floor, and will therefore proceed.

Mr. EDGERTON continued. There is one other matter to which I wish briefly to allude, and that is, the allegation that these parties did not make any money by this transaction—that there was no money advanced to them by the Government of the United States, but that they themselves made the advances to Mexico. Now, it must be borne in mind that they sent an agent to Mexico to draw these bills of exchange, and that he did draw them. But they say that the United States made no payment to the contractors except to reimburse them for the money paid by them in Mexico from their own funds, upon the presentation of their bill with authenticated receipts from the Mexican Government. Now, if I understand this transaction—though in this I may possibly be in error—the Government of the United States did make advances to these gentlemen—these contractors. They did make advances to them without being accompanied with authenticated receipts from the Mexican Government. Why, then, did Mexico, and the United States Government, advance to these contractors, by their own words and admissions, one million of money by the first of March, when the payment was not to be made until the first of June. The money was advanced, though it was not accompanied by a duly-authenticated receipt from the Mexican Government. Now, had there been a change in the Mexican Government, and had they refused to return the money advanced by Mr. Forestall for Mr. Forestall advanced $650,000 to the Government, which they gave no receipt and no obligation, except the promise to reimburse it when the payments were made—after the Government of the United States had advanced the $1,000,000 to these contractors to enable them to make the payment, what would have become of the $1,000,000 if the Mexican Government had refused to pay, or the contractors were unable to pay? Would there have been any power in this Government to compel the contractors to make the payment? They could have said that the contract was made in violation of the law, or, at least, that it was not sustained by the law, and consequently there was no obligation upon the part of the contractors to make the payment.

There is another view in which this subject may be considered. The Government of Mexico want this three millions of money, and it is known to every gentleman in any way familiar with the subject that they want it here, and do not want it anywhere else. Now, the simple question arises, shall we pay this money here, or shall we again permit the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Secretary of State, to make another contract with foreign capitalists by which they will make millions out of us, when we are in no way under obligations to them, for they are attempting to crush us in every possible way? But we are under obligations to our sister Republic of Mexico; and if we are to appropriate it to the interest of any one, we ought to consult the interests of the Mexican Government. So let us make this payment in such a manner as to consult the interests of that Government, and not those of foreign capitalists. I believe the amendment submitted by the honorable gentleman from California [Mr. MARSHALL] comprehends this part of my argument. I believe its effect will be to enable the President, or the proper Department, to make such an arrangement with Mexico for the payment of the money as shall be satisfactory to them, and that the money may be paid here. If such be the fact, then it accords with my view of the case; and whenever this bill comes up with such an amendment attached to it, I will support it. But when it comes up in any other form, or one in which the Secretary of State or the Secretary of the Treasury shall have the power to make any arrangement with any foreign banking house for the payment of this installment to the injury of Mexico, I will not vote for it. I will not vote for any act by which this Government is to be in any way connected with a foreign banking house. I will now yield the remainder of my time to the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. GREY.]

Mr. GREY. I will now proceed to read the letter of Mr. Thompson, in which he says to the Mexican Government that he has appointed Hargous & Co. as the agents to receive, receipt for, and transmit this money to the United States:

Mr. Thompson to Mr. Bocanegra.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, }
Mexico, July 29, 1843.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of his Excellency José Maria de Bocanegra, Minister of Foreign Relations and Government, of this date, informing the undersigned that the Mexican Government is prepared to pay to-day the second installment under the Convention of the 31st of January last.

The undersigned begs leave to inform your Excellency that he has given full powers to Don Emilio Voss, of the house of L. S. Hargous & Co., to receive and receipt for the same; and begs to renew to your Excellency the assurance of his most distinguished consideration.

WADDY THOMPSON.

His Excellency JOSE MARIA DE BOCANEGRA, Minister of Foreign Relations and Government of the Mexican Republic.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] yesterday was under the impression that Mr. Voss was not of the house of Hargous & Co. Now I will read further, for the benefit of the gentleman from Virginia, to see what he says about Mr. Voss:

"There was some doubt as to this last payment being made; and although, as I wrote you, I had intended to have left here in January, I felt it to be my duty to wait until the installment became due. I think, with prudence and a little forbearance on the part of the head of this legation, the other payments will be made. I am much indebted for the punctuality in the two last payments to the untiring efforts of Mr. Voss, the partner of Mr. Hargous, resident in Mexico, and to the great influence which he has with the Mexican Government, and the aid which he is able to give the Government in negotiating loans for the balance of the installment, which they may need."

Mr. Green's appointment to receive the money was dated April 26, 1844, when Mr. Calhoun was Secretary of State. It is as follows:

To all who shall see these presents, greeting:

Know ye, that, reposing full confidence in the integrity and prudence of Benjamin E. Green, Secretary of the Legation of the United States at Mexico, I do hereby empower him to demand and receive from the proper authorities of the Mexican Republic the money due to the United States by that Republic on the 30th of this month, pursuant to the second article of the Convention between the two Governments of the 30th of January, 1843; and I do hereby further empower the said Benjamin E. Green, on the payment of the money aforesaid, to give full acquittances for the same; and he is further authorized to appoint a substitute or substitutes, to act for him in the premises, in as full and ample a manner as he is by these presents authorized to do; and I do hereby ratify all his acts, and the acts of his substitute or substitutes, in the premises.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed.

Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, the twenty-sixth day of April, in the year of our Lord [L. S.] one thousand eight hundred and forty-four, and of the independence of the United States the sixty-eighth.

JOHN TYLER.

By the President:

J. C. CALHOUN, Secretary of State.

The gentleman from Virginia is mistaken in that also. Now, here is a letter from Mr. Green:

Mr. Green to Mr. Bocanegra.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, }
Mexico, May 18, 1844. }

Several days have elapsed since the undersigned, chargé d'affaires of the United States of America ad interim, had the honor to receive the note of his Excellency J. M. de Bocanegra of the 6th instant, in which note his Excellency promised that the installment due on the 30th ultimo should be paid on the following day, (the 7th instant.)

The agent authorized to receive the indemnity has daily applied for payment at the Ministry of Hacienda; but, up to this moment, not a dollar has been paid. The undersigned cannot refrain from expressing his great surprise at this failure on the part of the Mexican Government to meet its solemn engagements—a surprise which has been much increased by the communication of the 6th instant, above referred to.

But, forbearing further comment for the present, the undersigned respectfully requests that his Excellency the Minister of Foreign Relations will, without further loss of time, cause the said installment to be paid to Don Emilio Voss, who has full powers to receive the same.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to his Excellency M. Bocanegra the assurances of his high consideration.

BENJAMIN E. GREEN.

His Excellency J. M. DE BOCANEGRA, Minister, &c.

Thus Mr. Green, as the Secretary of State reports, by order of this Government, continued this same man in office, of the same firm, to receive and receipt for and to transmit money to this Government. And this same member of that firm, Mr. Thompson compliments, and says this Government is indebted to his influence for the prompt payment of the money. This is in 1844. Here is the note to Mr. Shannon, stating that the money had been paid:

Mr. Rejon to Mr. Shannon.

[TRANSLATION.]

NATIONAL PALACE, MEXICO, September 2, 1844.

The undersigned, Minister of Foreign Relations, has the honor to acquaint his excellency the Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, that his excellency the Minister of Finance has informed him, under date of the 27th of August last, that the installment due on the 30th of this year, and that due on the 30th of July last, pursuant to the convention of the 30th January, 1843, have been paid to the agent appointed by the Government of those States, and that this notification had been delayed in consequence of the vast business of that Department.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion, &c.,

MANUEL CRENCENCIO REJON.

To his Excellency WILSON SHANNON, Envoy Extraordinary, &c.

Mr. Green to Mr. Calhoun.

WASHINGTON, December 17, 1844.

SIR: In reply to your inquiry, I am sorry to inform you that none of the three last installments had been paid at the time I left the city of Mexico. It is true that the Mexican Minister of Foreign Relations, by note of the 2d September, informed Mr. Shannon that the two which had fallen due on the 30th April and 30th July had been satisfied. This note, a copy of which was at the time forwarded to the Department, was sent to Mr. Shannon early on the morning after he presented his credentials, and was written, as I have reason to believe, in consequence of an impression that the Mexican Government, by having failed to pay the installment of the 30th April, had forfeited its right under the convention of 1843 to pay by installments, and that Mr. Shannon was going out with instructions to demand payment of the whole indemnity under the convention of 1839.

The fact is, that various orders on the treasury were given to the agent appointed to receive the installments; but he could obtain no payment on these orders up to the day when Mr. Trigueros left the Treasury Department, and the first act of his successor was to suspend the payment of all orders.

While upon this subject, I beg leave to state that our claims were used by the Mexican Government as a pretext for levying a forced loan. More than sufficient to pay all our claims was raised in this way; but a very small part of it has been paid to our citizens, and the rest has been applied to other purposes. At the same time, it was declared in the official newspaper that our claims were unjust, and that the Mexican Government owed our citizens nothing; but the forced loan was justified before the Mexican people on the ground that the previous administration of Bustamante had pledged the national faith to pay those claims, and that, although they were an unjust robbery on our part, it was necessary that the national faith, pledged by Bustamante, should be maintained.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
BEN. E. GREEN.
Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Secretary of State.

I have good authority for stating that one of the members of the firm of Hargous & Co. was a brother to the Minister of Finance in Mexico.

I will show the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] that his memory did not serve him correctly in another instance. He reports that Mr. Shannon, the Minister who succeeded Mr. Thompson, was not in Mexico the 27th of August when this money was paid.

Mr. BAYLY. The gentleman is mistaken; so far from saying that Mr. Shannon was not in Mexico at the time to which the gentleman alludes, I said he was there at that time. His credentials were presented on the first of September.

Mr. GREY. I, and I have no doubt this House, misunderstood the gentleman on yesterday. He was understood as charging that Green had received this money and had embezzled it; for Mr. Green was at that time the agent of this Government, remaining there as chargé d'affaires after Mr. Thompson had left, and that the money was paid before the arrival of Governor Shannon. If this gentleman admits that Governor Shannon was there when Mr. Rejon says the money was paid, why, the House, the country, and the whole nation will know that the Secretary of Legation could not control the payment, but that it must be made after consultation with the Minister. The Minister would control the Secretary, and the Secretary was only the medium by which the Minister could communicate with the Government. I will read from the first letter of Mr. Shannon:

SIR: I had the honor to inform you, by my note of the 28th ult., of my arrival in this city, and the disagreeable occurrence that I encountered on the road.

A short time before my arrival, Mr. Bocanegra had retired from the State Department, and Don Manuel C. Rejon had been appointed in his place. The retirement of Mr. Bocanegra is said to have been voluntary.

On the 27th ultimo I addressed a note to the Secretary of Foreign Relations, informing him of my arrival in this city, and desiring to be informed of the time and place at which I could be permitted to present my letters of credence to the President of the Republic. I was advised in due time that I would be received by the President, at his palace at Tacubaya, on the 1st instant. I accordingly attended, in company with Mr. Green, at the time and place designated, and was received by the President with all the courtesy and respect that I could have desired. (See Nos. 1, 2, and 3, accompanying this dispatch.)

Thus it appears that Mr. Shannon was in Mexico at the time the Minister of Finance stated that the arrangement had been made. Now, the gentleman from Virginia was in error in saying that this letter stated that the money had been paid at the time and in accordance with the terms of the treaty. On the contrary the letter stated that on the 27th of August, the installment due on the 30th of April, and that due the 30th of July, had been paid to the agent appointed by these States, but that this notification had been delayed in consequence of the vast business of that department.

I will refer also to a letter from Mr. Green to Mr. Calhoun, in which it appears that a call had been made by Mr. Calhoun for additional information in relation to the payment of that money, in which letter Mr. Green states, that before he left the city of Mexico, the Mexican Minister of Foreign Relations, by a note of the 2d of September, stated to Mr. Shannon that the payments for April and July had been satisfied, which note was written, as I believe, from an impression that the Mexican Government had forfeited their right under the convention to pay by installments, and that Mr. Shannon had instructions to demand payment of the whole indemnity at one time. The fact is, authorized orders were given to the agent of this Government to receive these installments. But he never obtained payment upon them, up to the day when Mr. Trigueros left the Treasury Department, and the first act of his successor was to suspend the payment of all orders or drafts upon the Treasury.

I will state that just about the time Mr. Shannon arrived in Mexico, the Government was on the point of a revolution. On the 21st of September Mr. Shannon forwarded a letter to the State Department, stating that President Santa Anna had a large military force under his command, and that he was endeavoring to induce the Mexican Government to believe that with that army he was going to reconquer Texas. Mr. Shannon, in his letter of the 12th of November, states that the letter from the Mexican Minister of Foreign Affairs to him was of such an insulting character as to compel him to suspend all diplomatic intercourse.

That was the situation of the Mexican Government at that time. They were unable to pay. They had not the money, and had failed to make the payment; but Mr. Green urged them from time to time, and finally they agreed to give to the agent appointed by Mr. Green, with the authority of this Government, drafts, which the agent accepted upon conference and consultation with Mr. Shannon, who was in the city of Mexico at that time, in performance of the duties of his mission. I will read a line or two from Mr. Shannon's letter:

"The note of the Mexican Minister of the 31st ultimo is so insulting, both in its language and charges, to the Government and people of the United States, and is such a flagrant breach of those rules of courtesy that should characterize international diplomatic intercourse, that I felt myself called upon to demand that it should be withdrawn."

And he says, in relation to the claims of American citizens, in the same letter:

"Until Congress takes hold of this subject, and gives this Government distinctly to understand that the claims of our citizens must be adjusted in a fair and just manner, I do not believe anything can or will be done. The whole tendency of things in this country is downward; and there is great danger, if those claims are postponed a few years longer, that they will be entirely lost to our citizens."

Thus it is seen, that under the apprehension that they would be entirely lost, the agent of the Government received these drafts. He feared, as the tendency of things there was downward, that unless this Government collected these claims immediately, they would lose them altogether. I have not the correspondence before me, but I am told that when Mr. Slidell was there, and refused to be received by the Mexican Government, he states that the drafts were then there and unpaid.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the House will indulge me, I will recapitulate a little, because here is a charge made upon the floor of Congress by a man of as high character as any in this Hall—the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations—against a man who has always sustained a fair, a high, and an honorable character; and who, when a very young man, was intrusted by the Government in the important capacity of chargé d'affaires to Mexico, and, in relation to whom, Mr. Calhoun himself stated, and also other eminent men, that, although a young man, his correspondence was conducted with as much ability as that of any of our foreign legation. I have shown that the gentleman is in error in supposing that Mr. Green received this money, or that a merchant other than a member of the firm of Hargous & Co., was authorized by him to receive it. I have shown, by the report of the Secretary of State, that Mr. Thompson was authorized to appoint agents to receive, receipt for, and transmit this money to the United States. Mr. Green was instructed by the Treasury Department to continue the same agent to receive the money, and Mr. Green appointed the same house, and the same member of that firm, who had been appointed by Mr. Thompson to receive it in the city of Mexico. The money was not paid, but that agent received drafts, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] admits that the drafts were received, but have never been paid, and gave receipts for them, which receipts stand as payment by Mexico against the United States. The drafts were never paid. I know that when this transaction occurred, and when it was stated by Mr. Rejon that this money was paid, that the Minister who succeeded Mr. Thompson was in Mexico.

Now I appeal to the House, I appeal to the magnanimity and liberality of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] to withdraw the charge that Mr. Green was guilty of a transaction in reference to that money which should have sent him to the penitentiary. This charge he makes, at the same time stating that he is a lawyer, a judge, and had been highly honored by his State, and I deem highly honored of this House, as the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the last, and now as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of this Congress. Now with all of these facts before him, positively disproving any impropriety upon the part of Mr. Green, will not he withdraw the imputation of error cast upon him? Mr. Shannon was there on the 27th of August, when the money was paid, as is shown by his own letter—how long previous to that time the documents do not show. The letter of the Minister of Finance of Mexico shows the arrangement for the payment of the money was entered into on the 27th of August.

Mr. BAYLY, (interrupting.) The gentleman from Kentucky assumes what all those who attended to my speech yesterday must know I did not say, that I distinctly charge that Mr. Green had received this money. I did not so charge, as the report of my speech will show, for this whole matter was involved in doubt.

I put the alternative in my speech as distinctly as I could in my hour, and I think the House will bear me testimony, that I put the alternative that the money had been either received, or it had not. If received, it had not been accounted for, and if it had not been received, that Mr. Green was instrumental in deceiving our Government, so as to cause that Government to make good the default. He had been instrumental in deceiving the Minister, and, in consequence, the Minister had not pressed the demands that he was instructed to make, and that in the mean time the Mexican war broke out, and the whole thing went by the board.

Mr. GREY. The Minister was in the city of Mexico, with plenary powers from this Government, at the date of this arrangement with Hargous & Co., and upon consultation, advised the agent to accede to the arrangement, and, consequently, Mr. Green could not deceive him. Our Minister gave to Mr. Green, his Secretary of Legation, the note of the Minister of Finance, Mr. Rejon, of the 2d of September, and requested him to transmit the information there communicated to our Government. In doing that he was only performing his duty, as the medium of correspondence between him and this Government. This is all explained by Mr. Shannon and by Mr. Slidell. It is explained in the Executive documents I have here upon my desk. Mr. Green was authorized to receive this money, and to appoint a substitute for that purpose, and was instructed to continue Hargous & Co. as agents to receipt for and transmit it to the United States. As I have shown by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, he was authorized to substitute that firm, and, therefore, Mr. Green is not responsible, for he complied strictly with the letter of his instruction. I am glad that I misunderstood the gentleman from Virginia, and that he did not make the charge. My impression at the time was, that he had stated that Mr. Green had received and embezzled this money. But I inferred that he had made such a charge from his statement, that many a man who had not been guilty of a greater violation of law had been sent to the penitentiary.

Mr. BAYLY. If it is disagreeable to the gentleman, I will not interrupt him. The remark I made, that I had seen men on not as strong testimony sent to the penitentiary, was in reference to Green's concealment of the truth, as I regard it, from the Minister, and through the Minister from his own Government. I never said that Mr. Green had been guilty of a penitentiary offence, but I said that I had seen men sent to the penitentiary upon less conclusive testimony than that which could show that he had concealed from the Minister, and through the Minister from his own Government. This is the true state of the case.

Mr. GREY. There certainly is no evidence before this House, no evidence before the nation, or in the executive documents of the Twenty-eighth Congress, or in the State Department, that I can find, that shows that Mr. Green deceived our Minister. A few days after the arrival of our Minister in the city of Mexico, he received a letter from Mr. Calhoun, urging him in the strongest and most emphatic manner to press for the immediate payment of that money. Our indulgence to Mexico, he stated, only seemed to induce her to a greater unwillingness to pay the money, and he requests him to be as urgent as possible. Mr. Green, who was the agent appointed to receive this money, in May wrote a dispatch to the Government that he could not get it, and forwarded the copy of his letter demanding payment from the Mexican Government. Then, when Mr. Shannon arrived there, would not he bring up this matter as one of the first objects of his mission? The money was paid after he got there, and the arrangement for its payment was also entered into. On Mr. Shannon's arrival, the whole matter was turned over, by the Secretary of Legation, into his hands.

Mr. HUNTER. The gentleman from Kentucky seems still to impress the idea that Governor Shannon had the control of the receipt of this money. Now Governor Shannon is a constituent and personal friend of mine, and I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky, if he is not aware that Governor Shannon could not have had any direct control of the payment of this money whatever? He knew nothing, and could know nothing, about it, only as he received instructions from Mr. Green, as to whether it was or was not paid. I am not willing that the impression shall go out from this House, that Mr. Shannon, in any manner, had anything to do with the payment of that money.

Mr. GREY. The gentleman misunderstands me, if he supposes that I stated Governor Shannon was in default, or that he received any of this money, or was guilty of any impropriety. I say that Mr. Shannon, our Minister, was in the city of Mexico at the time the arrangement was made. It was on account of her insolvency that the money was not paid, as a revolution broke out there soon afterwards. Mr. Green, when charged, pressed, month after month, the Mexican Government to pay this money, but still it was delayed. The Secretary of State, in his letters, urged our Minister, Mr. Shannon, and agent, to insist upon its immediate payment. Can any man here show—does the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. BAYLY] attempt to show, that Mr. Green instructed the agents to receive these drafts? Is it not more probable that Mr. Shannon and Mr. Green, and Hargous & Co., consulted together in relation to the matter? Mr. Green appointed, by the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, Hargous & Co. as agents to receive and transmit this money to the Government. Mr. Shannon says, in his dispatch before me, that the tendency of things there was downwards, and that unless the money was collected immediately, our citizens who were the claimants, would lose their claims.

Mr. PHELPS. In relation to this draft it was stated by the Minister of Finance of the Mexican Government, that it had been given to Tayleur, Jamison & Co., for the purpose of paying the installments of the 30th of April, 1844, and July of the same year. Mr. Slidell was instructed by Mr. Polk's administration to inquire into the alleged payment of the April and July installments. You will find that Mr. Voss states, in the correspondence, that the arrangement which was made with the house of Tayleur, Jamison & Co. by himself, as the agent of our Government, received the approbation and sanction of Governor Shannon, and he advised them in relation to it. The manner in which the transaction occurred was this: The firm of Tayleur, Jamison & Co. were in Mexico prosecuting claims in their own right against the Government of that country. General Thompson, our Minister at that place, had received a warrant of attorney—as I may term it—from our Government, instructing him to receive the amount of money due under the convention of 1843, with the power of substitution. He appointed Mr. Voss, as he states in his correspondence to this Government, as an agent, declining to have anything to do with this matter, and also inferring, from the instructions which were sent to him, that it was the wish of the Government that he should appoint a banker to manage the transaction and to transmit the money to the United States. Mr. Thompson returned to the United States. The Administration was informed that Mr. Voss still had authority to receive the money. Mr. Green was never authorized to receive any other installment than that of April, 1844, amounting to something upwards of one hundred thousand dollars. He had also the power of substitution; and, with the authority communicated to him, there was a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury instructing him to retain the agent appointed by Mr. Thompson; informing him, at the same time, that it was for the purpose of avoiding any cavil on the part of the Mexican Government in consequence of the departure of Mr. Thompson from the city of Mexico. Now, I come down to the transaction of August. On the 25th of August—

Mr. BAYLY. Let the letter of Mr. Spencer be read.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman from Virginia asks that the letter of Mr. Spencer be read. With the permission of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GREY] I will read it:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 25, 1844.

SIR: It is the wish and direction of this Department that any payment made you under the convention with Mexico may be transmitted hither under the arrangement made by General Thompson with the house of Hargous, Brothers & Co.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. C. SPENCER,
Secretary of the Treasury.

BENJAMIN E. GREEN,
Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America.

I will now read an extract from the letter of Mr. Bibb, Secretary of the Treasury:

"In April last, B. E. Green, Esq., then Chargé d'Affaires of the United States, was specially empowered to receive the installment falling due on the 30th of that month; and he was instructed by this Department to make a similar arrangement with Messrs. Hargous & Co. as had been done by the Hon. Waddy Thompson. This power was not intended as a revocation of that to the latter gentleman, but merely to prevent and meet any objection that might be urged to the substitution of Messrs. Hargous & Co. being considered by the Mexican Government as at an end after Mr. Thompson had returned to the United States. The power to that gentleman was considered by the Department as permanent until revoked, as will appear by the documents annexed to this report. The letter of Mr. Green, herewith submitted, states all the information on the subject of these installments which has been received from him since his appointment."

The Secretary of the Treasury states expressly that the only reason why Mr. Green was instructed to continue the agency of the firm of Hargous & Co., was to prevent any cavil on the part of the Mexican Government. They had collected the first and second installment under the convention of 1843. But I was remarking now in relation to the manner in which this payment was made on the part of Mexico. I have remarked that the house of Tayleur, Jamison & Co. were engaged in the prosecution, in their own right, of claims, against the Mexican Government. They made a proposition to the Mexican Government that they would pay $274,000, the installments due April and July, 1844, upon certain conditions. They were to pay to the Government of the United States these two installments in money, and were to receive orders upon certain branches of the revenue, which were to be anticipated. They had not been collected. One of these drafts was upon the custom-house at Mazatlan for the sum of $160,000; another draft was to be paid out of the revenue on tobacco; and there was another upon the general Treasury to the amount of $60,000; and other drafts as mentioned in their proposition. This proposition was made to the Mexican Government on the 25th of August, 1844, but the Mexican Government did not accede to it until the 27th of August, 1844. On that very day Governor Shannon was in the city of Mexico. There is no statement as to the time of his arrival. He on that day addressed the Minister of Foreign Affairs, notifying the Government of his arrival there. Mr. Voss, in his letter to Mr. Slidell, when that gentleman was inquiring into this matter, stated that this whole transaction was under the advice and supervision of Governor Shannon.

The arrangement made by Voss with Tayleur, Jamison & Co., was immediately to pay over this money to Mr. Voss, the agent of our Government. It was afterwards contended that there was a full acceptance on the part of this house, by which they became obligated to pay to this Government that amount, notwithstanding they had never received the money which had been stipulated in their proposition and accepted by the Mexican Government. The inquiry then is, what has become of these drafts? They were not paid in December, 1845; so Mr. Slidell reports, who was charged expressly to inquire into this matter. There was a correspondence between Tayleur, Jamison & Co., and Voss, and Mr. Black, our consul at the city of Mexico, in relation to the matter. It was not until Mr. Slidell reached the city of Mexico that the authority given to Mr. Voss was revoked, and the fact was communicated to the Mexican Government, not by Mr. Slidell, because he was not accredited, but communicated by our consul at the city of Mexico, Mr. Black. The authority previously given to Mr. Voss to receive this money under the convention of 1843, was revoked by the Government—revoked by Mr. Slidell. Now in relation to the receipt given to the Mexican Government. No receipt was given to the Mexican Government until the 20th day of September. That was the time the receipt bears date, although it indicates that the money had been previously to that time received. I can say the public documents show this fact—that in December, 1845, no portion of this money ($274,000) had ever been received by the agent of the Government from Voss, by Mr. Green or any of our diplomatic agents in Mexico; but, on the contrary, they show that they are the drafts still outstanding and unpaid, and that the arrangement made by Tayleur, Jamison & Co. had never been complied with on the part of the Mexican Government. No one doubts that. Neither Shannon, Green, or any other person got the money. The inquiry is, what has been done in this case? Under the 13th article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, we have remitted this amount to Mexico, and we have no right to claim it. I say that the 13th article of that treaty bears me out in the position I take, that everything which was due the citizens of Mexico under and by virtue of the convention of 1843, should be remitted to Mexico, and that we should become the paymasters for those of our own citizens who claimed indemnity from Mexico.

Let me tell you further in relation to this matter. The Mexican Government, on the 11th day of November, 1845, acknowledged the fact, that these drafts had not been paid.

Here is the original translation:

Don Emilio Voss, in this petition, prays that the receipt be returned to him which he gave to this General Treasury for the amount of the two drafts which fell due on the 30th of April and the 30th of July of the last year, on the forced loan destined to the payments [of the debt] to the United States.

It is true, that the amount to which Voss refers was not delivered to him in effective funds by this Treasury, but orders were issued for the payment; for which reason, this department considers that this business should be held as finished; and it cannot comply with his petition to have the receipt returned to him, since, besides the confusion [trastorno] which it would naturally occasion in the account and statement, the credit of the nation would suffer, in a certain degree, as, the Government of the United States being already informed that the said amount has been paid, if the receipt be simply returned to Voss it will seem that the Government of Mexico, even without the knowledge of the person empowered, gave the assurance that the payment had been made; which has not happened, inasmuch as, on the issue of those orders, by agreement with the said person empowered, the Government fulfilled its part. If the repeated orders have not been complied with, in consequence of circumstances which it has not been possible to avoid, Don Emilio Voss may pray that they be given on some other fund than that which was designated. This is the opinion of us all; but your Excellency will determine what you may consider just.

Mexico, November 11, 1845.

We, the ministers of the General Treasury of the nation, do certify that the preceding copy is literally conformable with the report made by this General Treasury to his Excellency the Minister of Finance, on the subject to which it refers, and copy of which is delivered to the person interested, in virtue of a supreme order dated the 3d of the present month.

A. MATRES,
A. M. DE ESNAURRIZAR.

Mexico, December 5, 1845.

I say here is an acknowledgment in this report, prepared and signed by the Mexican Minister of the Treasury, that the money which was expected to have been paid upon these drafts had never been paid at the time Mr. Voss petitioned that his receipts should be returned.

Mr. BAYLY. Here is what Mr. Slidell says after all that thing occurred. I mean the letter of January 9th, 1846, addressed to Mr. Voss:

MEXICO, January 9, 1846.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 6th instant. I consider my agency in relation to the installments of April and July, 1844, as limited to the ascertaining the facts connected with the alleged payment, and the revocation of your powers to receive moneys on account of those or any future installments; I therefore do not feel myself called upon to respond to your suggestion, that you are entitled to receive an expression of the approbation of the Government of the United States for your past services, or to express any opinion as to the propriety of the course pursued by you.

I have, through the Consul of the United States, Mr. Black, given notice to the Government of Mexico of the revocation of your powers to receive any moneys on account of the United States. In the absence of a statement from the officers of the Mexican Treasury of all the facts of the case, I am not prepared to take the steps suggested by you and Messrs. Tayleur, Jamison, & Co. I am not willing, until further advised, to do anything which may impair the unqualified obligation which I think those gentlemen contracted to advance, on the 27th of August, 1844, in cash, the sum of $274,664 67; and I cannot but express my surprise that you should not have insisted, at the time, upon its immediate performance.

I am, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,
JOHN SLIDELL.

To EMILIO VOSS, Esq., Mexico.

He calls upon the Mexican Government for a copy of this receipt, which they refuse. The receipt which the gentleman reads is a copy which Mr. Voss furnishes:

[TRANSLATION OF THE RECEIPT.]

$274,664 67.—I received from the General Treasury the sum of two hundred and seventy-four thousand six hundred and sixty-four dollars and sixty-seven cents, the amount of the two quarterly installments due on the claims of the United States.

EMILIO VOSS.

MEXICO, September 20, 1844.

MR. GREY. Mr. Slidell admits that none of that money had been paid.

MR. BAYLY. On the contrary, he calls upon him to account for it.

MR. PHELPS. I stated, that it was contended by our Minister, that the house of Tayleur, Jamison & Co. had absolutely obligated themselves to advance the amount of money due in April and July, 1844. Let us see what Tayleur, Jamison & Co. say in reference to this advance. They speak of the order for $160,000, and the other orders in their letter to Mr. Voss, as being unpaid.

No. 2.

[ENCLOSURE IN NO. 1.]

Messrs. Tayleur, Jamison & Co., to Mr. Voss.

MEXICO, December 17, 1845.

DEAR SIR: In conformity with your desire to be informed of the actual position of the orders received by us against various departments of the public treasury for the two installments due by this Government, in July, 1844, to the American claimants, the collection of which has been assumed by us, we have to inform you, with regret, that up to the present date not a dollar has been paid on account of those documents. The Government having failed to comply with its engagements to us, we of course can make no anticipation to you on account of those orders, but we continue our efforts to effect the collection; and, persuaded, as we are, that temporary financial difficulties only have produced this want of punctuality on the part of the Government, we are far from despairing of success.

Should you, however, prefer receiving back the documents, which are—

Order on the Treasury for bills arising from maritime duties at Mazatlan, payable here.....	$160,000 00
Order on Manning & Mackintosh for funds proceeding from forced loan.....	60,000 00
Order against circulation and export duties of specie at this custom-house.....	50,000 00
Part of an order on the tobacco revenue.....	4,664 67

we hold them at your disposal, or that of any party whom you may name to receive them.

We are, dear sir, yours, respectfully,

TAYLEUR, JAMISON & CO.

EMILIO VOSS, Esq.

There is also the correspondence between Mr. Slidell and Messrs. Tayleur, Jamison & Co., and it shows that not a cent had been paid by the Mexican Government:

"The order for $160,000, standing first in our letter to Mr. Voss, is lodged in the Treasury here, in conformity with the usual practice to authorize the receipt by us of the bills for that amount, which should have been remitted from Mazatlan according to agreement, but which have not been received.

"The order for $60,000 on Manning & Mackintosh was returned by them unpaid, and has since unfortunately been mislaid; but, as you will perceive from the enclosed copy of a letter from them, dated 23d ultimo, the proof of non-payment is easily established.

"The supreme order for $50,000, arising from specie duties, exists in the Treasury; but, as before mentioned, without effect, in consequence of later counter-orders from the Government; and the order against the tobacco revenue for $4,664 67 is in the same situation. None of these facts will be denied by the Government; and we propose, should you decide on having the deposit made with Mr. Black, to address a communication to the Minister, requesting him to consider the Consul of the United States as the party to whom the several sums are to be paid—an arrangement which you will find to be quite consistent with the contents of our letter of 17th ultimo to Mr. Voss."

The executive documents show that Mr. Green never received this money—it was not paid in December '45, and January '46, by the Mexican Government, and that in November '45, the Ministers of the Treasury of the Mexican Government acknowledged the money had not been paid to our agent. B. E. Green is therefore not responsible for any loss which has happened to the Government; nor is he in any manner chargeable or responsible for the loss which has occurred. General Thompson appointed the agent to receive this money—the administration of Mr. Tyler instructed Mr. Green to retain that agent—the alleged payment was not made until Governor Shannon reached the city of Mexico, and then upon his advice and consultation with our agent. Occupying the floor by the permission of the gentleman from Kentucky, [MR. GREY,] I do not propose to fix the responsibility, but declare to the committee that Mr. B. E. Green is fully exonerated, in my opinion, from any culpability in consequence of the loss of the installments due in April and July, 1844, of $274,000 by the Mexican Government to our Government.

MR. GREY. Mr. Chairman, I have but a few more words to say. In relation to the payment of this money, from the time Thompson left to the time Shannon arrived, it was evident that Mr. Green was daily pressing for the payment of the installments due by Mexico; and it is also evident from the correspondence of Mr. Slidell, that Governor Shannon was in consultation with Tayleur, Jamison & Co., and with Hargous & Co. It is a fact, that he was there at the time in consultation with them; and how can it be charged that Mr. Green was in fault, because, as Secretary of Legation, he sent to this Government, by the instructions of Mr. Shannon, a communication from the Mexican Minister of Finance, addressed to Mr. Shannon? It will be remembered, also, that the receipt for this draft was not given by Hargous & Co. to the Mexican Government, until the 21st of September, nearly a month after Mr. Shannon had been in the city of Mexico. It is clearly evident that Mr. Green, Secretary of Legation, was superseded by the arrival of the Minister.

And now, Mr. Chairman, having repelled the charge which I understood the gentleman from Virginia [MR. BAYLY] to have made; having by the record proved that Mr. Shannon, as Minister Plenipotentiary, was in the city of Mexico when the arrangement was made by Mr. Voss, and approved of it,—I appeal to the gentleman from Virginia to retract the charge which he yesterday made against Mr. Green, because he must now be satisfied there is not the slightest foundation for it.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I feel bound to say, that I know Benjamin E. Green; that I have known him from a child; that my relations have been the most intimate; that my knowledge of his conduct and character, of what he is, and of what he has done, enables me to say, that in intelligence and acquirements he has few equals of his age; that for honor and integrity he has no superior, and that he is incapable of an unworthy or dishonorable act. In his letter to —, dated Mexico, — day of —, Mr. Shannon remarks, "I find Mr. Green a young man of fine talents and acquirements, and his services invaluable." I repeat, sir, that I have known Mr. Green from a child; that when his father's pecuniary embarrassments made it necessary, he denied himself, when yet under age, even the comforts of life, that he might appropriate a large part of his earnings to the support of his mother, and the education of his brother and sisters; that when in Mexico he applied a large part of his salary to the same praiseworthy object, and that believing he could better aid his father in the development of his property and the support of his family, he left Mexico. Gratifying to him as his position there was, by his talents, industry, intelligence, and economy, he has won the respect and confidence of all who know him; and I am gratified to be able to reply to the sneering insinuations of the gentleman from Virginia, that such has been the reward of his self-denial, perseverance and industry, that his pecuniary condition will now compare favorably with that of the gentleman from Virginia, boastful as he is of the high position he occupies, and of the many places of trust and honor which he has held by the favor of the people and Legislature of his State; and in making this declaration on my part, I might, if I were so disposed, follow the example of the gentleman, and refer to the distinguished marks of confidence which I, too, have received from the Legislature of my native State and from the people, among whom I have lived from infancy.

Sir, I am done. I repel the charges which the gentleman from Virginia has made; and I think I have proved to this House and to the gentleman himself, that they are incorrect and not authorized by the facts as set forth in the diplomatic correspondence relative to those arrangements and negotiations with the Government of Mexico.

MR. FOWLER moved that the committee rise; which was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman [MR. JONES] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 46, providing for carrying into execution in further part the 12th article of the treaty concluded with Mexico at Guadalupe Hidalgo, but had come to no conclusion thereon.

MR. HOUSTON. A good many gentlemen have suggested to me the propriety of asking the House to agree to meet again after a recess this evening and discuss this question.

[Cries of "No!" "No!"]

MR. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move that the House take a recess until seven o'clock. There are several gentlemen here who desire to speak. Let those who do not wish to speak stay at home.

MR. JONES, of Tennessee. I will say, with the permission of the gentleman from Georgia, that the hour of twelve has been fixed for the meeting of the House until it shall be otherwise ordered. That is now one of the rules of the House, and you cannot change it without one day's notice.

THE SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the hour of meeting cannot be changed without one day's notice.

MR. STEPHENS. I think that the gentleman from Tennessee misunderstands the rule. If I was to move to adjourn till to-morrow, it must be till the hour fixed by the standing rule, but not if we wish to adjourn from one hour to another on the same day. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [MR. ALLEN,] however, who is entitled to the floor in the committee, asks me to withdraw my motion, as he will not be able to speak to-night, and for that reason I withdraw it.

On motion by Mr. FOWLER, the House then adjourned.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 23, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. L. F. MORGAN.

The PRESIDENT. The first private bill on the Calendar is a bill for the relief of Charles A. Kellet.

Mr. BELL. I would suggest that the motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill for the relief of Sally T. Floyd has priority.

The PRESIDENT. No, sir. This is private bill day; and nothing is in order but private bills in their order on the Calendar.

Mr. BELL. The motion to reconsider was laid on the table, and I thought it would come up first.

The PRESIDENT. That motion having been laid on the table, the bill cannot be taken up without a motion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I move to take it up, as it is a private bill.

The PRESIDENT. It is not on the Calendar as a private bill; it is a motion to reconsider, which motion was laid on the table.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. MALLORY. I rise for the purpose of making a brief personal explanation. In the reports of yesterday I find this passage, reported as having been said by the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE:]

"I have looked over the last long speech made in the Senate, the speech of the honorable Senator from Florida, [Mr. MALLORY.] with some care, to find a remark in it to which I had replied; but I could not find a word of it in the speech of the honorable Senator. The poor remarks which I made were published as a reply to something which, by the reports of the Senate, did not appear ever to have been said."

These remarks were made yesterday during my temporary absence, for a few moments, from the Chamber, and while I was in one of the committee rooms. I am perfectly satisfied that the honorable Senator from New Hampshire attaches no particular importance to the matter, and that his remark was made in no offensive spirit; but he alluded to an old established usage, as I understand, for Senators to correct their speeches; and, in so doing, to withdraw matter which has been said, and insert matter which has not been said. All I object to is, that I should be held up here as an illustration of the bad practice of Senators. I think a new Senator ought not to be held up as an illustration in a case where the practice has been one of long standing. If I had adopted this course it probably would have been sustained by usage. I did desire to alter some part of the phraseology of the speech, to which the Senator referred; but I did not feel at liberty to do so, for the Reporter's notes were exceedingly accurate, and I was surprised at their correctness. In order that I might not depend on my own recollection, I have called on the foreman of the printing office, who assured me that he had never seen a speech returned with so few verbal alterations. Nothing was erased except, perhaps, some words of a tautological character. I can now only say that the passage which the honorable Senator believed to have been erased, he has since discovered in the reported speech.

Mr. HALE. May I be allowed a single moment? The Senate will bear me witness that I did not allude to the honorable Senator from Florida, until several Senators had called for an instance of the practice to which I alluded. It occurred to me that I had looked over the speech of the honorable Senator from Florida without being able to find the passage to which I referred; hence, on the spur of the moment, as an illustration of my remark, I alluded to the circumstance. But the honorable Senator has since called on me and asked me to examine the speech, and pointed out the passage. I examined it accordingly, and found there the passage to which I had replied. While I make this explanation, I do not admit that the statement which I made yesterday was not entirely correct as to the practice which obtains. I was only unfortunate in selecting an instance to prove it; and I must content myself with a reference to an illustrious example which happened in Spain. Don Quixote maintained that Dulcinea was the most beautiful princess in the whole world; and he challenged every one in the world who dared deny it. He fought one man, in which battle he was worsted; and when he was called upon to yield, he said, "No; Dulcinea is the most beautiful princess, but Don Quixote is very unfortunate."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHITCOMB. I desire the unanimous consent of the Senate, if that be necessary, to make a report on a private bill.

The PRESIDENT. The Senate will have to suspend their order before they can take up any business but private bills on the Calendar.

Mr. WHITCOMB. I move that the order be suspended until one o'clock.

Mr. MANGUM. That can be done by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT. The order can be suspended by a majority, as it is not a rule of the Senate. It will require, therefore, a motion, to be adopted by the Senate, to suspend the execution of the order until any particular hour the Senate may think proper. Unless it be suspended, the Chair is bound, according to the order, to take up private bills to the exclusion of other business.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I was under the impression yesterday, that on the motion of the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] the further consideration of the bill granting land to the State of Iowa for the construction of certain railroads, was postponed until to-day. If that was not the understanding of the Senate, I was mistaken. I believe that I have never, since I have been in this body, asked the indulgence of the Senate, on any occasion, to take up any bill; but I must now ask the Senate to do me the favor to take up that bill. I therefore move to suspend the execution of the order.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair cannot receive that motion, inasmuch as the Senate has just refused, on another motion, to suspend the execution of the order until one o'clock. The first private bill on the Calendar is for the relief of Charles A. Kellet.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I certainly feel it incumbent upon me to ask for the consideration of the question on the reconsideration of the bill granting a pension to Mrs. Sally T. Floyd. I doubt whether it is not entitled to priority under the principles of parliamentary law, it being a question of reconsideration. But if we cannot reach it in any other way, as it is a private bill, I must ask a suspension of the execution of the order till that question is disposed of. I am willing to let the bill be considered, in order that it may go upon the general orders; and then we shall presently come to it, and act upon it.

Mr. BADGER. We shall get at it after we shall have got through other bills.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If that can be done, I waive my request.

CHARLES A. KELLET.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Charles A. Kellet. It enacts that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to refund to Charles A. Kellet, or his legal representatives, the sum paid to the collector of the port of New York as tonnage duties on the Chinese junk Keying, imported there for exhibition, provided the same shall not exceed $500.

Mr. DAVIS. If any gentleman wishes an explanation of this bill, I will give it to him; but I do not wish to detain the Senate unless some Senator desires an explanation.

Several SENATORS. It is not necessary.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

THEODORE OFFUT.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Theodore Offut. It is in these words:

"Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be and he is hereby directed to pay to Theodore Offut, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of ninety dollars, the value of a grey mare, the property of said Offut, which was turned over to the use of the Government by his commanding officer, Captain W. C. Pollard."

The bill was reported from the Committee of Claims, with an amendment to add the words "without authority," to the end of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, the amendment was agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A. H. COLE.

The Senate next proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of A. H. Cole, reported from the Committee of Claims. It enacts that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized and required to settle the claim of A. H. Cole, late a sutler in the Army of the United States, in Florida, on the same principles of equity and justice as are extended to other sutlers under the existing Army regulations: provided satisfactory evidence shall be submitted as to the amount of the claim, and that no money shall be paid for goods furnished to deserters or discharged soldiers, unless to the amount of money which was due to them by the Government. The second section enacts that the sum found to be due in said settlement aforesaid shall be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. BADGER. I beg to suggest a small amendment. In the second section I see the words "in said settlement aforesaid." I move to strike out the word "aforesaid," as it is wholly unnecessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, the amendment was concurred in, and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

JAMES DUNNING.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of James Dunning, reported from the Committee of Claims. It enacts that the proper accounting officer of the Treasury be authorized and directed to pay to James Dunning, $255 98, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as interest on a liquidated amount of $4,000 due to him, in payment, by contract, on the 18th of June, 1850, but withheld until the 12th of October following for want of an appropriation therefor.

No amendment being proposed to the bill, it was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

ENOCH BALDWIN AND OTHERS.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Enoch Baldwin and others, reported from the Committee on Commerce. It enacts that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to ascertain the amount of excess of duties paid by Enoch Baldwin, or by Baldwin & Co., upon two hundred and forty-eight puncheons of rum, imported into the port of Eastport, in the State of Maine, from the Island of Tobago, on the 1st of October, 1822, in the British brig Despatch, over and above what would have been paid if said rum had been imported in an American vessel; and that said excess, so ascertained, shall be paid over to the said Enoch Baldwin, and such others, if any, as are lawfully interested therein.

Mr. HUNTER. This is a bill for refunding duties. It is strange that it should come from the Committee on Commerce. I would like to hear the report in that case read.

The report was accordingly read. It appears from it, that in 1822 the British brig Despatch, being at the Island of Tobago, in the West Indies, took on board a quantity of rum, the produce of that Island. American vessels were allowed to enter and clear on that Island upon the same footing as English vessels. The cargo was taken on board, under the full belief that no discriminating tonnage duties would be exacted, if she entered any port of the United States. The vessel accordingly cleared for Boston, and after landing there one hundred puncheons, consigned to one Aaron Baldwin, cleared for Campo Bello, New Brunswick, but afterwards returned to what was then Lubec, in the State of Maine, and there landed the residue of her cargo. The then collector of that port states, under oath, that at that time it was not only the belief, but it was the general impression, in all quarters, that discriminating tonnage duties were not to be exacted. In consequence of the prevalence of this opinion, the Secretary of the Treasury issued a circular, directing the officers of the customs to exact such duties. The news of the issue of this circular had not reached Boston nor Lubeck at the time of the discharge of this cargo. Under the circumstances, Congress formerly passed a bill for the relief of Aaron Baldwin, the owner of the one hundred puncheons landed at Boston. The committee, therefore, think that Enoch Baldwin and others should be relieved from these duties on the two hundred and forty-eight puncheons landed at Lubeck.

Mr. HUNTER. I never heard of the case before. I only have such knowledge of it as I can gather from the reading of the report. As I understand the report, this bill proposes to relieve an individual on account of his ignorance of the law.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia perhaps does not quite understand the nature of this case. The trade between the United States and the West Indies, before the arrangement of 1832 was entered into, was made dependent upon proclamation. Whenever the British Government were disposed to let the vessels of the United States into any of the ports of their West India colonies, they issued a proclamation to that effect, and vessels went there, and when the proclamation was withdrawn the trade stopped. This trade was thrown open by the proclamation of 1832, the time referred to in this report. This vessel, the Despatch, was a provincial vessel, belonging to owners in New Brunswick, and was at Tobago, in the West Indies, and it was understood there that no discriminating duties on tonnage, which existed under the system of reciprocal duties, would be exacted. No discriminating duties were then supposed to exist by reason of the terms of the proclamation referred to—a proclamation of the President of the United States. They thought it safe, therefore, to take a cargo on board which should be landed in the United States, either in part or in whole. The vessel came to Boston, and delivered part of her cargo by landing one hundred puncheons of rum. It was then understood at Boston, just as it was at Tobago, that no discriminating duties existed. It was so understood from the British proclamations—it was so understood from the proclamations of our own Government, and therefore they landed one hundred puncheons. The vessel then cleared for the port of Campo Bello, in New Brunswick; but afterwards her owner concluded to land the rest of the cargo at a place then called Lubeck—now Eastport, in Maine. She entered there on the 1st of October in that year, there landed her cargo, and paid the duties required. Subsequently, however, to the landing of the cargo in Boston, and the landing of the remainder of it in Lubeck, a Treasury circular was issued here, requiring collectors in all cases to exact discriminating duties on tonnage. The very fact of the issue of the Treasury circular shows that the common interpretation was that those duties were not to be exacted. But the owners of the vessel had to pay discriminating duties on the tonnage; and this bill relates to nothing but duties on tonnage. They entered evidently under a misapprehension, supposing that they would not be subject to discriminating duties on tonnage. They were so informed by the custom-house officers, and such was the general impression everywhere.

In this state of the facts, some years ago Congress remitted the duties on that part of the cargo which was entered at Boston. I believe I reported that bill myself, and therefore I am able to speak to the fact that these parties were simply left out by mistake. It was supposed that that bill covered this case; but it was afterwards found that the parties to whom was consigned that portion of the cargo which was landed at Lubeck were not included. A question, however, was raised afterwards, whether, when they came to Boston, they actually had not notice of the existence of the Treasury circular; and that hence they must have been aware of it before they made an entry at Lubeck. Now, it is satisfactorily proved that they did not know of the existence of the circular, and that the collector at Boston did not know if it, nor did the collector at Eastport when they arrived there.

They had no knowledge of it whatsoever. It is very clear, therefore, that they entered through mistake and misapprehension. They probably would not have entered in the United States if they had known that those discriminating tonnage duties would have been exacted. This bill now proposes, in reference to the parties to whom the puncheons were consigned, and that were landed at Lubeck, to restore to them the amount of the discriminating duty on the tonnage which they paid into the Treasury some thirty years ago, under these circumstances.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, it seems, then, that I was right in supposing that this is a claim for relief on the ground that these parties did mistake the law. As proof of their misapprehension, the fact is adverted to that the Treasury circular was issued in order to expound the law, which showed that they were acting under a mistake. Now the Treasury circular either expounded the law as it was or it did not. If it was a mistake, they had recourse to the courts, where they could be relieved. If the Treasury circular was in pursuance of law, and construed the law properly, the only established fact in reference to the case is, that those parties misapprehended the law. It seems to me that this principle would extend much further than is supposed. It would extend not only to cases in which mistakes are made in relation to tonnage duties, but in cases of mistakes in relation to duties laid on imports; and it might have a most important and serious bearing on the revenue of the country, if we extend this principle further.

It does appear to me that this bill rests on the same ground with that of every other case of violation of the law, occasioned by misapprehension and mistake in relation to the laws of the land. I can see no reason for relieving the parties in this case which would not exist in relation to duties paid on goods imported under a misapprehension of the laws imposing duties upon imports. Many of such cases have arisen where it was necessary to expound the law by Treasury Circular. If we go back to relieve such cases, certainly we shall expose the Treasury to great loss. I do not see where we are to draw the line of distinction. Not only that, but it seems to me that this is a very old case, and there must be some difficulty in ascertaining the facts. If I caught the dates correctly, the Senator from Massachusetts represents this vessel as having entered Eastport in 1822, about thirty years ago. It must be a very dangerous subject, then, to agree upon now. I am unwilling to pass this bill.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Virginia fails to take into view one important fact in this matter. This was a trade entirely dependent on proclamation. It existed by proclamation. It was closed by proclamation. It was irregular and anomalous in its character. Such was the position of our intercourse with the West Indies at that time. Now, who is to put a construction on the effect of this proclamation? Why, the owners of property put a construction upon it. There was a construction put upon it in the Island of Tobago; and the construction of both was, that these discriminating duties on tonnage were not to be exacted. Such was the construction of the custom-house officers here. It was so construed by the officers of the Government. If I recollect right, this construction was put upon it by Secretary Forsyth, by the collector at Eastport, and by every other collector in the country.

This seems to me to be a very equitable and just claim. The party was authorized to bring in his cargo. Under these circumstances, when he saw the action of the Government interpreted by its own officers in a certain way, he had a right to act in pursuance of the interpretation of it given by the officers of the Government. In opposition to that interpretation, he has been subjected to these discriminating duties on tonnage. They ought to be restored.

The gentleman says that this is an old claim. I believe it is some eight or ten years since the duties were refunded on that part of the cargo of this vessel which was entered at Boston. This bill has been under the consideration of the Senate repeatedly. It has received the favorable consideration of the House of Representatives, but has been lost between the two Houses for want of time.

Mr. BROADHEAD. I would like to ask the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, before he takes his seat, how much this bill is likely to take from the Treasury?

Mr. DAVIS. I believe about $1,000—nothing but discriminating duties on tonnage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

EDWARD EVERETT.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Edward Everett, late a sergeant in the United States Army, which was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. It enacts that the sum of $607 50 be allowed and paid to Edward Everett, late a sergeant in company A, first regiment of Illinois volunteers, in full compensation for services rendered by him as clerk in the Quartermaster's Department, from October 15, 1846, to June 17, 1847.

It was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. FELCH called for the reading of the report.

The report was read. It states that Edward Everett was a sergeant in company A, of the first regiment of Illinois volunteers, commanded by Colonel John J. Hardin, deceased; that on the 11th of September, 1846, while in discharge of his duty, Everett received a wound in the knee, which so far disabled him from service that he had to be left at the hospital in San Antonio. A surgeon's certificate was received, and an application forwarded for his discharge, but under a misapprehension of his case by some of the officers of his company, instead of a discharge being forwarded to him as he requested, a furlough was granted to him for the remainder of his time of service. Thus disabled and on furlough, he had a right of course to go whithersoever he pleased, and employ himself in such a way as his crippled condition would permit, without forfeiting any portion of his pay as sergeant. The Assistant Quartermaster, then at San Antonio, having need of clerical aid, employed Everett under an agreement that he should receive the same rate of compensation as other clerks—that is, $90 per month, deducting therefrom the amount of his regular pay as sergeant. He served as a clerk from 15th October, 1846, to the 17th June, 1847. Though his wounded knee joint was a great affliction to him, yet his services as a clerk were much more valuable and vigilant than the services of any other clerk in the department. Assistant Quartermaster Ralston, at the expiration of the time for which he served, paid him $607 50 for his services; but in the settlement of the Quartermaster's account at the Treasury, this item of $607 50 was disallowed. Everett, impelled by a sense of honor, refunded the entire amount, and appealed to Congress for relief. The committee therefore recommend that the bill for his relief be passed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

HEIRS OF A. G. MORGAN.

The Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill for the relief of the heirs and representatives of Colonel Alexander G. Morgan. It enacts that the accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized and required to settle the accounts of Alexander G. Morgan, for services in raising troops for the Florida war, in 1837, and also for his military services in Florida; provided the pay and allowance to him shall not exceed the compensation of a captain of cavalry, and that so much as shall be found due to him shall be paid to his heirs and representatives out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. BRADBURY. Is there any report in that case?

Mr. ATCHISON. I think I can explain the matter. At the time these services were rendered, Colonel Morgan was a citizen of the State of Missouri. Under the direction of the Secretary of War he raised a battalion for the Florida war, in 1837. Colonel Morgan commanded that battalion during the whole war, and fought bravely at the battle of Okeechobee. To my certain knowledge, five times the amount of a captain's pay would not indemnify him for raising that battalion. Though his services were received and he acted as the commanding officer of that battalion, yet, as he was not regularly commissioned in the service, either by the State of Missouri or by the United States, he did not receive any pay at all. It is now proposed to pay his heirs what he would have been entitled to receive at the rate of the compensation of a captain of cavalry.

Mr. BRADBURY. My reason for making the objection was, that I think we have passed upon some claims making compensation for military services in the Indian wars in Florida hastily. At any rate, if any reliance can be placed on the statements of citizens of Florida, great caution ought to be exercised in regard to any of these claims. I have been informed by citizens of Florida that we passed a bill a few years ago granting compensation to a regiment of soldiers amounting to some fifteen or sixteen hundred men, for fifteen months, when there was nothing but a mere skeleton of a regiment, a number of individuals collected but for a few days. Not one quarter of the number paid in that case were ever mustered into service; and the number that was mustered were discharged in a very few days, or, if not then, in a very few weeks. I understand that the muster rolls in that case were made up very much as Falstaff's regiment was made up. I did not know but that something of that sort might be the case here. I am glad to hear the explanation of the Senator from Missouri; but in cases of this kind, it seems to me that we ought to have a report setting forth the facts, that they may go on record, and that we may fully understand the character of the claims, that they may be matters for reference hereafter. I hope the honorable Senator will allow the bill to lie over until he can put the facts he has stated in the form of a report.

Mr. ATCHISON. The facts are in the form of a report, and the Senator can ascertain them by looking over his file of reports.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I know well the gentleman who rendered these services. I know when he volunteered in the State of Missouri, and how long he remained, and I can say, no more gallant man ever lived. He was one of that gallant Missouri regiment which lost one sixth of its number at the battle of Okeechobee, where Colonel Gentry fell at the head of his regiment. He served his country gallantly, and I trust that this bill will be passed unanimously.

Mr. BORLAND. I desire to say, as a member of the Military Committee, the chairman not being now in his seat, that that committee deemed this a meritorious claim, and unanimously reported it to the Senate.

Mr. BRADBURY. The Senator from Missouri has stated the fact that the history of this claim has been imbedded in a report. That was the subject to which I addressed myself. Therefore, on that statement, I withdraw my objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

VIRGINIA WOOLEN COMPANY.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of the Virginia Woolen Company.

It enacts that the Secretary of the Treasury cause to be paid to the Virginia Woolen Company, or to its duly authorized agent, the sum of $6,085 04, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, that sum being the amount retained by the United States from the said Company for an alleged non-compliance with the contract entered into between the United States and the said Company, on or about the 10th of January, 1848, for the delivery of one hundred thousand yards of cloth.

Mr. DAWSON. This bill needs no speech in its favor. I will only state that the Committee on Military Affairs examined the subject very thoroughly, and thought it nothing but just that this money, which was retained, should be paid over by the Government.

Mr. WALKER. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that there is no report.

Mr. HALE. There is a report of the committee of the House of Representatives among the papers.

Mr. BORLAND. I think I can obviate the necessity of having the report read, by making a simple statement. A contract was entered into to furnish the Quartermaster's Department with a certain quantity of cloth for the Army.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair would state that there is a report of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BORLAND. Let the report be read. It will obviate the necessity of my explanation.

The report was read accordingly.

It appears that the Virginia Woolen Company contracted to deliver to the United States one hundred thousand yards of cloth for the Army, at $1.24 per yard. The Company delivered over twenty-five thousand yards, but failed to deliver the rest of the cloth within the time required. Hence the Government retained the sum of $6,085 04. It seems that the Government, in making the contract, agreed to furnish the Company with the wool from which the cloth was to be made. A quantity of wool was placed on board a vessel to be sent to Richmond, Virginia, where the Company carry on their business, and the vessel was lost with its cargo before it reached its destination. On this account it was impossible for the Company to fulfill their contract. Besides that, the small-pox broke out among the operatives, and reduced the number of hands, and thus rendered the Company less able to execute the work. Therefore, and inasmuch as the Government sustain no loss, the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. HUNTER. I would state that this bill passed the House of Representatives at the last session, and came here. It was then reported upon favorably by the Committee on Military Affairs but it was not acted upon for want of time. It has again passed the House of Representatives at this session, and it has again been reported upon favorably by the Committee on Military Affairs of this body.

Mr. BADGER. I looked into this claim at the last session of Congress, and I can state that it would have passed the Senate then but for an objection made by the honorable Senator from Alabama, [Mr. CLEMENS.] He was afterwards satisfied as to the bill, and withdrew his objection. It would again have been taken up and passed, but that there was no opportunity of doing so at such a late period of the session.

QUESTION OF PRIORITY.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I rise for the purpose of calling the attention of the President to the fact, that there is a bill on the Calendar to provide for the unpaid claims of the officers and soldiers of the Virginia State and Continental lines of the Revolutionary Army, which is a private bill. It is on the Calendar in regular order before many of the bills which we have been considering to-day. It is a bill in relation to a number of persons, but still it is a private claim.

Mr. BADGER. I think it is a public bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. A bill has just been passed providing for paying an association, a corporation, a company. The claim which I wish to be considered is for the benefit of a great many persons, it is true; but still it is a private claim.

I rise to ask whether, in the opinion of the Chair, it is not a private bill, and ought not to have been taken up long ago.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair had his attention called to that bill, but he considered it a public bill, and therefore did not put it among the private bills. It is, however, in the power of the Senate to regulate that matter.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will make no question in relation to it.

THOMAS H. LEGGETT.

The Senate next proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Thomas H. Leggett, reported from the Committee on Commerce.

It enacts that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to refund to Thomas H. Leggett, a sum equal to the increased duty paid by him under the tariff act of May 19th, 1828, on two invoices of woolen goods imported from Liverpool, invoiced at £1,526 17s. 9d. sterling, or $6,786 15, and entered at the custom-house, in the city of New York, on the 8th of July, 1828; provided that this payment shall not be made until the Secretary of the Treasury shall have satisfactory proof that the duties were actually paid, and that the contract for the delivery of those goods was entered into in the winter of 1827-'28, and that Thomas H. Leggett had it not in his power, after the passage of the act of May 19th, 1828, to demand such order; and provided, further, that satisfactory evidence be furnished to the Secretary of the Treasury that the firm of Thomas H. Leggett & Co. did not realize the ordinary profit on such importations.

Mr. HUNTER. Is there any report in that case? If there is, I should like to hear it read.

The report was read accordingly.

It refers for a statement of the merits of the case to report No. 500, made by the Committee on Commerce of the House of Representatives, of the 26th of May, 1848. That report states that the house of Thomas H. Leggett & Co., were regular importers of dry goods in New York; that on the 8th of July, 1828, they imported from Liverpool, and entered at the New York custom-house, two invoices of woolen dry goods, as costing £1,526 17s. 9d. sterling, or $6,786 15, on which duties amounting to $5,467 were imposed by the tariff act passed on the 19th May, 1828, and which took effect on the 30th of June succeeding in relation to dry goods, but which did not take effect in relation to iron and hardware until the 1st of September following. Under the tariff act of 1824, which was in operation when these goods were ordered, the duties would have amounted to $2,250. The increase of duties, the memorialist represented, did not enhance the value of the goods, but actually created a great loss on this description of goods. Those goods were contracted for in the winter of 1827-'28, to be delivered in the spring of 1828, and were shipped in two vessels from Liverpool, one of which sailed seven days before the passage of the law of 19th May, 1828, and the other in a few days afterwards. It was impossible then to annul the contract, or countermand the order for the shipping of the goods. The house of Leggett & Co. united with other importers in a petition to Congress to refund the additional duties imposed under the tariff of 1828 under such circumstances. That petition was before the 22d and 23d Congresses. At each of those Congresses, bills were passed by both Houses for the relief of the importers, but none of them became a law. A case similar in all its features to this, was redressed under an act approved June 28th, 1836. On that ground, and sensible of the justice of the claim, the memorialist in this case asked for a return of the duties on those importations. The committee state, that having examined the facts and evidence submitted to them, they were of opinion that the prayer of the petitioners ought to be granted. For a more full statement of the facts of the case, they annexed to the report four letters of the petitioner, and the invoice and entry of the custom-house, and also House Document No. 123 of the first session of the twenty-third Congress.

Mr. HUNTER. It is proposed in this case, if I understand the bill, to remit duties because a change was made in the tariff after an order was given to import certain goods. Why, a great many such cases have been presented to us for our consideration, and we know that they have generally been rejected, as they ought to have been. All merchants must prepare for these contingencies. If we undertake to remedy the mistakes which may be occasioned by changes in the rates of duties on foreign imports, there is no telling where we shall be led. Indeed I do not know how it is that this bill comes from the Committee on Commerce. This is a subject which has generally been referred to the Committee on Finance, and which appropriately belongs to the functions of that committee. Certainly the rule in that committee has been not to grant relief in cases of this sort. Why, we should be opening the door of the Treasury if we pass this bill, on the same principle, to thousands of cases. How many cases may arise under the tariff act of 1842? How far back are we to go? Are we to look up the whole history of our legislation in order to see, perchance, if the various tariff acts which have been passed have operated harshly and onerously on this or that individual? How are we to be sure of the facts? How are we to ascertain the testimony at such a distance of time as this? Even if we admit the principle to be a sound one that we should refund duties under such circumstances, which we certainly have not admitted heretofore in the general course of this body, how could we ascertain with certainty the facts in such complicated transactions at such a distance of time?

It is said that the order for the goods in this case was given in 1828. How do we know that? It is said, too, that the order was given in ignorance of the proposed change. How do we know that? How do we know the amount of duties paid? How can we ascertain with certainty the facts on which the merits of a case would depend if we were to admit the principle? But it is unnecessary to go into that inquiry. The principle is utterly inadmissible; and if we once act on it, we may make up our minds to see a great many such cases brought before us for relief. I hope the Senate will reject this bill. It is a matter of some importance, and if we wish to guard the public Treasury against demands of this character, we will reject the bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. It is hardly possible to discriminate sometimes which is the proper committee to which a subject ought to be referred. I have always endeavored to refer all matters relating to the revenue system of the country to the Committee on Finance. I suppose this matter went to the Committee on Commerce because it originated in that committee in the other branch of Congress. The report which has been read on this subject, was made from that committee. I have not had my attention called directly to the subject involved in this bill. It was committed to the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] who is now necessarily absent. Inasmuch as he is the member of the committee who has made a personal examination into all the papers, and as he is now necessarily detained from the Senate, I move that the bill be laid upon the table. I think it is due to him that he should have some opportunity of defending the bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was laid upon the table.

ALEXANDER P. FIELD.

The Senate then proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to the consideration of a "joint resolution for the relief of Alexander P. Field, late Secretary of Wisconsin Territory, and sureties."

Mr. HUNTER. The honorable Senator from Indiana, who reported that bill from the Committee on Finance, is not now in his seat, neither is the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DODGE,] who feels an interest in the passage of the bill; but I will state that I believe it is a proper bill, which proposes to allow the proper officers of the Treasury Department to settle the accounts of the principal, with his sureties. It appears that the principal proved to be insolvent, and the securities ask to come in and produce such vouchers and make such settlement as the principal himself would have made.

The resolution was then reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

JULIA AIKEN.

The Senate next proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider a bill for the relief of Julia Aiken.

This was a bill reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, providing a pension to be paid to Julia Aiken, the only child of William Yool, who died in the naval service of the United States in the year 1801.

A long report was read in this case, from which it appeared that William Yool was in the naval service from 1797 to 1801, when he died in the service. That he left a wife and an only child. That by the first section of an act passed on the 3d of March, 1837, the said Julia Aiken, daughter of said William Yool, would have been entitled to a pension but for the fact that the death of her father had not been reported by an officer in the Navy—a regulation required by the Navy Department. That there was sufficient evidence of the death of said William Yool while in the service, but that as it had not been reported by an officer as required, the defect could not now be remedied, the officers who could have given such evidence being all dead.

No amendment being offered, the bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. FELCH. I do not fully understand that case from the report. It seems to me it deserves some further consideration before we pass upon it. It is manifest that it does not come under the operation of any law now in force. As the Senator who reported the bill is not now in his seat, I wish the matter may lie over for the present.

Mr. BADGER. I hope not. I think the case is very clear. Every fact in the case seems to entitle the petitioner to a pension under the act of 1837. But under one of the regulations of the Navy Department, in carrying out the law of 1837, it is required that when the fact of the death of the person in whose behalf the pension is asked, does not appear from the roll, it must be established by the evidence of a commissioned officer. Now, the law of 1837 was retroactive; it declared that the widows and children of all officers and seamen who should die or had died in the naval service, should be entitled to these pensions. Between the death of this seaman, and the act of 1837, every commissioned officer on board that ship, the Enterprise, was dead. Under such circumstances, the pension could not be obtained. But the case comes clearly under the provisions of the act of 1837, and the evidence presented in the very able report of the committee, shows, in a manner entirely satisfactory, that if the fact of the death had been certified to by the commissioned officers of the ship, there would be no objection on the part of the Department to allow the pension. Now the question is, whether, because this poor seaman was not of sufficient consequence to have had his death noticed at the time, and because of the want of evidence of the death by a commissioned officer, the pension shall not be allowed?

Mr. FELCH. I should like to inquire whether the person applying here would have been entitled to this pension but for the single fact that the proof of death in the service was not strictly formal?

Mr. BADGER. That is the only difficulty.

Mr. BAYARD. By the law of 1837 it appears that the widow of a deceased seaman would have been entitled to receive one half of the pay which such seamen received while living, and in service, so long as she did not intermarry. There is evidence of the intermarriage of this widow, but the time of that intermarriage is not stated. Now, the effect of this bill will be to give to this daughter of the deceased one half of the pay to which her father would have been entitled from the time of his death until the year 1811, when she became of age. The widow subsequently married; but whether that marriage occurred before or after the daughter became of age does not appear.

Mr. BADGER. I suppose it does not appear, as it would in a legal pleading, that this widow had intermarried, or that she had intermarried when this pension would have been allowed, and had therefore forfeited it.

Mr. BAYARD. Under the law of 1837, unless the object is to extend relief beyond what that law would have done, the matter stands in a different position. But if it is not intended to extend the relief beyond what that law would allow, then it ought to be ascertained when the widow married. She was entitled, under the pension laws, to receive one half of the pay which her husband would have received, from the time of his death to the time of her intermarriage. If the object in this case is to extend to it the provisions of a special act beyond the provisions of the law of 1837, that is another question. The report, however, which has been read, seems to look to the law of 1837 as a governing principle, and the facts are not stated with sufficient clearness to let us know whether the party is entitled to relief under that law or not.

Mr. HALE. I am not opposed to the passage of this bill; but I wish to know whether the Senate will sanction the principle involved in this case. For my own part, I am very willing, but I have given advice to many persons in my own State, who wished to obtain pensions under the act of 1837, against making any application on the ground that the act of 1837 had been repealed. They are cases that would come under that act, and such as would entitle them to receive pensions if that act were in force, and would be favorably considered by the Senate. If it be the sense of the Senate that cases arising under that act, and which would have been entitled to relief if the act were now in force, can still be favorably received, then this case will be applicable. I am willing to go upon that principle, because there are persons in my own State, whom I have advised session after session that there was no possibility of getting a pension, because the bill was repealed, and it having been repealed, Congress would not take up cases which would not have been precluded when the bill was in force. If, however, it be the case that Congress will grant relief in such cases, I shall not object, because it will relieve some very meritorious cases which I was heretofore of opinion could not be relieved.

I think, however, that the pension should apply only from the time of the marriage of the widow; otherwise the child will get the pension for the whole period as well as the widow.

Mr. BADGER. The question suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire is one that will admit of very grave consideration, if the bill that is now before the Senate really raises it. But the bill before us is this: It is not to provide for a claim undertaken to be brought forward under the act of 1837, after the repeal of that act. It is a very different case. It is a case which was brought forward while the act of 1837 was in full force, and the party whose business it was to see it carried into execution was then prepared to show under the law, the existence of the service and the death, but was precluded from being allowed to manifest these facts by a rule adopted in the Department, which excluded the evidence of all persons except commissioned officers as to the fact of the death in the service. That is the case before us; and I have no hesitation in saying, that in every instance of that kind, in which the party applying for a pension did what was in his power, under the law while it was in force, obtained the benefit of the law as much as though it were in force now. But it would be a very different case, if people come forward now who had brought forward no claim, asserted no right, asked no relief while the law was in force.

In the first place, it seems to me it is a plain matter, a clear case of a claim coming within the statute, and preferred while it was in force, and one which would have been allowed then but for what—I may be permitted to say—was rather an absurd regulation of the Department, because that regulation should have made an exception in regard to cases where the commissioned officers were dead. I believe all that the law requires is, that the highest kind of evidence which the nature of the case admits of shall be given. It was so in this case. There would have been some ground of suspicion, if one or more of the commissioned officers had been living when the representatives of the deceased had come forward and offered the testimony of those who were of a lower grade in the service. But when all the commissioned officers are dead, they cannot be produced; and it seems there is a necessity of having the evidence of other persons in order to arrive at the truth. It seems to me that to avoid all suspicion of any attempt to impose on the Department, by bringing forward other persons, all the commissioned officers being dead, it was sufficient for the Department to have made an order to admit just and reasonable evidence, in conformity with the principle established in other cases.

Mr. BAYARD. If this bill only proposed to give relief in conformity with the provisions of the law of 1837, supposing the proof to be good, then I should make no objection to it; and if the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] will move to restrict it to that, then I will go for the bill. But it goes further than that; it provides that the daughter—supposing that the proof of the death was plenary—who would not, during the life of the widow be entitled to the half-pay, should have that half pay from the year 1801; and the bill does not show, nor does the report, when the widow married. The effect of the bill, therefore, will be to carry out the compensation beyond the principle of the law of 1837. Unless the Senator will go that far—and I see no reason for making this an exception—I cannot vote for this bill as it stands.

Mr. BADGER. I will suggest an amendment, which may perhaps meet the views of the Senator. I will move to amend by striking out the words "from and after the year 1801," and say, "from and after the second marriage." That is the idea I wish to convey. The Senator has the bill before him, and he will perhaps make the alteration.

Mr. GEYER, (in his seat.) The bill is right as it stands. There is no necessity for such an amendment.

The PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from North Carolina will not apply to the bill. There are no such words as he proposes to strike out.

Mr. BADGER. I understand from my friend near me that the bill is all perfectly right, and that it simply provides that this applicant should receive the pension to which, under the law of 1837, she would be entitled. It does not say that she shall receive a pension from the day of the death of her father. Let the bill be read.

The bill was accordingly read.

Mr. BADGER. The bill is all right as it stands.

Mr. BAYARD. I think not.

Mr. BADGER. It does not provide that she shall have pension from the day of the death, as the Senator supposes. It is, "that the Commissioner of Pensions be directed to allow to Julia Aiken the pension she would have been entitled to receive, under the provisions of the first section of the act of 3d March, 1837, providing for the more equitable administration of the Navy pension fund, if her claim had been allowed by the Secretary of the Navy while that act was in force." It does not say that she shall receive a pension from the year 1801—

Mr. BAYARD. The report evidently goes beyond that.

Mr. BADGER. But the report is not the question under discussion. The bill is all we have to do with.

Mr. HALE. I shall not interpose any objection to the bill, but I want the Senate to understand the principle which we are about to establish. I understand it to be this: Here is a claim existing under the law of 1837; application is made to the proper Department for the settlement of that claim under the law; the claimant fails in his claim, owing to some peculiar rules established by that Department, and the law authorizing the claim is subsequently repealed. The Senate, in that case, is determined to give equitable relief—

Mr. BADGER. We have done it in many other cases.

Mr. HALE. I know we have done it in many other cases, but not under a law that has been repealed. That is all. I have no objection to the bill.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the question was on its engrossment for a third reading.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on its engrossment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and on being taken resulted—yeas 26, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bayard, Borland, Cass, Clarke, Dodge of Wisconsin, Downs, Fish, Geyer, Hale, James, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, King, Mallory, McRae, Mangum, Miller, Sebastian, Shields, Smith, Spruance, Upham, and Wade—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Bradbury, Dawson, Dodge of Iowa, Felch, Hamlin, Norris, Underwood, and Whitcomb—9.

JONATHAN KEARSLEY AND JOHN BIDDLE.

The Senate then proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill to provide for the final settlement of the accounts of Jonathan Kearsley, late receiver of public moneys at Detroit, and of John Biddle, late register of the land office at that place.

The bill was read. It provides that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are thereby required to audit and settle the accounts of Jonathan Kearsley and of John Biddle, upon principles of equity and justice, and that whatever sum or sums of money, if any, which may be found due to them, or to either of them, shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. BRADBURY called for the reading of the report of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FELCH. I will make a single statement, which will perhaps be sufficient. The object of the bill is to enable the Department to settle some suspended items in the accounts of these individuals. The items are for money paid by them under certain exigencies which rendered it necessary. The rule of the Department was to allow such accounts, and they have been allowed in numerous instances which are alluded to in the report. But some technical objection was started to some item in the accounts, and the Department refused to pass upon it. Since that time Congress have passed several bills founded upon the same principle as that involved in this case. This bill is to carry out the same principle in regard to the accounts of the individuals named in it, as was recognized in the settlement of the accounts of others.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

MAISON ROUGE GRANT.

Mr. DOWNS. I would call the attention of the Chair to a private bill on the Calendar, which has been passed over. It is a bill to grant the right of preemption to settlers on the public land known as the Maison Rouge Grant.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair did not view it as a private bill, and therefore passed it over. It is a bill to grant the right of preemption.

Mr. DOWNS. But it applies only to a few individuals. I consider that it is a private claim. It applies only to one particular claim, and embraces but a few persons.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair does not consider that it is a private bill; but he will bring it to the notice of the Senate that they may decide upon it. The Senator from Louisiana has called the attention of the Chair to a bill which he insists is a private bill. The Chair entertains a different opinion, but submits the subject to the consideration of the Senate. It is a bill to grant the right of preemption to settlers on the public land known as the Maison Rouge Grant. The Chair leaves it to the Senate to decide whether it is a private bill or not.

Mr. DOWNS. It applies altogether to a few settlers on one particular grant of land. I suppose there can be no doubt that a bill giving the right of preemption to one individual would be a private bill. If it is not I do not know what it is, then. If the grant to one individual be a private bill, how the extending of it to two or three makes it a public bill I am at a loss to know. I think we frequently pass bills as private which apply to a number of individuals. It strikes me that there is no difficulty in this matter. I do not understand that private bills apply altogether to money. There may be private claims to lands as well as to money. This is a private claim for the right of preemption. It applies to only this one grant. Of course the number of individuals is limited. There was an act passed at the last session extending the right of preemption, as was thought, to all the settlers on the land mentioned in the bill, but it was found that a few were excluded, and this bill is intended to give them the right. I hope the Senate will consider it as a private bill.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair does not consider it a private bill, because it is not a claim. The individuals for whose benefit it is intended, simply ask of Congress to extend to them a privilege. Almost every bill on the Calendar would be considered a private bill, if the rule were adopted, that because some individual had an interest in it, it was a private bill.

Mr. DOWNS. I do not understand the distinction.

The PRESIDENT. The order which was made by the Senate is, that Fridays shall be set apart for the consideration of private claims.

Mr. DOWNS. I thought it was private bills. I should like to hear the order read.

It was read as follows:

Resolved, That after the first day of January next, Friday of each week shall be set aside for the consideration of private claims, and that on that day private bills shall have priority over all other business.

Mr. DOWNS. I cannot understand the distinction which is made by the Chair. It must consist in the setting up of a claim for money. The individuals for whose benefit the bill is intended, claim a right which they ask to be granted to them. It is a bill altogether of a private nature. If the Chair decides that it is not a private bill, as I wish the question settled, I shall take an appeal from the decision.

The PRESIDENT. If the Senator had listened to the Chair, he would have understood that the Chair, so far from deciding that it was not a private bill, merely said that he individually believed that it was not, but that it was for the Senate to decide whether they would consider it as such or not; and in order that the Senate may determine that, the bill will be read.

The bill was read. It enacts that every person being the head of a family, or widow, or single man over the age of twenty-one years, who, prior to January 27, 1851, was an actual settler on the public lands known as the Maison Rouge Grant, in the State of Louisiana, or his heirs and legal representatives, shall be entitled to enter land, not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres, or one quarter section, the said land to include the residence and improvement of such settler, at the minimum price of said land, on such terms and under such limitations as are contained in the act entitled "An act to grant the right of preemption to certain settlers on the Maison Rouge Grant, in the event of the final adjudication in favor of the title of the United States," approved January 22, 1851.

The question being put, the Senate decided that it was not a private bill.

RECESS.

Mr. BADGER. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. HALE called for the yeas and nays on the motion; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 31, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bayard, Bell, Berrien, Borland, Bradbury, Clarke, Davis, Dawson, Felch, Fish, Geyer, Hamlin, Hunter, James, Jones of Tennessee, King, McRae, Mangum, Miller, Norris, Sebastian, Shields, Smith, Soule, Spruance, Underwood, Upham, Wade, and Whitcomb—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Cass, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Downs, Hale, Houston, Jones of Iowa, Mallory, and Walker—10.

So the motion was agreed to.

ISAAC GARRETSON.

The Senate then proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill for the relief of John R. Bryan, administrator of Isaac Garretson, deceased, late a Purser in the United States Navy, upon which the Committee on Naval Affairs had made an adverse report.

The report was read, from which it appears that Mr. Garretson was a Purser from 1822 to 1829, at the Baltimore station, under a salary of forty dollars a month and two rations; that on the settlement of his accounts he was found to be in arrears to the amount of $1,293 64, for which a suit was instituted against his administrator. This balance is proposed to be overcome by a charge of $200 per annum for house rent during his period of service at Baltimore, which would result in a balance against the United States. The credit claimed for house rent was properly disallowed by the Auditor, upon the ground that there was no authority for the allowance; that, on the contrary, the allowance of house rent was discontinued in 1821. Mr. Garretson accepted the appointment after the order discontinuing the allowance was made, and the Department refused to allow the rent at that station until 1831, when it was thought proper to allow $200 per annum. The effect of this allowance being granted to the estate of Garretson would be to overrule the discretion exercised by the Department in refusing the allowance for house rent, and therefore the committee could not recommend it. It is to be presumed that the Secretary of the Navy was better able to understand what was for the public interest on this point than the Senate. Upon these considerations the committee recommended that the bill should not pass.

Mr. MANGUM. I move that the bill lie on the table. I introduced the bill at the request of the gentleman, without having an opportunity of looking into it. According to that report, the claim does not seem to be well founded.

The motion was agreed to.

CAPTAIN ERASTUS A. CAPRON.

The Senate next proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill for the relief of the children of Captain Erastus A. Capron.

The bill enacts that the Secretary of the Interior be directed to pay to the children of the late Captain Capron, of the first regiment of artillery of the Army of the United States, the same amount of pension that was allowed to Harriet R. F. Capron—said pension to commence from and after the first day of January, 1852, and to continue for five years.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I move to amend the bill, by inserting "twentieth day of August, 1852," in place of "first day of January, 1852;" which will make the pension to commence at the expiration of the first five years of the pension which was granted to the widow of Captain Capron.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FELCH called for the reading of the report of the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. There was a report made at the last session in favor of a pension for the widow of Captain Capron, which may be read.

It was read; from which it appears that Captain Capron fell in the battle of Cherubusco, near the city of Mexico, on the twentieth day of August, 1847, leaving a widow wholly destitute of support, and children, six in number, the oldest of whom was only eight years old. In view of their destitution, and in consideration of the gallantry and many services of their deceased husband and father, the committee reported a bill for the continuance of her present pension to his widow.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I would only remark, that the bill granting the pension to the widow of this gallant officer was reported unanimously from the Committee on Pensions at the last session, and at this session a similar report has been made to give a pension to his children for five years. The petitioner prayed that the pension might be given to her for the residue of her life. The committee, however, did not conceive it proper to give it for a longer period than five years. There are precedents for the passing of this bill. Bills have been passed in three other similar cases. As this lady is in very indigent circumstances, and has six children, the oldest of whom is but eight years old, I hope the Senate will pass the bill.

Mr. DAWSON. I would ask the chairman of the committee who reported this bill, if it is not in violation of the existing law, to grant this pension?

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. Certainly not.

Mr. DAWSON. Do you not propose to make it an exception to the law as it now stands? Why, then, will not the pension be paid without the passing of this bill?

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. It is proposed by this bill to grant a pension to the children, not to the widow. The report which was read was that which was made at the last session, proposing to give a pension to the widow during her widowhood.

Mr. DAWSON. That brings up the question which I want to get at. Will we now adopt the principle that we will pension all the children of all the soldiers who were killed in our various wars—that we will make an annual appropriation to them? Will this Government do that? That is the question. If you do it in this case what is there to distinguish it from any other case in which the husband or father was killed in battle? If you put it on the ground of poverty, soldiers are usually poor, and leave families in the same way. If the principle is to be established, do it at once by a general bill, and not by an individual case in this way. If we do this for one, let us do it for all.

Mr. SHIELDS. The very reason that the petitioners apply for this pension is, that the general law does not cover such a case. But I must confess that I cannot see the force of the objection of the Senator from Georgia, because this is a pension to the children, and not to the widow, and these children are now fatherless, penniless, and in poverty. I knew this officer well. I knew him long before he fell in battle. I saw him after he fell, and I must say that I know of no officer of his rank in the Army of the United States who possessed more gallantry and worth than he did. I should regret exceedingly to see any opposition to the granting of the pension, because I think it is due to the children of this gallant officer, who have no means to support them, and no protector but a poor mother, who has been left a widow by the fall of her husband. It is only for five years. We have gone much further in other cases, for officers of a higher grade, I admit, such as General Worth and others, but this officer, in his grade, was as meritorious as any officer in the Army of the United States. I would feel that I was unjust to my own feelings if I did not state my recollection of his worth, as a man and as an officer. I saw him when he fell in battle. I saw his body there, and I should regret to see his children thrown penniless upon the world.

Mr. DAWSON. I have understood that during that campaign in Mexico there was not an officer or soldier who ever turned his back upon the enemy. Every man who died upon the battlefield died nobly, and discharged his duty well. If they have died in this way, and many of them have left children, why will you select one and provide for his children, and leave thousands of others unprovided for? My sympathies were excited when I heard my friend from Illinois [Mr. SHIELDS] speak of what he had seen. But we cannot legislate upon sympathy. Any course of this kind would beggar this Government. All the money which we could collect would not be sufficient to maintain and educate the children of deceased officers and soldiers. I thought we had been as liberal as any nation upon earth in pensioning those who fight the battles of the country; and I shall not object to this now, if you say that you will establish a general principle, and let the country understand that they are to be taxed to support the children of every poor officer and soldier who died in the service of the country. I cannot see why poverty should give to the children of A any advantage over the children of B, who may have been killed in a battle, but who had some property. It is not for the purpose of raising or educating children that we legislate. We have no such power. It is for the purpose of compensating services rendered to the country that we give these pensions. The services of the man who has been fortunate enough by his industry to accumulate wealth, and still has courage sufficient to carry him to the field, and not send a substitute, and dies there, are as valuable as those of the poor man. There is no power of discrimination in this Government between wealth and poverty upon a principle of this kind. We should stand upon a principle which recognizes the equality of all men who serve the country. I am unwilling to adopt this partial position, and lay down a dot here and there according to the desire of the various representatives of different States as to some very worthy and proper case to their own knowledge. I know of fifty cases in my own State where husbands and fathers died in Mexico, and left their widows and children probably as poor as these are; and can I consent to a bill of this kind for an individual case, and not make the same grant to all? Upon principle I am opposed to it. But if we have power to pass a bill, let us have it so that all shall be entitled to the same aid.

Mr. SHIELDS. I would be very willing to see a general bill and a general law, and I think it would be due from the country to cover all such cases as this, where the father has been killed in battle, and where his children have been left minors and orphans, and poor. I hold that the nation is bound to step in and become a father of that family. I put it upon the highest principles of moral equity, that in such a case, the nation is bound to step in and take the place of a parent. That there is no general law is no reason why this bill should not be adopted. On the contrary, it is a reason why it should be passed. But the honorable Senator from Georgia, who I know is as generous in these matters as I am—and the view he takes is not opposed to the principle of this bill as far as I can see—says this nation has been more liberal towards its military men than any other nation in the world. I tell that Senator that no nation on God's earth has obtained such military service as this nation has with so little cost. Why, your armies have brought you through three wars; and what have those armies cost you? An army of a nation of half the size, on a peace establishment, in Europe, costs more than all your armies, including pensions and all; for your soldiers fly to your standard in the hour of danger, and when the danger is over they retire to private life and shift for themselves. And now, when you have a case of this kind where a man has been killed in battle, and his children are poor and destitute, can you turn round and say that because there is no general law to cover the case, these children shall be turned out on the charities of the world? Surely not. I do not want to discuss this question further.

Mr. BORLAND. The objection raised to this bill by the Senator from Georgia is one that we have heard time and again from him on every proposition of this kind. I believe that no bill granting a pension has ever come before the Senate which he has not opposed, and generally, if not exclusively, upon the ground he now urges. I think, however, that the very reason upon which he rests his objection is a reason why we should pass the bill. He objects to it because it is not a general bill including all cases. That can be no objection to this bill, unless the passing this precludes us from passing a general bill. But the passage of this bill, giving pensions to these children, does not preclude us from passing a general bill, or bill for every individual case equally meritorious which may come before us. On the contrary, it makes a precedent for them. But I am in favor of special bills of this sort, because I wish to put each case on its own individual merit. We have general laws on the subject of pensions, and for general purposes they are very liberal, and give as much discretion to the Executive officers of this Government as I think it is safe and proper to give them. You cannot by general laws provide for every case of merit. It is because cases like this are not and cannot be embraced in those general laws that the petitioners have now come here. They show their claim to be one strong in equity and in every consideration that should entitle them to the bounty of the Government. I hold that Congress is the proper and only safe and proper tribunal for the adjudication of such claims, and determine whether they are individually meritorious or not. For myself, I am willing and resolved to vote for every case that can be shown to be as meritorious as this. I have voted for a number of such cases, and I shall continue to vote for them, whenever they may come up, as long as there is a dollar in the Treasury to pay them with.

The Senator from Georgia says he opposes this because it is not a general bill, and yet we find him opposing all bills of the kind. Because it is not now proposed to provide for every case that may hereafter come before us, he is determined to provide for none, however meritorious, and however needy! An extraordinary reason it seems to me.

Now, I agree freely, and will go cordially with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS,] as far as he has indicated his willingness to go; and if there be any one willing to go further, I will go as far as the furthest, in providing for the widows and orphans who have been made such, and left destitute of the means of subsistence, by the patriotic devotion of their husbands and fathers to the cause of their country upon the field of battle. I do not think we can expend the public money in a holier cause, or in a better way.

Senators talk about bankrupting the Government, by taking care of the widows and orphans of those who have taken care of the country in the hour of its peril and its need! Bankrupt the Government indeed! Where, sir, I would ask, would the Government have been, but for the warm hearts and strong hearts of those men who flew to its standard in the hour of danger, and not only illustrated its honor, but actually preserved its existence? Such men, sir, have a claim, which I cannot resist, not only upon the justice and equity of this Government, but upon its gratitude; and that claim descends to their widows and orphans with an augmented force, which I, for one, will never question, and never seek to resist or evade.

Such men (and the father of these children was such a man) enter our military service, not because the provisions of any general law, as part of the conditions of their service, promise the care and protection of those most dear to them in the event of their death, which we now propose to give—there is no such general law—but they were actuated by higher and less selfish motives. And now we are called upon to respond to those high and unselfish motives, by exercising the highest and holiest sentiments of our nature—not only justice and equity, but generous sympathy and gratitude. Shall we fail in those high duties to ourselves and our country, which considerations like these impose upon us?

If the Senator from Georgia will bring forward a general bill, such as he has alluded to, to include all cases as meritorious as this, and will give it such form as to make it practicable in its operation, I will cheerfully vote for it. But I do not think this can be done. I think the only proper and safe foundation for legislation for such cases, is the particular merit of each case. I am willing and desirous to sit as a court of equity upon each case as it arises, with the authority and purpose to include national gratitude among the considerations which shall control my judgment.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have no hope of arresting the progress of this bill; but as I propose to vote with the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Dawson,] I desire to state a few of the reasons which control my vote. If I were to listen to the counsels of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr.

SMELDS,] and consult my own feelings, I should vote with that Senator. If, in our deliberations here, we were to consult our passions and not our judgments, I should most assuredly vote for the passage of the bill. That this officer was a most gallant and meritorious one, we have no doubt; and if we were to grant pensions upon the simple principle of meritorious actions, we might well go for this bill. Or if we were to grant pensions from considerations of sympathy for the orphan children who were in poverty, we might well vote for this bill. But it seems to me that there are other and higher and vastly more equitable considerations that should control our action. There are various pension laws which rest on certain principles including certain cases. We have a variety of applications here to include certain persons who are excluded from the benefit of these general laws for the want of mere technicalities, or of some evidence which is merely technical. In cases of that kind, I have uniformly voted in favor of such bills, because it goes to put those cases within the general principle—it tends to bring them within the general law. The principle which is proposed to be adopted here in this bill is to give a pension to individuals against the general law, and against the general principle.

I submit to the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. JONES,] that if, in granting a gratuity—for this is nothing more nor less—to the applicants in this case, and doing what he calls "justice" in this case, are we not doing gross injustice to every other one situated in like circumstances? I ask that if, in dealing out what the Senator calls "mercy" in this case, we are not unmerciful to a great number—to the hundreds of cases that are excluded?

I do not believe that it is our duty, by being generous in this case, to be ungenerous in all other cases; and certainly we shall be so if we pass this bill. It differs entirely from those excepted cases for which we pass laws to bring them within the provisions of the general rule. It is directly the opposite. In granting a gratuity in this case, we do injustice to every other case of the kind. Assume as a ground for granting pensions, meritorious services, or extreme poverty of orphan children, and let that principle be made to apply on a sliding scale, and then every other case of every other soldier who perishes in our wars, whether private or officer, will come here and demand of you a similar bill in his case, differing only in degree, but not in principle.

I have no hope of arresting the progress of this bill; none in the world. It is a foregone conclusion, that all bills of this character are to pass this body. Our sympathies are appealed to, and under that state of sympathy we pass these bills. I commend that state of feeling very highly, and were I to consult it I should assuredly vote with the Senators who vote for this bill; but, believing that we do more injustice in passing a bill of this description, to a greater number of cases than we do mercy to those for whom a benefit is designed, I hold it to be my duty to vote against this and all other bills of a similar character.

Mr. CASS. Existing laws give pensions to the widow and minor children of officers and soldiers who fell in the battles of their country. And why? Because he that God and Nature provided to take care of them, has fallen in the service of his country. We have assumed to give these pensions for five years. There is no virtue in five, or four, or three, or two years, or one year. There is no peculiar reason, except a reason of expediency, why you should stop at five years. I think, however, that it is a fair rule. We give these pensions for five years. I am unwilling to go further by a general law; but I am perfectly willing, when a case like this comes before us, where orphan children are minors, and will be minors for years to come, to grant a pension. I am willing not to extend the law, but to make the case come under the general principle and reason of the law; and for this reason, that these children are incapable of taking care of themselves. They have lost the man whom God provided to take care of them; and therefore it seems to me the obligation which the country assumes for five years should be continued until they are able to provide for themselves. Therefore I am willing, when it is shown, in any individual case, that children are helpless, and minors, and unable to take care of themselves, to carry the principle to such a case and to say that the country shall take care of them until their state of minority is ended. Then our duty is at an end; because then the duty of the parent would be at an end; and we have placed ourselves in the position of the parent. While I should vote against a general law, I should be perfectly willing to vote for every case as meritorious as this.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. It happens that this widow and her children are personally known to me; and I believe are personally known to four members of the Committee on Pensions. The committee were unanimous in reporting this bill. It is known that these children are entirely destitute of all means of support. They are entirely without every means ordinarily given to the children of our country to obtain an education. If any petition should be presented in as meritorious a case, I feel confident that the committee would report favorably on such a case, even if it would require a hundred bills, or a thousand bills. I should take pleasure, as one of the members of the committee, in voting for every case as meritorious as this is. But, if we were to report a general bill, the Senator from Georgia has given us warning that he will oppose it.

I hope that if there is any further information desired in the case, the report, which has just been received from the Secretary's office, will be read, if any gentleman desires it. I believe, however, that there is no necessity for it. The gallant services of Captain Capron have been certified to the committee by officers who served with him. It was shown to the satisfaction of the committee, and it is evident, from the report of the Secretary of War, that he died at the head of his company while charging on the enemy.

Mr. DAWSON. I want to be understood in relation to this matter. I do not believe that Congress has the power to do the act now proposed. I recollect that it was but a short time ago since a distinguished head of this Government laid it down as a position, that Congress had no right to appropriate money to buy wood to warm the poor of this city.

Mr. WALKER. They did it though.

Mr. DAWSON. And now we are about to appropriate money for the purpose of sustaining the poor. That is a duty, a power, and a right belonging to the States. This Government has no concern with it. It has no right to raise a fund to maintain the poor of the different States. In one sense of the term, we have no citizens of the United States. All our people live within the limits of the States. There poor laws are to be passed, and the poor to be provided for. There laws are to be passed to provide for education. Have they not such laws in the State of my friend from Iowa? This Government has never attempted to exercise those powers; and until within a few years, no one ever thought of this Government taking it upon itself to make provision for the children of deceased officers and soldiers. It was formerly contended that the right of pensions was a personal right, arising out of personal services, and that we were compensating for these services by granting pensions. This is the ground which I occupy.

Can we make allowances to support and educate orphan children? Those children reside in the State of my friend from Iowa. Are there not laws there to provide for educating and maintaining the poor? Does such a power as this belong to the General Government? If it has such a power, would it not be a doubtful policy to exercise it? For who is to understand so well the necessity and importance of providing for the poor of their own localities, as the Legislatures of the several States? This is one of the greatest stretches of the Constitution. This power to educate and maintain the poor, is not to be found in the Constitution. It is not granted. Nor can it be drawn from any of the grants of power by any reasonable inference. I agree with a late lamented head of the Government of the United States, when he said he did not see where the authority resided, or the power was granted, for him to take the public money even to buy wood for the poor of the District of Columbia. He went upon principle; but now principle is to be abandoned, and our sympathies are to be appealed to. If I were to trust myself to my sympathies, this Government would soon be bankrupt; for I maintain that I have as much indulgence and kindness in my nature as any man living, in favor of the widow and the orphan. But when I stand upon a principle, it is a different thing.

Mr. CASS. The objection the Senator from Georgia has raised, is new to me. He says that the Constitution makes no grant of the right to give pensions.

Mr. DAWSON. I did not say that there was no right to grant pensions; but that the Constitution gave no right to the General Government to appropriate the public money to maintain the poor, and educate the orphan.

Mr. CASS. I understood the Senator to maintain that we had no right to grant pensions to widows and children of deceased officers and soldiers. Now, there are two kinds of pensions. One kind consists in those granted to the persons themselves who have performed military services, and the other kind is where pensions are granted to those who stand in the nearest position to them. This has been done from the foundation of the Government to the present day. Without going any further, allow me to tell the honorable gentleman that the moment you give to the General Government the power to raise an army, you give them all the powers necessary and incident to sustain it. There is not a word in the Constitution which allows you to pay the soldier, or to give him clothing or provisions. Where, then, do you get that power? From the power granted to raise and maintain an army. Then, as a fair incident to that power, is the right to do whatever may reasonably be done in relation to it. From the revolutionary contest down to our own days, an incident to a man's going into the service is the hope and the prospect held out to him that we will support the widow and orphans that he may leave after him. We hold this out as an encouragement to induce men to enter the Army. This is one of the inducements to men to come and offer their services when the Government is in danger. The power of granting pensions is a necessary and fair incident of the right to maintain an army. If, in the exercise of that power, we are satisfied that it is necessary to hold out this inducement, why it is fairly and properly incident to the power granted.

I have lived a good while. The country has been ruined about one hundred and fifty times in my day; but I do not believe that we are going to ruin the country now by granting pensions to the orphans of deceased soldiers so long as those orphans remain in a state of minority.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment; and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

JAMES W. LOW AND OTHERS.

The Senate next proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the compensation of James W. Low and others, for the capture of the British armed schooner Ann, during the late war with Great Britain.

It enacts that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and directed to pay to James W. Low, William Driscoll, and to such other persons as may be legally authorized to receive the same, the sum of $2,570 30, being the amount paid into the Treasury of the United States, and placed to the account of "fines, penalties, and forfeitures," in consequence of the sale, under a decree of the United States district court for the district of Maine, of the British private armed schooner Ann, in the year 1814, captured by the aforesaid named persons; the same to be paid to James W. Low and his associates, their heirs and assigns, in equal proportions.

Mr. HALE. If there is any report in that case I should like to hear it read.

The report of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives was read. It appears that James W. Low and his associates, in October, 1814, captured the British private armed schooner Ann, and brought her in as a prize to the State of Maine. The vessel and cargo were libeled and sold under an order of the United States district court for that district; and the sum of $5,518 45 was received under that sale. After deducting, for sundry expenses, the amount of $377 85, there remained a net balance of $5,140 60. Of this sum, $1,727 73 was paid to the collector, and $642 57 to the surveyor of the port of Thomaston—being one half of the net balance. The other half—$2,570 30—was paid into the Treasury of the United States, on account of Mr. Low and his associates not being able to attend to the vindication of their rights—being absent in the service of their country. Thus it happened that those persons never received any part of the proceeds of the sale of the vessel and cargo thus captured and brought into port, under circumstances of the most daring bravery.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

ELIZABETH MONROE.

The Senate next proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill granting a pension to Elizabeth Monroe, reported from the Committee on Pensions. It enacts that there be granted to Elizabeth Monroe, widow of James J. C. Monroe, late of the Army of the United States, for the space of five years, from and after the 1st of January, 1852, a pension, payable semi-annually, equal to one half of the pay to which said James J. C. Monroe was entitled at the time of his decease.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

MARY W. THOMPSON.

The Senate next proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill for the relief of Mary W. Thompson, reported from the Committee on Pensions. It enacts that the Secretary of the Interior be directed to place the name of Mary W. Thompson, widow of Lieutenant Colonel Alexander Thompson, upon the pension roll, and to pay to her during her widowhood the pension heretofore allowed her, to commence on the 1st day of January, 1852.

Without disposing of this bill, on motion, the Senate adjourned to Monday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 23, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Mr. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Mr. SMART. There are one or two communications of importance from the Executive upon the Speaker's table, and I ask now the unanimous consent of the House that they may be referred to the appropriate committees.

No objection being made,

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communications:

To the Senate and

House of Representatives of the United States:

I communicate to both Houses of Congress a report from the Department of State, containing copies of the correspondence which has taken place between that Department and the Minister of the United States in Paris, respecting the political occurrences which have recently taken place in France.

MILLARD FILLMORE.

WASHINGTON, January 20, 1852.

Referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

I. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, giving information of the loss of the revenue cutter Lawrence, and recommending that the appropriation of six additional revenue cutters, asked for in his annual report, be increased to $90,000; and urging upon Congress the importance of early action in said matter; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

II. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimates of the Secretary of Minnesota Territory, for the expenses of that Territory for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1852; and a letter from the same officer, suggesting further appropriations to meet the expenses of that Territory for the year ending June 30, 1852; which said letter and accompanying papers were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

III. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting his annual report of the clerks and other persons employed in his Department during the past year; which said letter and accompanying papers were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

IV. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of the expenses of the national armories, and of the number of arms and appendages made and repaired thereat, during the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1851; which said letter and accompanying papers were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

V. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a detailed statement of the expenditure of the contingent fund of his Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1851; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

VI. A letter from the Postmaster General, transmitting his annual report of the clerks and other persons employed in his Department during the past year; which said letter and accompanying papers were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

VII. A letter from the Postmaster General, submitting an estimate of the sums of money expected to be required for the service of the year commencing 1st July, 1852; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOUSTON. If these communications are all through with, I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

CLOSE OF DEBATE.

Mr. DANIEL. I rise to a privileged question. I wish to inquire whether a motion was made on yesterday to reconsider the vote of the House closing debate on the Mexican indemnity bill?

The SPEAKER. There was no such motion made.

Mr. DANIEL. I make that motion now; and my reason for making it is this: A call has been made upon the State Department for information in regard to certain matters, and upon which information there may be some who are desirous to say something before this debate is closed. In order to accomplish that object, therefore, and believing that the delay of a day or two will make no difference in this matter, I move to reconsider the vote on the adoption of that resolution, for the purpose of going into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. MEADE. That resolution was adopted at my instance on yesterday. I had been under the impression that that resolution terminated debate at three o'clock on Saturday. It seems to me that those were the terms of the resolution which I proposed.

The SPEAKER. The terms of the resolution were, to close debate upon to-morrow at three o'clock, which places it upon the present day.

Mr. MEADE. Then I shall vote for the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BROOKS. I shall oppose that resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that this is not a debatable question.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not intend to debate it. I simply rise to say that every day's delay in passing this bill will be at a very great cost to the Government. If the House choose to delay the matter, however, I am perfectly willing they should do it. I do not wish, however, to pass any resolution without a perfect knowledge of its consequences; but I will state that a year ago the Government could have obtained three and a half per cent. for the privilege of paying this installment. I do not believe any premium could be obtained to-day; and if the resolution were delayed twenty days longer, the Government will have to pay a premium.

Mr. DANIEL. If I supposed that two or three days' delay would make any material difference to the Government, I would not make the motion, but I do not see how it can make any difference.

Mr. HOUSTON. There is another suggestion which I will make in connection with this one made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks.] I will suggest that the call upon the Secretary of State refers entirely to matters that have passed. I do not consider that the information which we may get in response to that call will in any respect direct us to a proper determination in respect to the resolution now before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must interrupt this debate. It is all out of order.

Mr. DANIEL. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] may be correct in relation to the character of the information to be received from the Secretary of State; but I do not conceive that a delay of two or three days can make any essential difference. I hope the House will at least appropriate to-day and to-morrow to the consideration of private bills.

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, I desired to present this view to the House, for I want to excuse myself from any responsibility in the matter, if the House choose to delay the passage of this bill.

The question being upon the motion to reconsider,

Mr. MEADE demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. MEADE and FOWLER were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 69, noes 67.

So the House agreed to reconsider.

The question now recurred upon the adoption of the resolution to close debate to-day at three o'clock.

Mr. DANIEL moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. SWEETSER demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the House will allow me, I will suggest whether it will not be better to set some time for closing this debate?

Mr. MEADE. We cannot set the time. We have called for information which I think it is necessary that we should have. I hope debate will not be closed till we get that information.

Mr. DANIEL. I think the only way we can get rid of the resolution is, to lay it upon the table. I hope the House will lay it upon the table, and take up something else.

Mr. SWEETSER. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DUNHAM. I renew it.

The yeas and nays were then ordered.

Mr. DANIEL. At the suggestion of gentlemen around me, I will withdraw the motion to lay on the table, and move to amend the resolution, so as to close debate on Monday next at three o'clock.

Mr. OLDS. That is resolution day.

Mr. DANIEL. Then I move to insert three o'clock on Tuesday next.

Mr. DUNHAM demanded tellers on the motion; which were ordered, and Messrs. RICHARDSON, and STANTON of Tennessee, appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 30, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. DANIEL, and there were—yeas 81, nays 96; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Charles Allen, Allison, Bartlett, Bibb, Bowler, Bowie, Albert G. Brown, Budd, Busby, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Clark, Cobb, Cullum, Daniel, Dean, Dimmick, Disney, Durkee, Eastman, Edmundson, Fulkner, Fitch, Florence, Fowler, Thomas J. D. Mr. THOMPSON, of Virginia, asked leave to vote, although he was without the bar when his name was called. Objection being made his vote was not recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the adoption of the resolution now before the House.

Mr. MEADE. I understand the resolution is the same as adopted yesterday. I move to lay it upon the table.

Mr. HOUSTON demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I wish to inquire if the motion to lay upon the table do not prevail, it will not be in order to amend the resolution, by inserting three o'clock on any other day?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think not.

The SPEAKER. It is in order. It is a resolution in the usual form to close debate at three o'clock upon the Mexican indemnity bill.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. MEADE, and there were—yeas 73, nays 104; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Bartlett, Bocoock, Bragg, A. G. Brown, Buell, Busby, T. Campbell, Carter, Caskie, Churchwell, Clark, Colecock, Daniel, Dean, Durkee, Edgerton, Evans, Faulkner, Fitch, Florence, Freeman, Gamble, Gaylord, Gentry, Gilmore, Green, Grey, Grow, Hart, Holladay, Howard, Ingersoll, John Johnson, R. Stanton, Abraham F. Stevens, Alexander H. Stephens, Taylor, Benjamin Thompson, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Tuck, Walbridge, Walsh, Ward, Watkins, Welch, Wells, Alexander White, Williams, and Yates.—104.

So the resolution was not laid upon the table.

Mr. ROBBINS. I think the question has been sufficiently debated, and I therefore ask the previous question.

Mr. HOUSTON. What will be the effect of it?

The SPEAKER. To bring the House to a vote upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes, I know that; but the terms of the resolution is to close debate to-morrow, and that resolution, thus worded, was made yesterday. If the resolution is adopted, will the effect be to close debate this evening or to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. It will be for the House to put its own construction upon its own actions.

Mr. DANIEL. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] to withdraw his motion, and allow the resolution to be amended.

Mr. ROBBINS. I will, and I propose to offer an amendment, that the debate be closed to-day at three o'clock.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest another day as an amendment, and the question will then be first taken upon the longer time. I move that the debate be closed to-morrow at two o'clock.

Mr. ROBBINS. I except the amendment, and I move the previous question.

Mr. MEADE. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania three o'clock.

The previous question then received a second, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The question was first taken upon the amendment of Mr. ROBBINS, it was agreed to.

The question then recurring upon the adoption of the resolution, it was put and agreed to.

So the House decided to close debate upon the Mexican indemnity bill at two o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. DUNHAM. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and to lay that motion upon the table.

Mr. STEPHENS. It is not in order. It has been reconsidered once.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that it is not the same resolution in all its parts, and therefore the vote may be reconsidered. Such is the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. MEADE called the yeas and nays upon the motion of Mr. DUNHAM; but they were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. DANIEL. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to a question of order. I was upon the floor, was so recognized by the Speaker, and had submitted—

The SPEAKER, (interrupting.) The gentleman from Alabama is correct.

THE PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I appeal to the gentleman from Alabama to withdraw his motion for a moment, to permit me to make a personal explanation in regard to a publication which has been made by the public printer, and laid upon our tables, affecting to some extent my veracity.

A Voice. How long will it take?

Mr. STANTON. But a few minutes.

[Cries "Let him make the explanation!"]

Mr. STANTON said: On the 19th inst., during the debate which occurred upon the resolution ordering a number of copies of the Abstract of the Census to be obtained by the Printing Committee, I took occasion to make a few remarks in regard to the manner in which the public printer was complying with his contract. I stated that the Printing Committee had obtained an interview with Mr. Hamilton, and were given "distinctly to understand that he could not comply with his contract, and did not expect to do so, in this respect, that he was not prepared to furnish such a description of paper as his contract required."

In no other respect did I intimate that he had failed to meet the requirements of his official undertaking, unless the delay which has occurred in the delivery of the President's message and accompanying documents, to which I alluded, may be so considered. I intended to be understood as indicating distinctly the specific particular in which this contractor had failed to meet the requirements of his contract, and confined it to the inferior quality of the paper he had furnished and expected to furnish. I regarded it as a failure in the most material part—a failure which could not be excused by the committee or the House, and one which I, as a member of that committee, would not tolerate. Our public documents are intended to be bound and preserved, and if not printed upon strong and durable paper will be useless. Delay in the execution of the work might be tolerated to some extent, if the material and execution are such as we are authorized to expect; but my sense of public duty compels me, while I might excuse some delay, to require of the public printer the kind and quality of materials for which we have agreed to pay him.

The public printer has addressed me a letter, which has been printed and laid upon the desks of members, in which, while he seems to exculpate from intentional misrepresentation, ingeniously contrives to convey the idea that I have, with a view to injure him, departed from the truth. I have nothing to say in vindication of my own veracity more than the chairman of the House committee, the honorable Mr. GORMAN, has said in the letter which he has been kind enough to furnish me, and which I send to the Clerk to be read:

WASHINGTON CITY, D. C., January 22, 1832.

Hon. R. H. STANTON:

SIR: In reply to your note of this date, requesting my recollection of the statements made by Mr. Hamilton in the committee-room, in regard to the public printing, I have to say, that the remarks made by you in the House, and reported in the Globe, substantially give the effect and substance of what Mr. Hamilton said. As nearly as I can recollect, I will give the particulars of this interview as they occurred. After some conversation between the chairman of the Joint Committee and Mr. Hamilton, I turned to the latter and told him that "it was said by experienced practical printers, that he could not possibly execute his contract without serious loss, and that it had been seemingly demonstrated by figures; that the price he received under the contract would not buy the paper he had engaged to use—paper weighing fifty pounds to the ream—and if not so, he could disprove it, and if he intended to rely upon Congress for relief, we desired now to know it."

To this Mr. Hamilton replied: "He could not get paper weighing fifty pounds to the ream without the cash." I said, "I understood differently, if he could give good indorsers." He replied: "He could not run about and ask his friends to do that for him; that he expected to furnish paper weighing from forty-four to forty-eight pounds to the ream." "But, sir," said I, "this paper has been weighed by the chairman of the Senate committee, and it does not weigh quite forty pounds to the ream." Another sample was then weighed, and it held up to forty-two pounds only to the ream. None that we had before us came up to the requirement of the contract.

I then told Mr. Hamilton of a conversation I had with one of the paper makers, who did business on an extensive scale, from whom I had learned, that when Mr. Hamilton went to him to purchase paper for the public printing, he had selected an article far inferior in weight and other qualities to the contract stipulations, probably not weighing more than thirty-eight pounds to the ream; and when the gentleman informed Mr. Hamilton that it would not fill the contract, he, Mr. H., replied that "it was none of his business;" and Mr. Hamilton, failing to give the price for the paper of proper quality, did not get any. To this Mr. Hamilton replied: "That if he did not give the paper-maker such an answer, he ought to have done it, for he deserved it, and it certainly was not his business."

I told Mr. Hamilton, that I wanted him distinctly to understand, that under no circumstances could he expect relief from Congress, either if he performed his contract and lost money by it, or failed to perform it; and asked him to say distinctly whether he could furnish paper according to the quality prescribed in the contract, and do the work? He said in reply, that "the committee were very tight on him, in requiring him to come fully up to the contract in regard to the weight of the paper; that he had not been able to get paper heavy enough to meet the contract, but expected to do so as near as he could."

In the interview with Mr. Hamilton, he firmly impressed me, and I apprehend every one else of the committee, with the conviction, that he could not comply strictly with his contract, and did not expect to do so, but relied upon the indulgence of the committee in allowing him to furnish an inferior description of paper. I therefore sum up the result of this conference as follows:

First. Mr. Hamilton confessed tacitly that he had not complied with his contract in regard to the weight of the paper, and acknowledged his inability to do so.

Second. That he did not expect to furnish better paper than that exhibited before the committee, samples of which were weighed before him by Colonel Borland, on scales prepared for such purposes, and none of which came up to the requirements of the contract.

Very respectfully,

W. A. GORMAN.

It may be proper to add, that from the interview had with Mr. Hamilton, in the committee room, I was firmly impressed with the conviction, that he designed to impose upon Congress an inferior quality of paper, and relied upon the liberality of the Printing Committee to overlook the matter. His excuses for not furnishing better paper for the documents already furnished, were inconsistent, sometimes frivolous, and never reasonable. At no time, even in answer to direct questions submitted with a view to elicit frank answers, did he promise to procure paper such as was imperatively required by his contract. He either evaded a direct answer, or excused himself by referring to the difficulties of procuring the proper quality of paper.

It is not my nature to be ungenerous, and I am not disposed to deal more harshly with the public printer, as he supposes, than my obligations to the country require. He has sought his own position—he has placed himself in an attitude before Congress which he might have avoided. If he took the contract relying upon its violation to enable him to make money, he has attempted an imposition upon Congress, for which he deserves rebuke and punishment. If he expected to execute his contract in good faith and rely upon the liberality of Congress to indemnify him for losses he would inevitably sustain, he was guilty of stupidity quite as unpardonable. The experience of other contractors, who have been denied indemnity, was enough to enlighten him upon this point. In either event he has entitled himself to no undue favor on the part of Government, and ought not to expect it. The only safety to the Government is in holding contractors to a rigid compliance with their responsibilities; and when we learn to do this, the innumerable frauds and impositions to which Government has been subjected, will cease, and not until then.

The public printer intimates that the effect of my statement was to injure him pecuniarily and personally. I disclaim all such intentions, and have said what I have in discharge of a high public duty.

FEEES OF CLERKS.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I have been instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to submit a resolution. As it relates to a matter of importance, I ask the unanimous consent of the House that it may be now considered. It asks for information, without which it will be impossible for the committee to come to any definite conclusion upon the fee bill for the district and circuit courts of the United States.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to furnish to this House the information required, by answers to the following interrogatories in relation to the fees and expenses of the courts of the United States, at an early day, so far as the information can now be furnished from his department, and take measures to procure such information as is not now in his department, to be furnished to this House as soon as obtained.

The question being taken, the resolution was adopted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] moves that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DANIEL] moves that the House go into Committee of the Whole upon the Private Calendar; which motion takes precedence, this being private bill day.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. DANIEL, and it was disagreed to—ayes 65, noes 67.

The question recurring upon the motion of Mr. HOUSTON, it was put.

Mr. CABELL called for the yeas and nays on the motion of Mr. DANIEL to go into Committee on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has made his call too late.

Mr. CABELL. I do not think I am too late.

The SPEAKER. That is the opinion of the Chair. Does the gentleman take an appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. CABELL. I do. I claim it as a constitutional right to record my vote.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Do I understand the Chair to decide that the gentleman cannot call for the yeas and nays after the result of a vote has been announced?

Mr. HOUSTON, (in his seat.) And after the Chair had really stated another proposition?

The SPEAKER. That is the Chair's decision.

Mr. JONES. The Constitution says, "And the yeas and nays of the members of either House on any question shall, at the desire of one fifth of those present, be entered on the Journal."

The SPEAKER. Would it be in order, I inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee, to call the yeas and nays upon a question passed on yesterday? If not, they could not be called upon a question that had passed from before the House to-day.

The question was then taken upon the appeal, and the decision of the Chair was sustained.

ADJOURNMENT TILL MONDAY.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I proposed a privileged motion, and move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The question being taken, the motion was disagreed to, there being upon a division—ayes 62, noes 86.

THE MEXICAN INDEMNITY BILL.

The question was then taken on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, in the chair.)

Mr. HOUSTON moved that the committee take up House bill No. 46; which motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly proceeded to the consideration of the bill to provide for the carrying into execution, in further part, the twelfth article of the treaty with Mexico, concluded in Guadalupe Hidalgo.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the pending question was on the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. MARSHALL] to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON], and that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ALLEN] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. ALLEN said: Mr. Chairman, I should have had no disposition to mingle in the renewed debate upon the Mexican indemnity bill had not misrepresentations gone forth from a portion of the public press respecting certain matters discussed by me when the same subject was before the House near the close of the last Congress. I should have been content with the discharge of my duty to my country on that occasion; and with the record of the past before them, have left to the present House the disposition of the whole subject, contenting myself with a silent vote.

But, sir, the necessity of correcting misapprehension brings me before the committee to ask its indulgence while I review some part of the proceedings of last year, during the pendency of a similar bill, and restate the position which I took in regard to its merits.

In February, 1851, a bill to appropriate $3,180,000 for the payment of the last installment of the money due by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo to the Republic of Mexico was under discussion in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. By the terms of that treaty, the money was to be paid to Mexico on the 31st of May, 1852. Fifteen months, therefore, remained before the payment would become due; and in the course of the debate the inquiry arose, in what manner and by what instrumentality the transfer of necessary funds was to be made. The fact was then disclosed, that the Secretary of State had, in the summer of 1850, negotiated a bargain with T. W. Ward, of Boston, as the agent of the Barings, Howland & Aspinwall, of the city of New York, and Corean & Riggs, of the city of Washington, in pursuance of which contract funds of the United States to the amount due to Mexico were to be placed at the disposal of those gentlemen, and they were to make payment to Mexico according to the terms of said treaty. For the benefits to be derived by those bankers from the agency they had assumed, they were to allow this Government a discount of three and a half per cent. upon the funds delivered to them. In the course of debate it appeared that dissatisfaction was felt by other parties than the successful applicants for this agency, in the transfer of funds, and that at least one house of undoubted credit (the Rothschilds) had stood ready to offer to this Government a larger sum, by many thousand dollars, than was stipulated to be paid by the brokers with whom the contract was in fact made. It also appeared that the Secretary of State, almost immediately upon his assumption of office, had made the contract definitively with the Barings and their associates without affording any opportunity for other houses to present their proposals. That the agency was a source of emolument, directly or indirectly, commensurate with the magnitude of the funds, $3,100,000, to be transferred to the parties contracting with the Government, no one will deny; and it is equally indisputable that if, instead of hastily closing a bargain upon the first offer of negotiation, an opportunity had been given, for which there was more than ample time, for competition among responsible brokers and bankers for the prize which many would eagerly have sought, much better terms might have been obtained by the Government with equal security upon their fulfillment. And, in addition to the direct pecuniary advantage to have been derived by the United States by a fair competition for the avails of the agency in question, there would have been a satisfactory assurance in the minds of the public, and of all concerned, that the interests of the nation had been protected, and no suspicion of favoritism would have rested upon the transaction.

Another mode of meeting the demands of Mexico remained, more honorable still to this country, as it would have dispensed with all negotiation with brokers, foreign or native, and been kind, conciliatory, and beneficial to a feeble Republic, to whom the fortunes of war had awarded a few millions of dollars in exchange for the sources of inexhaustible wealth, and the dominion of an empire. No member of this committee can have adverted to portions of the correspondence of the Mexican Minister, which have been laid upon our desks, without being impressed with the belief that the Mexican Government would gladly have received this installment of the indemnity in acceptances by our Government at Washington, and that fear of giving offence to the Secretary of State, by interfering with his chosen mode of payment, alone prevented an early proposition to that effect. It was so obviously for the interest of Mexico to allow to this Government for difference in exchange, a larger sum than three and a half per cent., to be paid by the Barings and their associates, and receive her indemnity at Washington, that resort is had to the terms of the treaty for an objection against this mode of procedure. And it is further alleged that the Senate refused to allow a provision to be inserted in the treaty, by which drafts on this Government for the several installments were to be delivered to Mexico on the ratification of the treaty. This objection is well answered by reference to the condition of things at the time of the ratification of the treaty, before our army had been withdrawn from the invaded country, and to the policy which dictated the withholding at that time of a large amount of the negotiable obligations of the Government. It is an objection which never suggested itself to the minds of General Taylor's Cabinet. It was the desire of that Administration, in consideration of the necessities of Mexico, to adopt this mode of payment; and nothing but the failure of the Mexican Minister seasonably to receive instructions to that effect, prevented such an arrangement from taking effect prior to the payment of the second installment.

But, sir, I waive the further consideration of the expediency of paying the indemnity directly, and without the intervention of brokers, to the agents of Mexico at Washington. Let gentlemen dismiss that argument if they please from their minds. And I have still very grave objections against the course pursued in this business by the Secretary of State.

In the first place, I assert that no officer of the Government had any right to negotiate definitively for the payment of the money two years, or one year, in advance of an appropriation of Congress therefor.

In the second place, if the right of any executive officer to make such a negotiation, at such time, were admitted, it would be the duty of that officer, for the protection of the rights of the country, as well as to avoid favoritism in the disposition of an immensely profitable contract, to throw it open to fair competition among those who are equally competent to the business, and responsible for any failure in its performance.

And, in the third place, I deny entirely the right of the Secretary of State to negotiate with the brokers at all for the payment of the Mexican indemnity. It was an assumption of duties which belong to another officer of the Government.

Now, sir, in briefly presenting my views, as I shall do, I ask this committee to look at the facts which are before them, and which will be before them, to separate this matter from considerations which do not belong to it, and to dispose of it, as I doubt not they will desire to do, in the exercise of judgments unbiased by prejudice. It is not an unusual thing here for skillful and dexterous men, by influences in the House, and more especially out of the House, to connect the subject-matter under consideration here with topics entirely foreign to that which properly invites the attention of this body, and thereby diverting its regard from the true issues which are submitted to it.

The question simply is, Has a proper and suitable arrangement been made with the Republic of Mexico and in reference to the payment of this indemnity? I cast from my mind all other considerations whatever. I recur not to other subjects. But I wish to look to the facts which lie before me, and which belong to the case, and all I ask of the committee is, that they will do the same, and come to such conclusions as those facts shall justify. Let me say, also, that during the debate which has already taken place upon this question, I think we have been led away from the true issue which is before us. There has been a representation or memorial presented for the consideration of the House by the Messrs. Green, in which they make complaint that they had no opportunity of competing for this contract, and the benefits resulting from it. Well, if such is the fact—if these gentlemen were desirous of negotiating with the Government, and could furnish to the Government ample security for its indemnity against loss, but had no opportunity of offering their proposals, then I do not see but that their complaint is a just one. Yet I do ask that the issue may not be tried upon this question, whether the Messrs. Green have been treated fairly or improperly in this matter. The issue that has been raised between the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, on the one hand, and the Messrs. Green on the other, and the subjects which have been introduced by the chairman of that committee in connection with the memorial of those gentlemen, have engrossed, as the committee are aware, almost the whole time during which this discussion has been in progress.

I urge, therefore, upon the consideration of this committee, that they do not permit the various questions which have arisen between the Messrs. Green and the chairman of the Foreign Relations to divert their attention from the true question before them. This matter, which relates to the grievances of the Messrs. Green, may be a proper one for the consideration of the House, but beyond that and above it, and the subject which should engross the attention of the House almost to its exclusion, is the great question whether the course of any department of the Government has been correct and proper in the whole disposition of the business which related to the Mexican treaty. Set aside, therefore, all consideration of the question as it respects fairness or unfairness towards the Messrs. Green. With that certainly I have nothing to do. They have no concern with my purposes or my motives. They prompted not the course which I have pursued; neither could they have prevented or interfered with that which I saw fit to pursue. Let me, therefore, not prejudice their merits before this House; and on the other hand, let not the case which they present be so exclusively regarded by this House, or receive such prominence in the consideration of this question, that other matters, which are far more important, shall be in danger of being lost sight of and forgotten.

In respect to the first position which I have taken, that no officer of this Government had a right to make a definitive negotiation in advance of the appropriation of Congress, I should like to see the first member of this committee who disputes the correctness of that proposition. I have heard no one in his place in this House deny, for a moment, its correctness. There seems to be an implied assent to the proposition on all sides of this question. If any member undertakes to say that it was proper to make a definitive negotiation for the payment of money, with bankers and brokers, nearly two years in advance of the appropriation of Congress, I should be very glad that he should rise in his place and say so at this time. If we are all agreed on that matter, if no one undertakes to dispute the proposition, then I will not undertake to enforce it by any argument before this intelligent committee. I will not undertake to prove to the committee that this House holds the purse-strings of the nation, and that no matter what treaty may have been negotiated several years since, no matter what sum of money it may have been agreed by that treaty should be paid to a foreign government, yet, until there shall be an appropriation by this House, no negotiation can be concluded with any party, for any consideration, by which that party shall obtain the guarantee of the Government that the funds of the United States shall be placed in the hands of such party for any purpose connected with their disbursement. Many causes might have arisen after the negotiation of that treaty to supersede the payment altogether. War might have been renewed with Mexico, or in the lapse of two years new arrangements might have been made with that power. But it is not necessary to point out contingencies that might have arisen. It is enough to say that this House has control of the purse of the nation, and, until it loosen the strings, no man has a right, in advance of its action, to put his hands upon the public funds, or to transfer that right to another.

Then, sir, if I am correct in the general proposition, what follows? It follows that the Secretary of State has violated this wise and salutary principle. He has made a contract with the Barings and their associates for the disbursement of the public money, in flagrant disregard of it. And now, sir, who will dispute the correctness of the second proposition, viz: that if an officer of the Government had been authorized, in the discharge of his general duties, to negotiate with bankers and brokers, by the result of which, between three and four millions of the property of the United States should be placed in the hands of those bankers and brokers, in consideration of certain services to be performed by them, the negotiation should be so conducted as to throw open to competition by responsible houses, the lucrative business of disbursing the public funds? Of the immense value of the contract with the Government for the payment of the Mexican indemnity, the facts presented afford us some knowledge. Its full benefits the brokers understand better than we do. And hence the eager struggle to obtain possession of the prize. I think no man who takes these matters into consideration will say that there ought not to have been fair competition. The contract ought not to have been made—in the entire ignorance by the public of the whole transaction—with the person who should be fortunate enough to obtain by some means knowledge of the opportunity of gain, and to come forward with the first proposition. Why, I believe, in purchasing the stores for your Army and Navy for the various stations and depôts throughout the country, you do not buy a few barrels of beef or provisions of any kind, to be forwarded for your Army and Navy, without opening a fair competition to the whole country. You send your proposals through the public newspapers. Now, I do not say that the Secretary of State, or the Secretary of the Treasury, was bound to pursue that identical course rather than any other, and advertise this contract in the newspapers of the country; but I do aver, that having two years before him for the payment of the installment then under consideration, it was his bounden duty to wait until the public in the principal cities, in the country, and abroad, should have been informed that the Government were disposed to negotiate in this matter; and to go further, if necessary, and correspond with those whose business it is to furnish the facilities which the Government requires, and to reap the benefits which the Government bestows, that they be informed, and the interests of the Government protected by competition, rather than that the contract should be given, as a matter of favoritism, to the earliest applicant.

I believe the friends of the Secretary of State, and his supporters in this House, have, in debate here, admitted that the course which was pursued by the Secretary in this particular, in making his contract with the Barings and their associates, without affording an opportunity of competition to any other persons, was wrong in principle; and the only answer which has been given to objections which have been made to this proceeding is, that however much the Government may have lost thereby, it is too late to correct the error. Such was the argument of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks.] While on one hand it has been said that it was too late to correct the error, on the other, I think there was some very faint denial that the arrangement with the Barings and their associates was definitive in its character. Upon this point it is necessary only to refer to the letter of Mr. Webster to Mr. Green, dated the 2d of September, 1850, in which he states that "he had made a definitive arrangement with Messrs. Baring, Brothers & Co.," &c., and cannot, therefore, listen to any terms from any other quarter.

I now come, in passing hastily along, to my third proposition, which is, that the Secretary of State had no right whatever to interfere in this matter, under any circumstances. I have asserted that it was without precedent, and contrary to precedent. I do not know whether I correctly understood the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, [Mr. Bayly,] but I understood him to state that one installment of the Mexican indemnity was negotiated with the brokers and bankers by the late Secretary of State, (Mr. Clayton.) I see that gentleman now in this Hall, and I desire to ask him whether I correctly understood him?

Mr. BAYLY. The gentleman is mistaken. On the contrary, I stated that that installment was negotiated by Mr. Letcher, our Minister in Mexico.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Letcher, who was in Mexico, had nothing to do with the contract with the bankers, and I now understand the gentleman to say that the Secretary of State had nothing to do with it. I am aware that he had not; but I will tell this committee what he did. He negotiated with the Mexican Minister in relation to the terms of payment, and the time and place of payment; but when that negotiation came to an end, and arrangements were to be made with the brokers, Mr. Clayton at once gave up all connection with the business. He would have nothing to do with it. He had too much regard for his own reputation. He had too much regard to a sense of propriety to interfere in a matter so delicate, and one in reference to which there was so much room for misapprehension, to say the least. He would not interfere with the duties which properly belonged to another officer. Now, sir, whoever will inquire into the course of proceeding in this behalf adopted by the present Secretary of State—whoever will examine that course thoroughly and critically, and sift it to the bottom, will find that when he came into office, he did instantly and eagerly what the former Secretary of State (Mr. Clayton) had refused to do. He assumed upon himself the negotiation for the payment of the installments of the Mexican indemnity at once—almost immediately. It was but a few days from the time he commenced his official course, that he instituted a negotiation with the bankers and brokers for the payment of a large sum of money, for which, perhaps, at some future day, Congress might make an appropriation. Now, I ask, what authority the Secretary of State had for this? I ask why he disregarded the precedents in the case?—why he assumed the duty of another officer? To learn what that duty is, we have but to look at the bill before us. What are its provisions? It simply makes an appropriation of so much money to be paid out of the Treasury in liquidating the debt due to Mexico. Now, sir, there is no legislator in the country; there is no man who has had anything to do with the affairs of his own commonwealth, or even with the affairs of his own county or township, who is not competent to decide this question—who does not know that when there is nothing to be done but to pay a certain sum of money out of the Treasury, it becomes the duty of the Treasurer to make that payment, and not the duty of any other officer.

It is doubtless the duty of the Secretary of State to negotiate treaties with foreign ministers. But when the negotiation is concluded, and nothing remains but to appropriate a sum of money out of the Treasury, I hold, and I believe it has always been held in the history of this Government, that the duties of the Secretary of State have been discharged, and that the payment of the money is a duty which belongs to another officer.

But I must hasten onward. I took occasion last year, in the course of the discussion upon this bill—though it came suddenly upon me—in the discharge of what I believed to be my duty, to charge upon the present Secretary of State unnecessary and improper interference in a transaction which did not devolve upon his office, and for which there is no evidence that he is peculiarly qualified to undertake. The Secretary of the Treasury, but not the Secretary of State, is selected for his skill in financial affairs. I further urged upon this House, that the relations which the present Secretary of State sustains to the capitalists and bankers, are such as render it highly improper and unfit that he should take it upon himself, unnecessarily, to discharge the duties he assumed. Now, what were those relations? It had come to my knowledge—and it seemed to me a proper matter for the knowledge of the House—that when the Secretary of State took upon himself the office which he now holds, he entered into a negotiation quite as remarkable, to say the least, as the negotiation which it appears he made with the Barings and their associates. It was a negotiation with men of a character, class, and description similar to that of Mr. Ward, of Boston, and Howland & Aspinwall, of New York; a negotiation, by which, as an inducement for Mr. Webster to take the office which he now holds, a sum of money was to be furnished—$50,000—to support him in that office. Now, I do not say that Mr. Ward was a party in this negotiation, either directly or indirectly, nor do I say that he was in any way a contributor to that fund. Neither do I say that he was not directly or indirectly a contributor. I know the names of some of them. When the collector passed through certain streets in the city of Boston, calling upon the neighbors of that gentleman and his associates in like condition with himself, for their respective contributions, I do not know what mark he may have found upon the door-posts of that gentleman, which induced him to pass his house, without calling upon him also for his contribution. Nor do I know that when the collection was taken up in the city of New York, among those who are familiarly called the upper-tendom there, that Messrs. Howland & Aspinwall were contributors also; but I am satisfied of this fact, and I offered at the time to prove to this House, by evidence then within the reach of my voice, that the associates of these men, if not themselves also, were among the persons who were contributors to this fund.

[Here a message was received from the President of the United States, by the hands of MILARD P. FILLMORE, his Private Secretary.]

Mr. ALLEN, (resuming.) Now, it is for this House to say, and for the country to say, whether these facts should be made known, or should not. Mark the time when the contract was entered into with the Barings and their associates. Mark the time, also, when the contract was entered into for the raising of the sum of $50,000 to support Mr. Webster in the office of Secretary of State, by the same description of men to whom they belong, if not by themselves also. When was this contract made with the Barings? On the 31st day of August, 1850, Mr. Green writes to Mr. Webster informing him that such an arrangement had been made by him with the Government of Mexico, that he was authorized to negotiate for the payment of this money. Two days after, the Secretary of State replies that he had already made "a definite arrangement a few weeks ago with Barings, Brothers & Co., Howland & Aspinwall, and Corcoran & Riggs," for payment of this money. You will bear in mind that this letter from Green to Webster was written upon the 31st day of August, and the reply upon the 2d of September. If you will turn to that reply, found in the Telegraph, which has been laid upon our tables, you will find the Secretary says a "definite arrangement" was completed some weeks before that period. Well, the Secretary had not then been in office six weeks. He took the office on the 22d of July, and the proposition of Mr. Green was made on the 31st of August; and he replies that "a few weeks ago" a definite arrangement had been made. When was the other definite arrangement made? At the time the Secretary took his office. Just before he accepted the office the agreement was made as to the sum to be raised, and capitalists went on and consequently raised the money. Now, if the contract was made with Barings and their associates some weeks before this proposition of Mr. Green to Mr. Webster, does it not follow irresistibly that the contract was going on with Mr. Ward and Howland & Aspinwall at the very time when the negotiation was going on for raising this sum of $50,000? Now, sir, these things are joined together by facts which belong to the immutable history of the past, and no man's ingenuity can put them asunder. And it is for gentlemen to say—and not you only whom I address, but it is for the country to say, whether a free representative of a portion of the free people of this country ought, upon an occasion like this, to make a disclosure of these facts, or to withhold them? There was a denial in this House of the truth of the facts, but that denial was followed by an offer to prove them upon the spot. The friends of the Secretary came forward and resisted to the utmost any investigation, upon the proffer of an investigation made in my behalf, and urged by me, and upon a proffer to prove the facts as I had advanced them. And through that influence, and through the force of artful appeals to prejudices which, I trust, have been weakened since the last Congress, the friends of the Secretary were able to prevent that disclosure, and to preclude an examination into the facts of the case at that period, when certainly there was ample time for full examination.

Sir, I hasten on. Although there was the denial I have spoken of, yet it was found to be unsafe, and the friends of the Secretary afterwards, at Boston and elsewhere, admitted the material facts in this case. It was admitted that the money was raised, and at the time it was alleged to have been raised. But false issues were presented through the papers. I have not seen fit to meet those issues or correct those misrepresentations. This is the fit time, and this House the proper place, to reinstate the true issue.

One newspaper, friendly to the Secretary, asserted that one Mr. Haven, of Boston, received the proposition from Mr. Webster to have this sum of money procured, and then Mr. Haven comes before the public in a letter, and says he did not receive such a proposition; and to assure the public of the fact, he publishes a letter which he says he did in fact receive from Mr. Webster. It is the very remarkable epistle written just after the death of General Taylor, in which Mr. Webster says that no man who is not "rich or a batchelor" can afford to take the office of Secretary of State. He also informs Mr. Haven that the present is the time to be taken by the forelock, and concludes with recommending to that office a distinguished gentleman of Massachusetts, whom nobody else had thought of, and whose lamented physical infirmities had compelled him to resign the comparatively light labors of presiding officer over a literary institution. The letter thus made public, furnished to discerning men satisfactory proof of that which it was supposed by Mr. Haven to conceal or refute. I did not introduce the name of that gentleman into the debate of last year. His controversy, if he has any, is with other persons.

I will, in closing, advert to one other misrepresentation, by which the friends of the Secretary sought to palliate the transaction they could no longer deny. It is the assertion that the contributors to the Secretary's subsidy were men who had retired from public life, and the concerns of business, and who were induced, by most disinterested considerations of regard, to tender a gratuitous acknowledgment of services rendered to the country. If such had been the nature of the transaction, a publication of the names of the generous donors would have furnished the readiest and most satisfactory evidence of the fact. But, sir, whenever the friends of the Secretary shall consent to an investigation of the subject before a committee of this House, it will be made to appear that this statement of the transaction is as unfounded as it is improbable. Having sought heretofore for a full development of the circumstances under which the Secretary entered upon his office, nothing remains for me to do, but to evince my readiness to enter upon an investigation of the facts, whenever the objections to the appointment of a committee for that purpose shall be withdrawn; and I pledge myself to this House to prove, whenever an opportunity shall be presented, all and more than all I have asserted.

Mr. ALLEN expressed a wish to continue [Cries "Let him go on!" "Let him go on!"] Mr. ALLEN. Will the gentleman allow me a few moments?

Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts. Are these few moments to come out of my time?

The CHAIRMAN. They will.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I will not allow him the tenth part of a second.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will allow me, I will say that there is a response to the resolution which we passed yesterday. I suggest that it be read now.

Mr. DAVIS. I would rather go on now. Mr. Chairman, as it regards the general points which have been raised here in reference to the payment of this indemnity, I have not the advantage of the experience which many gentlemen about me possess. But for some peculiar circumstances, I should have been content, and, indeed, I should have preferred to have heard this debate through, and argued upon its general questions, by gentlemen much more competent than myself to argue them, and to have given my vote as I might have finally made up my mind upon the argument. But before proceeding to dwell upon some particular considerations, I will merely say that the impression left upon my mind is, that there can be but two questions here. The resolve before the House is for the appropriation of three millions of money in payment of the last installment due from us to Mexico by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and falling due May 31st, 1852. It is well understood that this appropriation, when made, unless Congress shall otherwise direct, will pass through the State Department. On the question whether such vehicle of payment is in conformity with usage, or whether there is any objection to it in principle, I have made no personal examination of authorities. And while it appears to me that two minds of equal fairness and acuteness might, perhaps will, come to opposite conclusions upon this question of form, treating it as an original question, I still see no reason for disturbing the conclusion to which General Taylor's Cabinet, two successive Democratic Committees of Ways and Means, and the last House of Representatives, have successively arrived on that point. I find that General Taylor's Cabinet, against which no suggestion of favoritism or undue influence is, at this time, made, acted upon the ground that this was proper matter for negotiation by the Secretary of State. I find under these circumstances that Mr. Webster, in taking charge of this matter, did no more than follow the course indicated by his predecessors. Such was the opinion of General Taylor's Cabinet. What, then, are the next facts in the case? Here are two Committees, in succession, of Ways and Means of this House that have been organized by Democratic Houses. They have been committees containing men of experience and judgment—men with no particular partialities or predilections for the Administration or for Mr. Webster. I do not know the names of all the members of the Committee of Ways and Means in the former House, though I have reason to respect it, from what I have known of its constituent members. With regard to the present existing committee, every gentleman must understand that it is not organized in such a manner that it can be supposed to have any personal bias or predilection for the Administration. And it may also be stated, as regards that committee, that it is composed of a body of men of as good judgment, of as large experience, and of as reliable honesty as can be found in this House. These two successive committees, upon this abstract question, free from personal bias, have unanimously reported and taken a course sustaining the view of the Secretary of State upon this point; or rather, to state the thing more accurately, they have unanimously reported the appropriation, without seeing fit to recommend any interference with the mode in which it was well understood that the funds would be remitted. This consideration goes a great way to satisfy my own mind, with the limited opportunity I have had of making myself personally acquainted with the subject. Presuming, then, that it is regular enough that this installment, falling due under a treaty with a foreign Power, should pass through the department through which the Government habitually communicates with foreign Powers, what is the next consideration? Is there anything going to show the probability of favoritism or irregularity on the part of the Department which is likely to be intrusted with the payment? I see that my colleague, in his speech just made, has introduced no new personal matter of any importance, for I have examined the Congressional Globe which contained the former debate in reference to this matter. Every fact which could be brought against the Secretary of State was urged fully and thoroughly in the last House; but there are a number of facts, most conclusive in their character, in favor of Mr. Webster's course, which it seems to me did not then appear. With the full benefit of the examination which my colleague and others then gave the subject, what was the result? All these questions came up, and in an anti-Administration House, there was a vote of something like one hundred and twenty-eight to thirty-six sustaining Mr. Webster. The letting out to open bidders, the propriety of which my colleague now deems so clear that he thinks Mr. Webster could only have omitted it from fraudulent design, was then urged upon the House, and rejected by a vast majority. How idle is it now to say that there are certain things in the action of the Secretary of State that no man can justify, when, in point of fact, a Democratic House after full debate, justified and sustained him at every point. Take it, as the gentleman claims, that it was a contract which might or might not be made void at the pleasure of the House. The House went on with a full knowledge of the facts, and confirmed and sanctioned it. Under these circumstances, and after such sanction and authority given by this House, it looks like trifling to recede; and certainly not one word can be said against the Secretary as to the improvidence of the contract which does not apply with a fuller force to the House, which on full debate and knowledge ratified every step he had taken. Thoroughly fortified, then, as the Secretary is, no less by the facts of the case than by the opinions of the numerous weighty tribunals which have examined the case and sustained him, I must say that I should hardly have felt inclined to trouble the House at this time, had not other suggestions been made. From whom do they proceed? What party is before us from the outside making any lament or outcry? There is much said about the sufferings of the Mexican Republic, and there is a strong sympathy for it. Who by? Where is the Republic? I see no Republic, nor any one claiming to represent it. The party that is alleged to have suffered does not say a word—is not here, and makes no complaints. The Messrs. Green are here, and it is their outcry only that stuns the ear. Now, as to the complaint of the Messrs. Green, I have only to say, that it would be the most singular thing if they were not indignant at Mr. Webster, who rejected their proposition. It would, indeed, be singular if they did not hate him with a bitter, irreconcilable, Indian hatred. Why not? But for him they think they would have received a princely fortune, wrung from the necessities of Mexico. They have one hundred and seventy-five thousand good reasons for hating him. These men expected, without capital, by the use of their wits in going backwards and forwards between these Governments, to put into their pockets what they call, in one of their papers, "the paltry commission" of $175,000. There is, sir, a touching generosity of soul exhibited in the first ground which these gentlemen allege as their reason for interposing between ours and the Mexican Government. I read from their memorial addressed to the President:

"Mr. Marks was also a warm personal friend and admirer of the present distinguished head of the Mexican Government, and of the members of the then existing Cabinet, and his and our attention was drawn to this subject of the indemnity less by any desire to make a profit out of it for ourselves than by sympathy for the Mexican Government, and indignation at the combinations formed by foreign bankers to plunder the Treasury of our own Government, as well as Mexico."

But this disinterested sympathy yields presently to the austere suggestions of prudence, enforced by Scripture. They go on to say—

"But, sir, we have it from high authority that the laborer is deserving of his reward; and the Mexican Government, in availing itself of our labors and suggestions, could not, in honesty and good faith, do less than admit that we were entitled, as compensation, to some small part of the large sums thus to be saved to both Governments."

This "small part" they afterwards describe as follows:

"Our compensation was thus to be only on the $5,000,000, and was the difference between the premium to be paid to the United States, (say four and a half per cent.,) and the eight per cent. to be allowed by the Mexican Government. viz: $175,000."

Now, sir, when you find that the three great houses, with solid capital, to whom Mr. Webster intrusted this business, actually made on the three millions paid over by them less than thirty thousand dollars profit, you will be prepared to estimate at its true value the "sympathy for the Mexican Government," which would have extorted $175,000 for the mere service of getting our Government's name to some bills of exchange. Now, we have the fact that Mexico makes no complaint, and that every dollar due to her has been paid with austere and rigid punctuality.

I will suppose another state of things which, if it had existed, might possibly have given ground for just suspicion. I will suppose that Mr. Webster had withdrawn the transaction of this great affair from the ancient and solid banking house which had for nearly three quarters of a century faithfully and accurately transacted similar business for this Government, and had put it in the hands of two gentlemen, not capitalists or bankers, and who received $175,000 for causing him to give the business that direction. I can imagine that in such a case not even the high character of Mr. Webster would have protected so singular a transaction from something of suspicion. His employing the houses which he did employ, at the very moderate rates of profit which they did actually realize, is in fact the most simple, natural, and probable transaction in the world. No one can read the memorial of the Messrs. Green without being struck with the skill with which their griefs for the alleged sufferings of Mexico, and for their own failure to shave $175,000 out of Mexico, are blended and harmonized. A popular poet recites the not dissimilar incident of a shipwrecked crew suffering the additional loss of the ship's cutter, containing a number of their comrades, as well as a quantity of necessary provisions. The grief of the survivors is thus described, in language which the complaints of the Messrs. Green do not fail to call to mind—

"They grieved for those who perished in the cutter,
And also for the biscuit, casks, and butter!"

But I concur with the Messrs. Green in one point. I think Mexico is entitled to careful and generous treatment at our hands. She has suffered enough from our armies, without being further depleted by our money leeches. Never was an act wiser or more righteous than that which gave Mexico her installment dollar for dollar, at a profit to the contractors of less than one per cent., and saved her from paying to intermediate brokers alone a shave of four.

My colleague, upon the one hand, is resolute in his condemnation of Mr. Webster for making any contract; and, upon the other, argues that the Government ought to have gone on and accepted these bills. It is a remarkably constituted mind which sees no legal difficulties in the way of the Government's accepting bills, or making the payments in Washington in contravention of the treaty, but sees mountains in the way of the Secretary's making a legal contract to provide for the payment of the installments in Mexico according to the treaty. General Green I do not know personally, and certainly in relation either to him or to Benjamin E. Green, I have no disposition to say anything harsh. It is obvious that they have succeeded, to some slight extent, in impressing with their views some gentlemen in this Hall who, perhaps, have not had full opportunity to examine the subject. I have, however, been struck throughout this debate at the caution which gentlemen, who have taken the other side of the question, have used in speaking of the Secretary of State. They have only alluded to him so far as is necessary to aid in the making out of their case. They have not traveled out of the record for the purpose of investigating his private affairs. That has not been resorted to out of a House of two hundred and forty-two members, composed of gentlemen of various feelings and politics, except by one gentleman who has gone without the record to investigate the private relations of Mr. Webster. Now, is not it possible that he may be mistaken in his own motives and feelings? Did not it occur to him that this debate was not sufficiently spicy, and that the stimulus of a little hatred ought to be thrown in "to make the mixture slab and good"? Did not he, as the debate proceeded, and gentleman after gentleman arose opposed to the Administration, treating the question upon general grounds, and particularly when that letter came in from these bankers which shows they only made three and a half per cent. upon the transaction, including two and a half per cent. received for the loan of their own funds where the Greens had intended to have made $175,000, have something of the feeling of a lawyer whose client unexpectedly settles a promising case before trial, or a physician whose patient gets well without giving a chance for any expenditure of medicine? It did appear to me, that after the statement of those agents was received and read, there was nothing left for the rancor of the most vancorous to feed upon. I remember that an English historian remarks (very unjustly, I think) of the Puritans, that they were opposed to the practice of bear-bating, not because it was cruel to the bears, but because it was pleasing to the spectators; and there are some, possibly, to whom a great principle does not seem acceptable or lovely, unless it can be contorted into the means of giving pain or torture—unless there can be a wound inflicted, and the poisoned knife twisted in the wound. And we find a most singular combination here. We find General Green, whose controlling reason for hating the Secretary of State was the loss of these profits, linked in the bands of common hatred with gentlemen in this House to whom, in every other particular, he is most diametrically opposed. Gentlemen who, in their political associations, hate each other most cordially, are here brought together in the same truckle-bed. Although my colleague took great pains to separate Mr. Green's claim from the general merits of the case, still this case is brought into the House by Green's memorial, and it is Green's memorial and Green's views which constitute the basis upon which this controversy has been carried on. Up to 1848, the time when my colleague left the Philadelphia Convention because Mr. Webster was not nominated as a candidate for the Presidency, and because General Taylor was—I couple the two things—so far was he from thinking ill of Mr. Webster, that relations of strong friendship subsisted between them, and he considered him a proper person to fill the highest office within the gift of the people. What has he told us to-day?

Is it anything more than a renewal of what was said at the last session? What is there in it new to the American people? Nothing. It is an inevitable incident to greatness, that its pangs and struggles are as bare to the public eye as its energies and achievements. There is not a man who does not know that the great statesman of the country is as indifferent to money as he is devoted to the higher cares of the public weal. There is not a man, perhaps, (except my colleague and some of those who think with him,) who does not wish that the order which reigns in that vast understanding, and reduces to their elements the most complicated national questions, were equally exemplified in every detail of his personal expenditure. But it is not so. His devotion to the public has left him neither time nor disposition to take care of himself; and this well-known fact leaves the question simply whether the public, in exigent crises, shall be deprived of his services, or whether friends shall aid him. Nor is this case, however sad, a rare one. If the views of my colleague could prevail, neither Burke, nor Pitt, nor Canning, in the Old World, nor I think Jefferson, or Madison, or Monroe in the New, but would have been disqualified by their poverty, and that very unthrift which devotion to great thought produces, from lending their great powers to their country's service.

But as regards the facts: My colleague has said that he has been induced to speak to-day by the fact that his remarks on a former occasion have been misrepresented. Two years ago, in this House, he claimed that not merely had certain donations been made to Mr. Webster, but that their being made was the consideration and inducement in consequence of which Mr. Webster accepted the Secretaryship. If my colleague will look at the Congressional Globe he will find that was his statement.

Mr. ALLEN, (in his seat.) I say so now.

Mr. DAVIS. He says so now, that that was the object for which these subscriptions were made, and that Mr. Webster was thus induced to accept the Secretaryship.

My colleague's memory failed him this morning. He said he had not thought it wise or prudent to set himself right before the country, through the medium of the press, or to correct misrepresentation in any other place than here. Here was the proper place. That sounded manly, but still it is not correct in point of fact, as I understand. Before one of the trials in my colleague's Congressional district—and the facts I am about to relate led to the writing of the letter I now hold in my hand—there was a political meeting held in the city of Worcester, in reference to his election. My colleague was sick, and a gentleman from Boston, Mr. Dana, a man of high character and standing, belonging to my colleague's party, came up and addressed that meeting. As I understand—and my colleague can correct me if I am wrong—this gentleman, before he went to that meeting, had a personal interview with my colleague, at which it was arranged and understood what were the views to be presented as regards this matter.

Mr. ALLEN. No.

Mr. DAVIS. Does my colleague deny that he saw Mr. Dana just before that meeting?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not deny that I had an interview with Mr. Dana.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask my colleague, whether he denies that at this interview with Mr. Dana, he talked about that subject?

Mr. ALLEN responded, but his response was not heard by the reporter.

Mr. DAVIS. No, of course not. I knew the fact, upon the authority of a gentleman to whom Mr. Dana himself told it. He told that gentleman that he had such interview with my colleague before coming to that meeting. At that interview you stated those things with regard to this transaction, which he on the same evening embodied in a speech. And yet my colleague has said this morning, that he thought this House was the true place, and did not think it proper until now to correct the alleged misrepresentations, as to the former debate on this subject. Well, Mr. Dana made certain statements about this matter, and under my colleague's suggestions, which were published in my colleague's district, and which must have met his eye, although he says he has not thought proper to make use of the press in regard to this matter, in answer to those statements. Franklin Haven, of Boston, a most respectable and honorable gentleman, whose word would be implicitly taken wherever he is known, published a letter, from which I will read the following extract:

Boston, May 17, 1851.

To the Editor of the Transcript:

Sir: I saw last evening, for the first time, in your paper of yesterday, a speech delivered April 5th, at Worcester, by Richard H. Dana, Jr., Esq., containing, among other things, some statements concerning myself and my relations with Mr. Webster, Secretary of State, to which I desire to reply.

I am aware that, in a cautiously-written note, dated the 12th instant, and addressed to the editor of the Daily Advertiser, Mr. Dana says, on the subject of this speech, that "the expressions therein attributed to Mr. Quincy are not correctly reported," adding, that "the report was made without his knowledge, and published without having been submitted to him, and without his authority." He does not, however, in any way imply that he did not say in substance what he is reported to have said at Worcester; and as the speech in question has, I am told, often been printed without remonstrance from him, as a true report, since it first appeared six weeks ago, and as Mr. Dana has not seen fit to qualify, or correct any part of it in which I am concerned, I shall, until otherwise advised, believe that no injustice has been done to him in these particulars.

Mr. Dana more than indorses all the base calumnies uttered in the House of Representatives against Mr. Webster, by Mr. Charles Allen, on the 25th and 26th of February, for which I was subsequently vouched as the principal authority. He says: "I consider Judge Allen would have required justification had he failed to take the ground that 'he did on this subject; and I ask if it is not the duty of every man who sees corruption in high places to expose it?'"

This calumny was, (as your readers all know,) that Mr. Webster had been induced to accept the place of Secretary of State in consequence of money paid, or promised to be paid, to him from Boston and New York, and that this bargain was proposed by Mr. Webster through me, and, in the result, was consummated by the required payment. Such a bargain Mr. Dana calls "corruption in high places;" and it would be so if it had been made. He says, too, repeating after Mr. Allen, and speaking of the contract for the payment of the Mexican indemnity, that Mr. Webster was dependent on the bankers (Messrs. Corcoran & Riggs) "to whom the contract was given;" and he adds, afterwards, that Mr. Webster "has received a gift from the very class of men concerned in this contract as the condition of taking the office of Secretary of State; $25,000 from New York and $19,000 from Boston."

I think all persons who know me—as Mr. Dana says he does—"very well," know that I would not be connected with a transaction so creditable to all who might be concerned in it. I feel equally sure that Mr. Webster would not, nor would the honorable men who subsequently came forward in Boston, and did what they thought their duty required them to do to a great statesman, who had made a great sacrifice of his pecuniary interests and those of his family to the service of his country. I was not one of these gentlemen; but I know that they were high-minded men—most of them retired from affairs, and little concerned in politics, except just so far as they are concerned in the welfare of the Union.

Mr. Dana, in his speech, refers to the letter which Mr. Webster addressed to me on the state of things immediately after General Taylor's death. He had therefore read that letter, dated July 12, 1850; and I suppose he must have read my letter, published with it, and dated March 11, 1851. The letter of Mr. Webster, written before the funeral of President Taylor, and before Mr. Webster or any one else knew who would be nominated by Mr. Fillmore as Secretary of State, contained no intimation whatever that the Department of State would be offered to him, but rather the reverse; and yet, except the subsequent notice by telegraph of the mere facts of his nomination as Secretary and acceptance of the office, this letter was, prior to the time of his entering upon the duties of the Department, the only communication I received either directly or indirectly from Mr. Webster, on the whole subject of the Secretaryship. I said so in my letter, and I now add that I have not at any time had any communication with him or from him upon the subject of the spontaneous gift made to him by the gentlemen of Boston, the character of which has been so perverted by Mr. Dana and Mr. Allen.

It is to be presumed that Mr. Dana saw the letter, and therefore knew perfectly well that there had not been any such creditable bargain as he described, and that the statements he made about it were not true.

The part which relates to the contract with Messrs. Corcoran & Riggs, the Washington bankers, and to Mr. Webster, as having "received a gift from the very class of men concerned in this contract as the condition of his taking the office of Secretary of State," is also untrue. The gift so honorably offered by men of high sense of honor in Boston to Mr. Webster was not offered to him until many weeks after he had become Secretary of State. Not more than two of the persons who offered it to him could in any way be regarded as of the class of bankers, or concerned in banking; and so far from his "position of independence" being affected by it, as Mr. Dana declares it was and is, I have good reason to believe that Mr. Webster does not to this day know the name or position of one of the individuals who have thus nobly and unostentatiously expressed to him their gratitude for his patriotic services.

FRANKLIN HAVEN.

I was struck with the singular vagueness of the gentleman's expressions. He charged the Secretary of State with undue bias, because he had received favors from men of the class, by the same people, in the same street, who might possibly have the same occupation and profession as the bankers who had received this contract. I do not know that people living in the same street, or using the same profession or occupation, are necessarily such sworn friends, that an obligation conferred by the one, implies a necessity of return to the other. It requires a vivid imagination to presume, that because you have received pecuniary obligation from a gentleman living in number one, in any street, you will therefore feel bound to swerve from your official duties, to oblige some of the gentlemen living in number two. There is nothing in the accusation which demands a reply. If there is anything in my colleague's position, it is this: that the fact that Mr. Webster has been embarrassed in his pecuniary affairs, and has received pecuniary favors, would disqualify him from serving his country as a statesman. Has my colleague been so much more fortunate than most other men as to have utterly escaped such embarrassments? Has the black ox never trode on his foot? If so, I congratulate him that that bitterest drop has never been added to his cup of misery. But if it should be true, of which I know nothing, that he, too, like perhaps the majority of mankind, has known the agonies of the proud man subjected to the calls of the imperious creditor—if he too has "served for a term in that leprous armada" of debt, entanglement, and evasion—and if in happier and more prosperous hours, he forgets the sufferings of earlier years, and is prompt to urge against others a state of embarrassment as a reason of disqualification—why, what then? It is but a modern illustration of the savage line of the Roman annalist, eo immitior quia toleraverat, "all the more pitiless because he, too, had suffered and all that need be said is, that the people among whom he lives have dealt and will deal with him more sparingly and kindly than he is inclined to deal with others.

Mr. Chairman, I now come to another point for the consideration of the committee. It appears by the report of the debate on this subject in the last Congress, that my colleague [Mr. ALLEN] then remarked that no other gentleman except himself had thought fit to bring Mr. Webster's private affairs before the notice of the House. The inquiry naturally occurs, Why was it that nobody else thought fit to bring these facts to the notice of the House? Was it fear, or was it good taste and decency that prevented others from touching that subject? Was there no other man in this House of equal courage and force as my colleague?—and in saying this I would not say a depreciating word of my colleague's courage or force. What was the reason that he was the only person who could be found to bring these charges—a citizen of Massachusetts—a former neighbor, fellow-citizen, and friend of the Secretary of State? Are we not thus led to the consideration, whether there is not some "level'd malice," some hatred here? When my colleague warns the House not to attach any importance to the suggestions of political bias, and advises them to consider facts alone, without reference to any unpleasant or unfriendly associations, has he not been conscious in his own mind that his own course was governed by the very causes against the influence of which he warned the House?

My colleague is particularly earnest upon the subject of corruption. He professes extreme fear of corruption. Now, there is a particular piece of corruption, as I consider it, occurring in our own State, before his own eyes—I might say occurring at his own instigation—that I think his talents and force might be more profitably directed against, than in hunting up these trumpery charges against the Secretary of State. Now, what are the facts? There are three parties in Massachusetts, and I mean to bring this matter close home, so far as Mr. Webster is concerned. There is the Democratic party, which in terms, in its resolves, indorses those measures known as the compromise measures. There is the Free-Soil party, which is sustained and kept up by hatred to the compromise measures, including the fugitive slave law. There is the Whig party, which I take it, by their State resolves, without taking perfectly distinct ground upon the compromise measures, still take perfectly distinct ground in sustaining Mr. Webster. What are the numbers of these parties? The number of Whig votes is 64,000, the number of the Democratic votes is 43,000, the number of the Free Soil 23,000, leaving the Whigs a plurality, which any where else would be a majority of 21,000 votes. Of that vast majority of Whigs and Democrats, you have 100,000 voters against 28,000; one part of whom sustain the compromise measures which Mr. Webster advocated, and the other part of whom, judging by their vote in their State Convention, sustain Mr. Webster, making, as I said before, 100,000 against 28,000. That was the case last year. Something like that was the case the year before. Well, what was the result, and what has happened in that State? Here were two parties, the Democratic and Free-Soil party, directly opposed to each other upon a ground which was vital to the existence of the Free-Soil party, and which was a most cardinal point in the creed of the Democratic party. Those parties met together and made a bargain. The Free-Soil party united with the Democratic party, and sent to the Senate of the United States the most talented and eloquent man who could be presented from the Free-Soil ranks; my colleague [Mr. ALLEN] always excepted. [Laughter.] For whom were the Democrats in Massachusetts who were in favor of the war with Mexico called upon to vote? For a gentleman who said, when Mr. Winthrop voted for the preamble and bill giving supplies to our troops in Mexico, "that Mr. Winthrop ought rather to allow our army to pass between the Caudine forks." Now I am not much of a Latin scholar, but I understand that the Caudine forks do not differ materially from the Alamo butchery; and that the Caudine forks in that connection, meant that Mr. Winthrop should have left the American throat to the tender mercies of the Mexican knife.

The Democratic party are in favor of non-intervention as regards slavery in the States or Territories. They were called upon to send to the United States Senate for six years a gentleman who was in favor of intervention at least up to the verge of the Constitution, as he understood it. They sent to the Senate of the United States a gentleman who declared, in a speech to be found in one of his printed volumes, that there were depths of infamy as well as heights of fame; that President Fillmore has sounded the former, and that he had better never have been born, than to have signed the fugitive slave bill. What induced the Democratic party to do this? What, I say, induced the Democrats to do this? What was it? Why, and how were the officers of the State put up like mutton and beef in the shambles? I will tell you how. The leaders of the two parties met in repeated caucuses: as an ultimate result, six Councilors, the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, and an United States Senator for nine days, were given to the Democrats, while three Councilors, the United States Senator, and Sergeant-at-Arms, and some other make-weight officer went to the Free-Soil party. The two parties higgled and chaffered day by day, and night by night, in long and heated meetings, as to the distribution of these offices—each begging the other to come up to the price of its pulled and advertised conscience and patriotism! Pulled, I say—advertised, I say, as thoroughly as ever were Phillips's fire annihilator, or Emerson's razor straps. I will do them the justice, however, and I feel bound to say that there was no trickery in one respect—there was as perfect an impartiality of treachery to principle on either side as can be expected from the weaknesses and imperfections of mortality. [Laughter.] Such a scene was never before exhibited or dreamed of in this country as was exhibited in old Massachusetts; the leaders of two whole parties brought up by one wide, wild, wasting sweep of the offices of the Commonwealth.

I want to hear what the gentleman will say about this great crime against our institutions, this wholesale corruption, this monstrous—I had almost said, this inexplicable falsehood to conscience and to God, to the heart of man, and to the nature of things. Where was the gentleman then? Where was he? Was he attempting to prevent corruption then? Quite the reverse. I understand that he instigated it; that he favors it; that he thinks it was right. Better that he should go home and endeavor to undo the mischief that he helped to do there than come here and assail Mr. Webster. There is one point in this connection, to which I must refer, and to which I hope the gentleman will give an explicit reply. I would recall to the gentleman's memory the year 1843, when he and myself were members of the same party, and when we got whipped, although having, as we supposed, a majority in the Legislature. It was a case of this sort: the opposite party got hold of a gentleman named Mr. Bell, of Montgomery, and induced him to vote with them by the promise of a commission as justice of the peace, a suit of clothes, and a promise of a loan of $400 in money. [Laughter.] At that time there was a great cry of indignation. The only question was whether it was true, and no living man undertook to claim that such things were right. The gentleman himself would have considered at that time that it was an outrageous proceeding. Where does the gentleman find the distinction between that case and the Massachusetts coalition of 1850 and 1851? Does the suit of clothes constitute the difference? Is it the commission as a justice of the peace, which he actually got, which makes the distinction? Here, in the corruption which the gentleman aided, and by virtue of which he holds his seat, it was not one justice of the peace, but five hundred justices, who were bought in open market. It was a clean sweep of governorship, attorneyships, sheriffalties—in short, of everything that flatters the pride and ambition of man; and it was all to be given, provided the leaders of the two parties would fall down and worship the golden calf of coalition. I wait anxiously for my colleague to point out to me the distinction between the ethics of the Bell purchase and the ethics of the coalition purchase.

I think it is Milton who says of the wars of the Heptarchy that at this distance of time it is as difficult to understand their objects and motives as it would be to understand the objects and motives of the fights between crows and kites. And it would be equally difficult for anybody at a distance from Massachusetts to explain—by the aid of the reason which God has given him—precisely how it was that two parties that occupied such exactly opposite ground upon the compromise question, could be brought up to the mark—the one to help to send to the Senate of the United States, for six years, a man who would during that long period profess and enforce with his whole power, doctrines which they regarded as denationalizing and disorganizing; and the other to lend its influence to put into power in the State offices of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, a set of men utterly and entirely opposed to them in all those points which they professed to think most essential. Well, I will tell you how it was. It was party hatred, and that party hatred leveled against the man whom we have heard vilified to-day. Nothing else but that could, I am sure, have induced the Free-Soil party of Massachusetts to take the course they did. From the Boston Commonwealth, which is the organ of the Free-Soil party—and it is my practice to read the papers of the other side more than my own, for I take it for granted that my own are always right—from the Boston Commonwealth, the organ of the Free-Soil party, I clip the following, which was the rallying cry for the last campaign, in the year of our Lord 1851:

"In the next place there must be UNION and EFFORT, CONFIDENCE and CONSCIENCE. No concession of principle, for none is required. To our Free-Soil friends we say—now that we wish to rebuke Daniel Webster, to sustain Charles Sumner, and to stamp upon the fugitive slave law, its framers and apologists, the seal of popular reprobation, the Democrat who is furthest from us is nearer than any Whig can be. To our Democratic friends we say—now that you wish to sustain Governor Boutwell, to retain the State Administration, to preserve and to perfect the reforms so auspiciously commenced last winter, the Free-Soiler that is furthest from you is nearer than any Whig can be. Let the spirit animate the allied forces, and victory is sure."

And this, Mr. Chairman, was the way they whipped us. Oh, glorious defeat! Oh, destructive and abortive triumph! Need I say, that I would rather be defeated fifty times in that way, than have one such success.

Mr. VENABLE. So had I.

Mr. DAVIS. But we are up within seven thousand of them. We stand shoulder to shoulder, and though outnumbered, I can tell my colleague we are not by any means subdued. I will state another striking fact in connection with this matter. It is well known that two years ago, before the election of the present Free-Soil United States Senator, and after the election of Mr. Boutwell, the Democratic Governor, there were some twenty or thirty Democratic members of the House who would have nothing to do with Mr. Sumner. What did the Free-Soil paper do then? It came out the very next morning after the first failure to elect, and said that Governor Boutwell must not make any changes or appointments to office until the United States Senatorship was disposed of. That paper well understood its men. There was the greatest state of excitement and the most anxious expectation until that matter was arranged, and the doors of the treasury were thrown open to the hungry. I remember an engraving after Landseer, in which a number of very hungry-looking dogs are squatting or standing on their hind legs, with watering mouths and terrible anxiety in their eyes, watching a meat-tray over which a very portly-looking dog is keeping guard. [Laughter.] There is a frightful similarity between the physiological effects of the animal ravenousness and greed represented in the picture, and the effects of the same passions upon a human subject. An English poet has well said:

"So, when 'dog's-meat' reëchoes through the streets,
Rush sympathetic dogs from their retreats,
Beam with bright blaze their supplicating eyes,
Sink their hind legs, ascend their joyful cries;
Each, wild with hope, and maddening to prevail,
Points the pleased ear and wags the expectant tail."

Well, there was something of that sort seen in Massachusetts. The pottage was savory, Esau was hungry, and the birthright and all went. [Laughter.] What, then, is the state of the case? Why, that these twenty-six thousand voters, concentrating their resentment, and leveling their imitation thunderbolts at one grey, historic head, making that their chief and leading object, and sacrificing every principle for the purpose of venting their rage on that great man, have succeeded, by moves on the political chess-board, in causing a surface expression of a state of sentiment vastly different from the state of sentiment which actually exists in Massachusetts. Why this rage against the Secretary of State? Because they choose to say that he has been false to the North. Upon that subject, on some proper occasion, and on some early occasion, I shall have something to say. It is not now the time to speak of his course of policy. My object is accomplished at this time in pointing out why it was that my colleague supposed that his course in relation to this matter would be regarded with suspicion by the House. For what Mr. Webster has suffered—if he has suffered anything—I do not suggest that he has any specific claim on any section of country, for I do not think myself, that he was influenced in his course by regard to one section more than another.

What he did, whether right or not in all its details, was, in my judgment, the fruit and result of the intense, glowing, passionate nationality which is engrained in the man, and which would lead him, I think, to endeavor, at whatever personal cost, to do equal and exact justice, under the Constitution, to every section; and perhaps it may be truly said, that his career, from the abundance of his vital force, and the pronounced individual qualities of his character, more forcibly than that of any other statesman of the time, illustrates the saying, that in applying principles to the changing affairs of life, the man who is true to his idea must often submit to the risk of being deemed inconsistent in his measures.

I cannot tell, Mr. Chairman, how much this sort of assault which we have heard to-day, is calculated to injure Mr. Webster. If I can judge from the experience of the past, from the feeling which I see expressed in the faces about me, or from the emotions of my own heart, I should say not much. However this may be, I comfort myself with the thought, that the man dies, but the cause lives; whatever he has done, suffered, and achieved, will live long after him in the annals and glories of his country; as the spreading tree bears testimony through its thousand burly arms, clothed with the fruits and leaves of a thousand years, to the care which nourished its early growth.

I believe that, on the whole, though there are some matters into which I would have liked to have gone more fully, I have touched upon those topics which I intended to have touched when I began to address this committee. I have this comfort, at least—and it is a comfort not to be forgotten—the pleasure of feeling, that, however inaptly, however bunglingly or clumsily I have expressed the sentiments which I have uttered, yet the pulses of one hundred thousand men of Massachusetts will keep even beat with mine in this matter, and that the hearts of the people will more than supply any inadequacy of expression on my part.

Mr. MEADE obtained the floor, but gave way to

Mr. CLINGMAN, who moved that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman [Mr. Jones] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 46, providing for carrying into execution in further part the twelfth article of the treaty concluded with Mexico at Guadalupe Hidalgo, but had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. EVANS moved that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HOUSTON. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw that motion, in order to allow the Speaker to present to the House a communication from the President.

Mr. EVANS. I will withdraw the motion.

THE MEXICAN INDEMNITY.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the consent of the House to permit the communication from the President now lying upon the Speaker's table to be read.

[Cries of "Read it!" "Read it!"]

There being no objection, the following communication was then read by the Clerk, viz:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit a report from the Secretary of State, and the documents which accompanied it, upon the subject of a resolution of the House of Representatives of yesterday, relative to the Mexican indemnity. MILLARD FILLMORE.

WASHINGTON, January 23, 1852.

Several MEMBERS. Read the documents from the Secretary of State.

Mr. ORR. I beg leave to suggest that these communications will all be published in the Globe to-morrow morning, so there will be no necessity for their being read now. I move that they be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be printed.

The question was put, and it was so ordered.

[The following are the documents enclosed in the message of the President:

To the President of the United States:

I communicate to you, a resolution which passed the House of Representatives yesterday, requesting me to transmit to that House "copies of the notes addressed to the Department of State by the Mexican Minister, M. De la Rosa, (on the subject of the payment of the Mexican indemnity,) in the months of February and March last; together with a statement of any information in relation to the same matter which may have been verbally communicated to his Department by the Mexican Minister, in regard to the wishes of the Mexican Government as to the payment of the money here; and a statement of the terms upon which it was willing to receive it." It is customary for such requests to be addressed to the President, and for the answer to be left subject to his discretion. The departure from usage in this case was probably the result of accident or haste. I know no objection to transmitting to the House a copy of Mr. De la Rosa's notes, but I think it proper that it should be done by your authority. All the notes called for by the resolution are herewith laid before you; and, also, in order that the subject may be properly understood, the note of this Department to Mr. De la Rosa, of the 21st of February last.

It is impossible for me to state, even if it were proper, what conversation took place between Mr. De la Rosa and myself on the subject.

Respectfully submitted,

DAN'L WEBSTER.

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the Republic of Mexico, has the honor of addressing himself to the Secretary of State, for the purpose of making known to him that he has been instructed by his Government to inform that of the United States of the fact that Mr. Edmund J. Forstall has advanced a sum of $400,000 to Mexico, which, according to agreement, must be returned in full to him when the next installment of the indemnity which the United States are paying to Mexico in pursuance of the treaty of Guadalupe shall become due. The undersigned incloses herewith to the Secretary of State a copy of the note he has received from his Government in relation to this matter, marked No. 1. The undersigned begs also to inform the Secretary of State, that the aforesaid Mr. Forstall has further advanced, on the same terms, another sum of $150,000 to the Mexican Government, as it is shown by copy No. 2, and another sum of $100,000, as it appears from the note marked No. 3, a literal copy of which he incloses to the Secretary of State. And although it is stated in the memorandum of this last note, that the sum advanced is $200,000, the undersigned believes that this amount was inserted through a mistake, and that the sum advanced is only $100,000, as will be shown by the respective certificates, which the General Treasury of Mexico has no doubt given to the party interested.

The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity to renew to the Secretary of State the assurances of his most distinguished consideration.

MEXICAN LEGATION, }

WASHINGTON, February 17, 1851. }

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the Republic of Mexico, has the honor of addressing himself to the honorable Secretary of State of the United States, for the purpose of informing him that it is with regret he finds himself compelled to occupy once more the attention of the said Secretary on the subject of certain drafts which have been remitted by the Mexican Government upon that of the United States. This subject is connected with the contract of Mr. Marks with the Government of the undersigned, for raising funds upon the mortgage of the indemnity which the United States are paying to Mexico.

The official communication which the undersigned has just received from the aforesaid Mr. Marks, in which he speaks of a claim for indemnification, which he believes himself entitled to present against Mexico, and the duty which devolves on the undersigned, to avoid the prevention of such claim, have reduced him to the necessity of treating once more with the Secretary of State on this disagreeable subject.

With this object in view, the undersigned thinks it proper to embody certain facts in this official note:

Before being made acquainted with the fact that the Secretary of State had made a contract for the payment of the funds of the indemnity, the Mexican Government had, on its part, entered into another contract with D. Isaac D. Marks, relative to the same payment, and had directed the undersigned to endeavor to procure from the Government of the United States the acceptance of the drafts which had been remitted, for the payment of said indemnity, which payments were to take place at the various times stipulated to that effect in the treaty of peace.

The undersigned had begun to negotiate verbally with the Secretary of State for the acceptance of said drafts when he received a note from his Government, in which he was told that in case the Secretary of State should already have been compromised in favor of any contract, not to offer any opposition on the part of this legation to any arrangement which the Secretary of State might have made—not at least in such a manner as to give any ground of offence by such opposition—but to persist in the mode which he thought most prudent in asking for the acceptance of the drafts, as this would be very agreeable to the interests of Mexico. The undersigned then spoke again to the Secretary of State about the importance which his Government placed upon the acceptance of the drafts, and endeavored to convince him of the fact that the interests of the United States would not suffer on account of this acceptance.

The undersigned remembers that in these interviews something was said—the connection of things rendering such allusions indispensable—about the contract with Mr. Marks; but the undersigned did not persist in going very deeply into this matter, for he did not deem it necessary, at any time, to make known the object of the Mexican Government for desiring the acceptance of the drafts.

While this was passing, the Secretary of State said to the undersigned, that he had reason to believe that this legation must have received certain communications from the Mexican Government, of which the Department of State ought to have been informed. The undersigned merely remarked, that he had not received the communications alluded to, but that as soon as they reached him the Secretary of State should be made acquainted with their contents. On the following day he received from Messrs. Corcoran & Riggs a duplicate of the communications referred to. The undersigned gave to the Secretary of State a literal copy of the same. As these communications do not inform the undersigned that the Government of Mexico had annulled the contract which it had made with Mr. Marks, nor direct him positively to desist from negotiating the acceptance of the drafts, he was compelled to believe, and he still believes, that although the Government of Mexico thinks it a difficult matter for Marks to carry his contract into operation, it does not consider it as annulled, and is always disposed to fulfill the same, as far as practicable, in the same good faith with which it stipulated it from the beginning.

The undersigned may have forgotten some of the circumstances which may have transpired during his interviews with the Secretary of State; he believes, however, that he has herein laid down all the most important facts that have occurred up to the day when the Senate of the United States received the information communicated through the Secretary of State.

The undersigned begs to inclose a copy of Mr. Marks's official communication. From it the Secretary of State will perceive that a very heavy claim may probably be brought against Mexico; and although, up to the present moment, said claim would be unfounded, yet it might assume the appearance of a just claim, if, by his silence on this occasion, the Mexican Minister were to induce the belief that he had in any way opposed the successful issue of Mr. Marks's proceedings, before the Senate of the United States, with a view of carrying his contract into effect. It is not the province of the undersigned to pass any opinion upon Mr. Marks's pretensions; it behooves not him either to support or to oppose them before the Senate.

As it was Mr. Marks, and not the Government of Mexico, who assumed the responsibility of procuring the acceptance of the drafts on the part of the Government of the United States, and as the undersigned has moreover received, on this day, fresh instructions from his Government, dated December 30th, in which he is directed not to press the acceptance of the drafts if, in his opinion, the abandonment of that object should be necessary in order to preserve the relations of friendship and good understanding which happily exist between Mexico and the United States, the undersigned desists entirely from pursuing said negotiations any further.

The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity to renew to the Secretary of State the assurances of his most distinguished consideration.

LUIS DE LA ROSA.

The Hon. DANIEL WEBSTER, &c., &c.

To H. E. Don Luis De La Rosa,

E. E. and M. P. of the Mexican Republic:

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: I have had the honor to transmit to your Excellency a copy of the reply of Mr. Webster to the resolution of inquiry of the Senate, calling upon the President for all the information communicated by your Excellency in relation to the drafts drawn by the Mexican Government on the Treasury of the United States, under the contract made with me by that Government, and the wishes of the Mexican Government in relation thereto. Your Excellency informed me by your note of the 30th ultimo, that you had had several conferences with Mr. Webster in relation to my contract, and referred the Senate of the United States to Mr. Webster for the information, which you had communicated to him in relation to this subject.

Your Excellency will see that Mr. Webster, in his reply to the resolution of inquiry, based on your said note to me of the 30th ultimo, has said that your Excellency has made no communication to the Department of State on the subject of the said drafts or contract. I have, therefore, to request that your Excellency will at once present the drafts for acceptance, and communicate to this Government the wishes of your Government in this matter, or that you will inform me of the substance of the conference which you have had with Mr. Webster in relation thereto.

I have again to inform your Excellency that all that is necessary to obtain the acceptance of the drafts, is that your Excellency will communicate the wishes of your Government, and that if such notice is not given and the drafts not presented by you officially, I will sustain great loss and injury, for which the Mexican Government will be bound in good faith to indemnify me.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

I. D. MARKS.

WASHINGTON, February 17, 1851.

Mr. Webster to Mr. de la Rosa.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, }
WASHINGTON, February 21, 1851. }

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of the 17th instant, addressed to him by Mr. De la Rosa, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the Mexican Republic. That communication appears to have been suggested by what Mr. De la Rosa calls information communicated to the Senate of the United States by the undersigned. This Department has communicated no such information. The Senate, by a resolution of the 10th instant, requested from the President all the information communicated to him by Mr. De la Rosa relative to certain drafts drawn by the Mexican Government on the Treasury of the United States. It is presumed that in adopting this resolution, the Senate was led to suppose that the President might have such information, and had that been the case, the request would probably have been complied with. But as the President had received no such information from Mr. De la Rosa, hereafter the resolution to this Department, with directions to the undersigned to report thereon. The undersigned reported accordingly, that no information, such as the resolution called for, was in this Department. The President transmitted this report to the Senate, with a message to that body.

The undersigned flattered himself, that after the expression of the sentiments of this Government, contained in the note of Mr. Buchanan to Mr. De la Rosa, of the 15th February, 1849, Mr. De la Rosa would have abstained from making a message of the President to either House of Congress, a subject of diplomatic representation. He has, however, thought proper to adopt a different course, and although the undersigned, for the reasons mentioned by Mr. Buchanan, might, without disrespect of the Mexican Government, decline to enter into a discussion of such a topic, he is willing, upon the present occasion, to waive any appeal to forms, lest his silence might lead to the inference that there is something substantial in Mr. De la Rosa's note, which requires an explanation or reply, such as cannot be satisfactorily given. That note is principally occupied with a statement of oral communications made to the undersigned by Mr. De la Rosa, relative to drafts of the Mexican Government upon the Treasury of the United States. The undersigned will not deny that that statement may be substantially correct. As he has preserved no memorandum of the conferences, he is willing to impute any inaccuracies to the fact, that Mr. De la Rosa spoke to him through an interpreter. The undersigned, however, is confident that Mr. De la Rosa said nothing respecting a contract between the Mexican Government and any individual, and he is pleased to see that Mr. De la Rosa himself is doubtful upon this point. Mr. De la Rosa's purpose seemed to be to bring about an acceptance by this Government of the drafts referred to. The transaction thus sought to be effected, seemed to the undersigned so irregular, that he promptly declined to have any agency in gratifying Mr. De la Rosa's wish. In adopting this course, the undersigned was actuated by the considerations, that he could find no stipulation in the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo authorizing the Mexican Government to draw bills on the Treasury of the United States, or authorizing that Department to accept or to pay them. It seemed to him that the relative rights and duties of the two Governments in regard to the indemnity due under that treaty, and the mode of paying it, were well defined in the treaty itself; that if Mexico desired a change in that respect, she was bound to ask for it in a proper manner through her accredited officers; that such a proceeding as that proposed, would imply either, that an alteration in the treaty had already been made, by competent authority, or that it was in the power of the Executive branch of this Government to make such alteration should that be the wish of Mexico. All this appeared to the undersigned to be objectionable and inadmissible; and Mr. De la Rosa will also hardly fail to recollect, that the undersigned, soon after he became charged with the duties of this Department, informed him that he could not entertain any proposition from Mexico, to change the mode of payment of the indemnities, as it stood in the treaty.

Mr. De la Rosa may be assured that, so far as any citizen of the United States may be concerned, the anxiety which he expresses lest the omission to accept the drafts adverted to may give rise to a claim against the Mexican Government which this Government will urge, is quite unfounded. The Government of the United States is not in the habit of prosecuting claims against foreign Governments founded on contracts. It has hitherto experienced, and continues to experience, sufficient difficulties in obtaining reparation from some of those Governments for claims of another description. If it should ever deviate from this policy, it will carefully scrutinize any contract for which its protection may be invoked. If it shall then find that the parties to such a contract had no authority to enter into it, or that its subject or the circumstances connected with it were such as it could not approve, any foreign Government which might be charged with delinquency, need not apprehend any advocacy of such a claim on the part of this Government.

The undersigned is gratified to notice that Mr. De la Rosa concludes his note with an expression of an intention not to pursue the subject further. The undersigned has no doubt of the wisdom and propriety of this determination.

MEXICAN LEGATION, }
WASHINGTON, February 24, 1851. }

The undersigned, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the Republic of Mexico, has the honor of addressing himself to the Secretary of State, for the purpose of apprising him that he has received his note of the 21st instant, relative to some information which has been communicated to the Congress of the United States, concerning the drafts on the Treasury of the United States, which the Government of Mexico had purposed to remit for the payment of the indemnity.

The undersigned was extremely solicitous that the aforesaid note of the Secretary of State had been of a character to put an end to all the disagreeable misunderstandings which the information alluded to, had occasioned. But, such not being the case, the undersigned finds himself under the necessity of addressing some remarks on the subject, to the Secretary of State.

The Secretary of State lays it down as a principle, that a message addressed to one of the Houses by his Excellency the President of the United States, cannot be made the subject of diplomatic communications. The undersigned regrets that he cannot agree with the Secretary of State in this mode of thinking.

The Secretary of State says, that he is certain that the undersigned made no mention, at the conferences held between them, of a contract made by the Mexican Government with a private individual, for the advancement of funds, by mortgaging the indemnity. The undersigned is sure of having spoken on that subject, and, being unwilling to trust to his own memory alone, he has questioned two persons connected with this legation, on the subject, who were present at those interviews in the capacity of interpreters. It is not strange that the Secretary of State should have forgotten what was said incidentally in regard to this matter: first, because it was not the principal object of the interview; secondly, because his attention was very little drawn to this point; thirdly, owing to the grave and multitudinous matters which occupy his mind; and, finally, because no memorandum was made of what took place at the interviews.

The undersigned might, perhaps, feel it to be his duty to say something in regard to other points, touched upon in the aforesaid note of the Secretary of State. He abstains doing so, because in obedience to the promptings of his own feelings and the instructions he has received from his Government on this subject, he desires to make this note as concise as possible, lest any phrase or expression might be misunderstood, and, therefore, seem offensive to the Secretary of State.

The undersigned renews to the Secretary of State the assurances of his most distinguished consideration.

LUIS DE LA ROSA.

BOUNTY LAND BILL.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, what is the first business in order?

The SPEAKER. The call of committees for reports.

ASSIGNABILITY OF LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. HARRIS. Does not the report of the select committee on the bill relative to the assignability of bounty land warrants come up in order this morning?

The SPEAKER. That is the unfinished business for the morning hour.

Mr. HARRIS. I will withdraw the demand for the previous question, which is the pending motion on that question, for a moment. It is very clear to my mind, from the discussion which this bill has elicited, and I suppose it must be clear to the mind of every gentleman upon this floor, that some legislation upon this subject is absolutely necessary. But gentlemen differ very widely as to what that legislation shall be. There is a bill upon your table upon the same subject from the Senate. I have withdrawn the demand for the previous question, in order that I may ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up the Senate bill and refer it, in connection with this, to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and to make them the special order for some day. Gentlemen admit the necessity of the passage of some bill of this description, but differ as to what shall be adopted. I therefore desire that both these bills shall be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to be perfected, in order that some bill may be passed as soon as possible.

Mr. TUCK. Some days ago I gave notice that I would make a motion to lay that bill upon the table. But I do not propose to make that motion now; I am willing to facilitate this business as much as any one. I have no objections to this bill being taken up in connection with the Senate bill, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; but I shall object to the two bills being made the special order for any day, for the reason that there is no more urgent necessity for action in this House upon this bill, than upon any one of the fifty others which will have to come up in their regular order.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I move to take up the Senate bill for the transfer of bounty land warrants, and that it be referred, in connection with the bill now under consideration, to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and upon which motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

A VOICE. Let us first dispose of these bills.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will not press my motion if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] wishes to first dispose of these bills.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not object. I only wish to make the motion that these bills be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and then let it lie over.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I insist upon my motion.

Mr. TUCK. If the gentleman will not insist upon the bills being made a special order, I will not object to its being taken up.

Mr. HARRIS. Well, I will not insist on it.

MEXICAN INDEMNITY.

The question was then taken on the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, in the chair.)

Mr. HOUSTON moved that the committee take up House bill No. 46; which motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly proceeded to the consideration of the bill to provide for the carrying into execution, in further part, the twelfth article of the treaty with Mexico, concluded in Guadalupe Hidalgo.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the pending question was on the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. MARSHALL] to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON,] and that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEADE] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. MEADE. I desire that the Clerk shall read the amendments.

The amendment of Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, was read as follows:

"And that said sum be paid over to the proper authorities of Mexico by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States under the supervision of the President."

The amendment of Mr. MARSHALL, of California, to the amendment was read as follows:

"Provided, That the President may cause the payment to be made at such time and in such manner as will be most acceptable to the Government of Mexico."

Mr. MEADE. Mr. Chairman, the discussion has been diverted very widely from the subject legitimately before the committee. My object in rising is to say a few words upon the amendment now pending. That amendment does not suit me exactly. I should like to have it remodeled; but the question now before the committee is the propriety of adopting that amendment.

Heretofore the practice of the House has been simply to make an appropriation, leaving it to the discretion of the Executive to discharge its duties in making the payments and in disbursing the money. That course is one which comes recommended to us, not only by the universal practice of the House, but also by that courtesy which should always exist between this body and the Executive of the United States, whether the majority of this body and the Executive belong to the same political party or not. And some reason should be given for departing from that practice in this instance. In doing this, we must necessarily advert to previous action of the Executive, in connection with this matter, for upon that depends the propriety of our departing from the general rule in this instance. But I must take occasion to say, that no censure whatsoever can be attached to the manner in which the Committee of Ways and Means discharged its duty in the last Congress in reference to this Mexican indemnity. I think it would be highly improper for the Committee of Ways and Means to report any appropriation bill like this, containing any restrictions upon the Executive, or any directions by which it is to be governed; because it implies that the Executive will not discharge its proper functions. For that reason, the Committee of Ways and Means did right heretofore in simply appropriating the necessary amount of money. The Executive, however, is responsible to this House and to the nation for the manner in which its duties are performed. If we disapprove the course of the Executive, we may then very properly direct it in reference to matters of a kindred nature.

This bill makes an appropriation of $3,180,000 for the payment of the last installment of the Mexican indemnity; and the question is, "How has the Executive discharged its duty in relation to the payment of previous installments?" I hold that nations, like individuals, are bound by the same principles of philanthropy and of morality, and when they can confer a benefit upon another without injuring themselves, they should do so. And as the man who should act upon any other principle, deserves to be expelled from the society of men and sent out with the brand of Cain upon his forehead, so should a nation be treated sinning in the same way. Whenever a nation can confer a benefit upon its neighbor without injury to itself, it is bound to do it. And that nation must be held responsible to God and man for the omission of that duty.

At the time when the payment of the last installment became due to Mexico, there were at least two bidders before our Government for the privilege of making that payment. The Barings & Brothers, and their associates, were one; and the Mexican Government, by its agent here, was another. If we gave the contract to the Barings and their associates, security was necessary. If we gave it to the Mexican Government, no security was necessary, because Mexico then became her own paymaster. There were two bids before the Executive. Though we are not officially informed, that fact is sufficiently authenticated for us to assume it to be true. At the time when the last appropriation was made, there was an offer pending upon the part of Mexico, to pay our Government four and a half per cent. for the privilege of paying herself. At the same time the Barings and their associates offered to pay three and a half per cent. for the same privilege. If we consulted our own interest, of course we should select the one by which we made the additional one per cent. If we were to regard the feelings and wishes of Mexico, we would, for that reason, have acceded to her proposition. Mexico was then prostrated, as it were, by a blow given by ourselves. She was bleeding from wounds we had inflicted. These considerations were powerful appeals to our generosity and feelings of good neighborhood, to confer upon her the benefits she desired.

Of course profits were to be made from these contracts, else there would have been no bidders, and the question was, whether we should secure these profits to Mexico, or give them to foreign bankers and capitalists? Now, I cannot concur with the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Edgerton,] who spoke yesterday, upon the subject of these bankers. They are, like politicians, necessary evils. The commerce of nations cannot be carried on without them. They must, however, be watched like politicians, and the only thing necessary for us to do, is to see that they do not abuse their power and influence. I do not complain of the Executive for employing them as agents. I have nothing to object to on that score. But I assume, Mr. Chairman, that it was the duty of the President of the United States, upon the mere application of Mexico, to have acceded to their wishes, especially when she comes with a bonus of one per cent. over every other bidder. If that had been the only consideration, the wishes of Mexico should have been regarded. But, independent of that, we are informed, upon authority sufficiently strong, that there had been a previous informal arrangement made by the administration of General Taylor to comply with the wishes of Mexico by accepting her drafts. Now, it is not my purpose, by any means, to charge Mr. Webster, or any other functionary of this Government, with corruption, in consequence of his failure to carry out the understanding which existed between the Minister of Mexico and the previous Administration. It is not my purpose to search into the hearts of men, or arraign motives, unless I can clearly establish them as bad. I take the transaction as I find it. The complaint I make of the Administration and of the Secretary, regards political errors alone. I do not pretend to examine into its moral delinquencies. Taking it for granted, that the hands of the Administration are washed of all corruption, still I must condemn its conduct towards Mexico. It should call down the censure of the House, and that censure must be expressed by restricting it, (contrary to the custom,) as to the mode of paying this last installment. The administration of General Taylor was fully aware of the distressed condition of Mexico; that she was desirous of anticipating the funds to be paid, in a short time, by this Government. We had failed, to a certain extent, to discharge our obligations towards that country, and the difficulties she then labored under were increased by such failure upon our part. We had undertaken to defend her from the Indians upon her frontiers. We had failed to do so. Hence greater obligations rested upon us to make the payment as soon as possible, and according to her desires. In consequence of the informal understanding of the Administration with the Government of Mexico, in relation to the anticipation of these funds, Mexico called her Congress together, for the express purpose of giving that authority to the transaction which she supposed the Government of this country would require. I understand it is a matter of history. I hope to be corrected if I am wrong. Congress did assemble, and give the necessary authority; and in pursuance of it, the Government of Mexico had made a very important and beneficial arrangement with her creditors, by which five millions of the sum we owed her was to be paid over to a class of creditors who agreed to take it, not only in satisfaction of that much of their debt, but of many millions more, and to reduce upon that account the rate of interest upon their debt. Here was another reason why the Administration succeeding that of General Taylor, ought to have regarded the wishes of Mexico as a solemn duty upon their part. Regardless, however, of the great injury which would result to Mexico from a failure to comply with this understanding with General Taylor's Cabinet; regardless of the fact that all the arrangements that had been entered into by Mexico with her creditors, (by which she removed from her shoulders an immense amount of debt,) would be defeated; regardless of the fact that she had offered a higher bid for this contract to pay this indemnity to herself, than any other person,—our Secretary of State undertook to change the arrangement, and put Mexico to the inconvenience and loss of negotiating drafts, it may be, at heavy discount, instead of at once assuring that Government, at the death of General Taylor, that the understanding which had taken place between it and the previous Administration would be carried out. Now, Mr. Chairman, what apology is given for this act? I understand from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the last Congress, that this thing could not have been done but by an alteration in the treaty.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I was not listening, at the moment, to the remarks, of my colleague, but a friend has told me that my colleague has stated that the Mexican Congress had been convened, and had agreed to this arrangement. Now, the statement of Mr. Green is, as I understand it, that they were convened to agree upon an arrangement with their creditors. And I desired, at the last Congress, that if there was any official information, that the Mexican Congress had sanctioned such a course, to have it printed. I have never been furnished with it, and I therefore take it for granted that it is not so. If the fact is so, we have no official information of it; and if it be so, it would have been easy to have furnished the information.

Mr. MEADE. Mr. Chairman, I took it for granted that the Mexican Congress had taken some action upon this subject, because it had not been denied, though it had been stated, and it was an important fact. But, however, suppose it had not—for I do not choose to contest a matter of fact in relation to this matter—suppose it had not, the excuse rendered by the Administration for not complying with the wishes of Mexico is, that it would be a departure from the treaty. When these propositions were made to the Secretary of State by the Mexican Minister, there was time then for the Mexican Government to have acceded to any condition that may have been prescribed by our Government. And the question at last is the same, why did our Government refuse to accede to the wishes of Mexico? If an alteration of the treaty in this respect was necessary to be obtained from the Government of Mexico, that fact could have been intimated by the Secretary of State, and the condition forthwith obtained from her. Mexico was too deeply interested in the present receipt of that money to have failed to do anything and everything which was required by our Government preparatory to the receipt of these funds. She would have called her Congress together, and obtained their express consent to a change of the terms of this treaty, so as to enable her to receive this money in the city of Washington or New York. It was well known that this change of place of payment would have been beneficial to Mexico, otherwise she would not have asked the favor.

We well know the difference of exchange between the city of Mexico and the city of London, between that place and this, and between New York and London, and that a bill negotiated from Mexico to New York, and then from New York to London, would bring a lower price than one negotiated from Mexico direct to London. Hence the object of Mexico was to obtain its funds in the city of New York. My colleague says the funds in the city of New York were worth about six per cent. more than they were worth in the city of Mexico. Then, why not have given that advantage of exchange to the Government of Mexico instead of securing them to the Barings? Certainly some profits were to be made. We had to choose between conferring that favor upon bankers in London and the Government of Mexico—why should we hesitate to give it to the latter? Feelings of amity and courtesy, which should always exist between nations—the directness, security and safety of the transaction, the freedom from all risk of bankruptcy of contractors, every consideration, conspired to favor the wishes of Mexico. Besides, the moral obligation under which General Taylor's administration had placed us, in regard to this payment to Mexico, required us to do it in the way she desired. Now, I do not choose to discuss the relative advantages to Mexico of this or that mode of payment, for such a question is entirely foreign to the subject. The question I choose to discuss is the failure, upon the part of our Government, to comply with the reasonable requests of a neighboring and friendly power, though, in the first instance, informally made. We not only refused to comply with that reasonable request, but we absolutely sacrificed thousands of dollars by preferring the bankers.

It was intimated, the other day, in debate, by the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] that we also had failed to do our duty, in not putting up this contract to the highest bidder. I admit, Mr. Chairman, that this House has failed to discharge its duties, not only in that particular, but in others, which I shall name. I should be opposed to the proposition suggested by the gentleman from New York, because I should be unwilling to put up at public auction the necessities of Mexico. I should be unwilling to have paraded before the world her difficulties and distresses, with a view of striking them off at auction to the highest bidder. It had, however, this merit, she would have been probably the best bidder. Mr. Chairman, something more was due from us to Mexico, than simple justice. You will remember the war with Mexico was branded by the party now in power, as one of plunder and robbery. Now, sir, if that were sincerely their opinion, then every consideration of justice, of morality, and of magnanimity, required them to seize every opportunity to repair the injury they believed their country had inflicted. Mr. Chairman, this House has not discharged its duties in respect to Mexico. Informed, as we were, of her necessities, we ought to have offered, two years ago, to pay the whole indemnity. We had at that time millions of our treasury lying idle and unprofitable, and we had already authorized the Executive to go into the market with our surplus funds, for the purpose of buying up certificates of the United States debt, redeemable fifteen or twenty years hence. While we were purchasing those stocks at a premium of fourteen or fifteen per cent., there was here a creditor, with millions due him in a year or so, carrying interest at six per cent., willing and anxious to anticipate his debt, and would have given a discount of four and a half, and probably more, for the prepayment. Thus, by selecting the debt of Mexico, amounting to six millions, as the one to be first paid, we would have saved the intermediate interest which we have lost, but also the fourteen or fifteen per cent. paid to the holders of stock having fifteen or twenty years to run. While I say that this House is certainly to blame for not discharging its duty in that particular, it is, however, not without the excuse that they are a large and unwieldy body. Members come here with their minds directed to some particular act of legislation. Each devotes himself to his favorite measure. It was necessary that their minds should be called to the subject, and let me ask, whose duty was it to direct them to the point?

[A message was here received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., their Secretary, informing the House that they had passed bills of the House of the following titles, viz:

H. R. 30. An act for the relief of the Virginia Woolen Company.

H. R. 50. An act for the relief of Edward Everett, late a sergeant in the United States Army.

And also, that the President had notified the Senate that he did, on the 23d instant, approve and sign the following bills of the Senate:

S. 71. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a register to the barque Ada.

S. 91. An act to provide a room for the Congressional Library.]

Mr. MEADE, (resuming.) It was the duty of the President of the United States; he is required to give information to Congress of the state of the country generally, and also to recommend the passage of such laws as may appear to him to be necessary. Now you will perceive at once, if the Executive had called the attention of Congress to the investment of our surplus funds in this way, we might have saved some eighteen or twenty per cent., which is now lost. We should not only have done that, but we would have conferred a great benefit upon a neighboring Republic, which would have tightened the friendly ties that subsisted between us, and prepared the way for acts of kindness which we may yet stand in need of. There were considerations which ought to have influenced the Executive, particularly now. We have to approach the Pacific coast by some route through the southern portion of this continent, and we were told that there were various eligible routes through the territory of Mexico. One lies through the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, and another down the Gila, where it is probable we may hereafter construct the railroad which is to connect the extreme shores of our country. In doing that, we may desire at places to cross that river, and we may hereafter have to call upon that nation to grant us some favor in this respect. Had we appreciated her exigencies and proffered to advance to her the deferred payments of her indemnity, we would have had some claim to demand of Mexico favorable terms in reference to this matter. This opportunity of enlisting her gratitude we have suffered to escape. We can now only redeem our error in part by passing the bill with the proposed amendment. We may thus be enabled to show to Mexico that Congress, representing the people of the United States, had their attention been properly called to the subject, would have been at all times ready to pay her debt at the times and in the manner she desired. There is no doubt that Mexico would prefer this money to be paid in New York. It would be worth more to her there than in her own treasury. Let us pay her there if she wishes it. We should violate no contract. If we had entered into a contract, legal or moral, with the firm of Baring & Brothers, I should be the last man to follow the example of this Administration in abrogating it. But here we have their letter, which disclaims upon their part any obligation to comply with it. In fact, they say they will make nothing by it, and that it will be difficult to comply with its terms in time for the 30th of May, when the indemnity becomes due.

Mr. Chairman, a great deal of concern is manifested by some that the bill should be passed as soon as possible, for the purpose of securing the prompt payment of the money. I have no sort of fear upon my part that this money will not be paid in time. It must be remembered that Mexico is now drawing from her mines from twenty to thirty millions of dollars annually—there can be no difficulty in obtaining there the specie necessary to make this payment. If we were to go there with three millions of Mexican dollars and tender them to her, and at the same time gave her the option to draw upon the city of New York, she would take the drafts; and that is what I propose to allow her to do. In consideration that we have acted, heretofore, a very niggardly part towards that Republic, I am very indifferent in relation to the premium. I care not whether the three and a half per cent. be realized or not. Indeed, the bankers in their letters say it is now too late to make a profit. I am anxious by our legislation now, to retrieve the errors we have committed in relation to previous payments; and I should be anxious to show to Mexico by our action now, that the people of this country are disposed to treat her in the most friendly manner. The objection is made that we should be violating the treaty with Mexico, in making this payment in New York instead of there. I will draw the attention of the House to the fact that the payments heretofore made, were not made in accordance with the treaty.

Mr. MILLSON. I wish to make an inquiry. The supreme authorities of Mexico having stipulated that this indemnity should be paid in the city of Mexico, I wish to ask my colleague if he supposes that the Executive Government can relax the treaty, so as to require or allow the payment to be made at any other place? And I further inquire of my colleague, whether in the event of any such modification of the treaty stipulation by the mere authority of the Executive Government, this money should be paid to the Minister of Mexico, or any agent appointed by that Government, and should never come into the Treasury of Mexico, if he thinks the Government of the United States would be absolved from all obligation to pay the indemnity a second time according to the treaty?

Mr. MEADE. I will answer the question of my colleague, by telling him, in the first place, that the difficulty in the first question he propounds could be easily removed by the authority of the Mexican Congress, and therefore does not interfere with the policy which I advocate. In relation to the other question, it is a mere matter of speculation or opinion. I think that the treaty with Mexico prescribes certain duties to be performed on the part of our country and certain duties to be performed on the part of Mexico, and that the Executive of each nation is to perform those duties. In this particular instance our Executive must pay the money, and their Executive must receive the money. The Executive of each nation may appeal to the terms of the contract and require a literal performance, but they may, if they choose, require only a substantial performance. These treaty stipulations are in the place of an umpire, to be appealed to only when a mutual accommodation cannot be effected. But you can comply with an obligation without pursuing the exact terms of that obligation. For instance, I owe the gentleman one hundred dollars. It is to be paid in the city of Richmond upon the first day of February next: could not my colleague give me an acquittance here?

Mr. MILLSON. I do not deny the right of the contracting party to relax.

Mr. MEADE. I understand the gentleman's question. I say, then, that I presume the Executive of Mexico is commissioned with the power of seeing that treaties are executed, and acknowledge satisfaction for those treaties. Suppose, before this indemnity becomes due, Mexico should pass a law remitting this debt, provided the United States should, before a certain day, pass a law admitting certain products of hers duty free: the law is passed: would the gentleman say that would not be an extinguishment of the debt, simply because we did not go through the forms of the treaty? Surely not. True, there are certain powers authorized to make treaties. There are certain other powers of Government authorized to acknowledge satisfaction of those treaties, and see that those treaties are carried out. Because we have agreed to pay Mexico three millions of dollars in the city of Mexico, surely it does not preclude a payment wherever Mexico is willing to receive it. Suppose the money should be paid on the 30th of May next in the city of Vera Cruz, at the request of the authorities of Mexico, would not that be a discharge of the debt? Suppose the Government should acknowledge satisfaction of the debt in something else than gold and silver—something else that is equivalent—would it not be a discharge of the obligation? Is it necessary that we should go there with a bag of Mexican gold or silver dollars, and absolutely pay them into the Treasury of the Mexican Republic? The last installment was not paid in that manner. Much of it was paid before the day, and the Barings have the receipt of the Government of Mexico. If Mexico required funds in London, was she not at liberty to take a draft in place of the money? and if the bearer of the draft were to convert the proceeds, could she demand a repayment because the money was not paid according to the letter of the treaty? A large portion of the last installment was paid before it became due. I call the attention of the House to this passage of the letter of the bankers, which was laid upon our tables yesterday:

"It will be perceived from the foregoing, that the contractors made all their payments to Mexico out of their own funds, and were afterwards reimbursed in the United States, at a date averaging the 15th of May, and the last and largest payment by the United States to the contractors of two millions of dollars was not made until the 27th of June, nearly one month after they had paid the full installment to Mexico."

It appears, then, that much of this money was paid out of the Treasury here before the 30th of May. The drafts for $650,000 in favor of Forstall were paid before the indemnity was due, and the Executive did for Forstall before the 30th of May exactly what Mexico wished it to do for Marks after that date. You see from the correspondence submitted to the House on yesterday, that $650,000 of that money was paid over to Forstall, the agent of the contractors, upon drafts drawn in favor of Forstall, payable here. The drafts reached here in the month of February. Of course those drafts were drawn in anticipation of the indemnity, and the Government of Mexico received the proceeds long before the money became due. The money was paid in the manner proposed by Mexico, the name of Forstall being substituted for Marks—the United States paying to the bankers one per cent. on three millions, or $30,000, for the substitution, exchanging at the same time the friendship of Mexico for that of the bankers.

The Executive of every nation is its paying and receiving agent, with general powers, and may be compared to any other agent with like powers. If the latter were to meet the debtor of his principal a week before the day of payment, and at a place different from that named in the bond, they might agree to settle; and though the agent should never account to his principal, the payment would be good; collusion or fraud only would avoid it.

The question is, shall we adopt the amendment, and thus signify to the President that we desire him to notify Mexico that her drafts will be paid here if she desires it?

We passed a resolution calling upon the Secretary of State to give us certain information. In voting for that resolution, I gave the Secretary an opportunity of clearing up the cloud which has been hanging around him. I gave him an opportunity of telling the country precisely how this matter stood—what had taken place between him and the Mexican Minister. If the charges and insinuations against him were untrue, he had an opportunity of explaining and setting himself right before the country. He has failed to embrace that opportunity. He has preferred that suspicion should continue to rest upon him. That is not my business. It is the Secretary's affair. It is true, he may refuse, if he thinks proper, to communicate the private conversations he had with the Mexican Minister, but the Secretary knew full well that we interrogated him only as to one point, whether he had been informed by the Mexican Minister that there was an understanding with General Taylor and his Cabinet that these drafts were to be accepted. That was a material fact. That is the fact which, notwithstanding the refusal of the Secretary to communicate to this House, does sufficiently disclose itself through the correspondence which he has given. And I presume there is not a gentleman in this House who would get up and say that he believes the Secretary of State had not been informed by the Mexican Minister of this understanding. It is not my purpose to charge the Secretary with diverting this money from improper motives. The charge is made, however, by others. Suspicion rests upon him in relation to this transaction; and if he chooses that it shall remain there, it is his business, and not mine. My accusation is, that he has not discharged the duties of his office in a way that the interests and honor of this country requires. He has wantonly lost money to his Government. He has preferred the interest of bankers to that of a friendly nation. He has, to a certain extent, been careless of the faith of the Government, and has failed in discharging towards Mexico those obligations of good will and courtesy which rest upon all nations. These are the charges which I make against the Secretary of State. The motives which prompted his acts, I leave to God and himself.

Mr. BROOKS. I wish to say to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MEADE,] that General Taylor's Cabinet made no such arrangement as that claimed here.

Mr. MEADE. I know very well that no arrangement was definitively made. It was altogether a verbal understanding. This, I think, may be gathered from the correspondence published this morning—

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I ask the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MEADE,] if he thinks that the Secretary of State ought to enter into a verbal understanding with the representative of any other country?

Mr. MEADE. I can answer that question. I say that no such understanding ought to be entered into as a final one.

Mr. STEPHENS. I wish to ask the gentleman another question. I wish to put it distinctly to the gentleman, if he does not believe it to be the duty of the Secretary of State, if a verbal proposition is made by a foreign Government, to reject it, and require the representative of that Government to make his proposition to this Government in writing?

Mr. MEADE. Certainly. If the Secretary intended to accept of a proposition commenced in a verbal way, he should require it to be reduced to writing; but if he does not intend to do it, no correspondence is necessary. Hence we find so little on this subject. But these verbal communications and propositions were made, as I stated before, to General Taylor's Cabinet, and they were accepted verbally, because no contract could be entered into before Congress acted.

Mr. DUNHAM. I think the gentleman will find himself mistaken in that. It has been distinctly denied that a verbal contract was ever made.

Mr. MEADE. I think it scarcely probable that the Mexican Minister should have been so importunate in his letter to Mr. Webster, if such an understanding had never existed. Now, all these things commence verbally; and though one would not be so bound as to be liable to a demand for failing to comply, yet a moral obligation may arise. And I say, and believe, that General Taylor and his Secretary gave Mexico to understand, that when Congress appropriated this money, they would pay it in the way she desired, and that they did not enter into a written understanding on the subject, because at that time it would have been improper. I say, then, that there rested on General Taylor, had he lived, an obligation to carry out that understanding, and that he would have been guilty of a breach of faith, if he had refused to do it. That obligation descended on his successor, and you cannot separate the two. I should like for some friend of Mr. Webster to get up and state why a different version of this matter has been given by him. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Davis] yesterday, when he got up in defence of his friend, [Mr. WEBSTER,] went off into collateral matters, with which this transaction has no connection. I ask again, why has the Secretary of State preferred the bid of three and a half per cent. from the bankers, to one of four and a half per cent. from Mexico?

Mr. STEPHENS, (interrupting.) I do not rise exactly in the character comprehended in the gentleman's term, as a friend of Mr. Webster in this matter; but I rise—not as his representative—to reply to the question which has just been propounded. The gentleman from Virginia asks, Who will rise here and assign reasons for Mr. Webster's giving a new version of this contract? Now, I do not understand that there is any evidence of any verbal understanding even with General Taylor's Cabinet, except what the Mexican Minister says.

Mr. BAYLY. The Mexican Minister does not even say so.

Mr. STEPHENS. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Meade] has just asserted a proposition which, I must say, very respectfully, seems to me a most monstrous one. He says that the verbal understanding with General Taylor's Cabinet devolved upon their successors. Now, that amounts to just this: that when one Administration goes out and another comes in, if any foreign Minister comes forward and says that he had a verbal understanding with the preceding Administration, that that alleged verbal understanding is binding on their successors.

Mr. MEADE. The gentleman does not understand me at all. I am speaking of the moral obligation on this Administration to carry out faithfully the promises of a previous Administration. Of course it should be satisfied they were made. I know that, technically speaking, they are not binding, but I say that there rests a moral obligation on this Administration—unless there is sufficient cause for refusing—to carry out the understanding had with their predecessors. Even if there were no promises, why, I again ask—

[Here the Chairman's hammer fell—the gentleman's hour having expired.]

Mr. RANTOUL obtained the floor. He said: I do not propose to enter at all into the general merits of the question before the committee; indeed, I would not have troubled the committee—as I am always very unwilling to do it—with any remarks of mine, if there had not been cast upon my native State an imputation so serious as to demand immediate notice from me. A majority of the people of Massachusetts are involved together in an imputation which, it seems to me, the honor of the people of that great State, without distinction of party, requires should not, when it is thus cast upon her by a representative of one of her Congressional districts, on this floor, himself a native son of hers, be suffered to pass unrepelled. The imputation is one of corruption—not, as I understand it, upon a few leaders of a single political party, but upon a vast majority of the voters of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts—of a State which has stood so high in the history of this country from the time when this country began to have a history, and which I am proud to believe has never forfeited her pristine rank in the glorious sisterhood of confederated States. That such an imputation upon the people of such a State should be noticed upon this floor as soon as it is made, seems to me so plain that I should think myself without excuse if I kept my seat under such a call to speak here. Sir, Massachusetts bears a name too resplendent with the glories of her colonial and revolutionary history to be questioned by her children. She has maintained her high standard of patriotism, and virtue, and honor, too long, too uniformly, too brilliantly, to have it supposed for a moment that a true son of hers would endure to see her fair fame sullied without rushing to her defence.

Sir, the imputation of corruption is made here upon two political parties, which the gentleman estimates to contain forty-three thousand in the one party and twenty-eight thousand in the other—a majority, according to his own calculation, of the voters who take sufficient interest in political matters to present themselves at the polls. That is the charge, and it is to that that I address myself. And first, let me answer as to that portion of those voters with whom I am directly and politically identified, and have been for more than a score of years, through a series, scarcely paralleled, of hard-fought battles—I mean the Democratic party of Massachusetts. But before going into the details of this matter, let me make one general observation, and I shall appeal to the knowledge and consciousness of every man that hears me, whether I am justified in what I am about to say, and that is, that if there be any political party in any State in this Union whose history places it above the suspicion of corruption, from its peculiar position, it is the indefatigable and indomitable Democracy of the State of Massachusetts; because there is no party in any State in the Union that has stood up against such odds, against such disadvantages, against such actual losses and sacrifices, as the Democratic party of Massachusetts, and every man in that party, has confronted and sustained for very many years past. Why, who are the Democrats of that State? The laboring men of the State, and some men of talent who are not laboring men, but who are not men of capital or property. And against whom are they contending? Against the whole aggregate mass of the capital of New England, concentrated in the eastern portion of the State of Massachusetts. That is the position of the two parties. Now, I ask, if there be corruption in the State of Massachusetts—and I do not deny that there is corruption, more or less, everywhere, in every State and nation under heaven—but if there be corruption in the State of Massachusetts, where is it? Prima facie the answer is a pretty plain one. The corruption is where the means of corruption exist. There are several hundreds of millions of capital piled up in and about the city of Boston. There is no other such aggregate of wealth in so few hands on the American continent; and if there be corruption there, it is that vast, unequalled mass of capital that purchases whatever is venal. This capital, like all other capital, is, by the instincts of its holders, adverse to Democratic principles. Conceive the effect of this on the position of political parties. The Democrats are mostly of the laboring classes. I do not say that there is bribery there; but I say that if there be, it is the rich that bribe the poor, and not the poor that bribe the rich. Upon that position, then, I start in this examination. The Democratic party of Massachusetts consists of men who stand up against their own individual interests; and this every man may know that will pass through that State, and not shut his eyes to facts around him. Is there an operative in a factory there who does not know that this place is less secure to him if he votes the Democratic ticket than if he votes the Whig ticket? Is there an agent in a factory who does not know the same thing? Is there a porter or stevedore on a wharf who does not feel his certainty of future employment sensibly diminished if he is known, nay, if he is even suspected, to be a Democrat? Is there a storekeeper there, not a Whig, who does not know that those who would be his best customers pass by his door because he does not happen to be of the same politics, and that the customers whom he gets in their place do not expend with him such large sums of money? Is there a physician or a professional man of any kind who does not know that he makes heavy sacrifices if he adopts and professes the so-called heresies that have been so unpopular formerly with the powerful in Massachusetts? Is there a lawyer of any talent, who is a Democrat, who does not know that he could quadruple his practice by simply professing to be a Whig? Clergymen, physicians, laborers, tradesmen—all classes of men make sacrifices by belonging to the Democratic party. No mortal man in Massachusetts ever made sacrifices by joining the Whig party, but tens of thousands of Democrats have sacrificed a large proportion of their means of support by standing up to what they believed to be sound, and true, and right. That is the position of the Democratic party of Massachusetts, and that has been its history from its commencement down to the present time. Against this party particularly is the charge of corruption aimed, and what is the ground of that charge? It is brought down to the alleged fact of a coalition.

Before going into the character of the alleged coalition, let me ask, are coalitions in themselves wrong? Is it wrong that those who seek a common object, should coöperate to effect that object? Am I to stop to inquire whether my neighbor thinks as I do upon all questions—all important questions, if you please—before I act with him upon any one important question? If the Capitol is on fire, and the engines in the Rotundo, and not men enough to man the brakes, must I refuse to fall in and help to work for the salvation of the common interest, and to extinguish the conflagration, because there happens to be a man at work there for the same object, who entertains different sentiments from me, on religion, for instance, the most important concern of man—he being a Catholic, and I a Protestant? Every man will say at once, that the man would be an idiot who would suffer his energies to be paralyzed by scruples against the coalition in such a case, though it might be a coalition with atheists and drunkards, polygamists and monarchists. I hold that, as a general thing, for those to act together who desire a great public object, impossible to be accomplished without their union, shows that they are men of sense and understand how to effect their object. What do all these men who cry out against the alleged coalition in Massachusetts do in respect of coalition among themselves? Do they isolate themselves? Does each man stand apart from his neighbors with whom he differs on any important question? If they did, there would be no parties in this country, from one end of it to the other, and no Government, for without combinations of men differing widely from each other, constitutions could never be adopted, nor governments carried on, nor even established, and freedom would expire in universal anarchy.

But to come now to the precise question raised by the charge of my colleague against Massachusetts: is a coalition between men who do not oppose the compromise measures, and the fugitive slave law particularly, with men who do oppose them, an unholy coalition? If it be, where and since when was that discovery made? Was it by the Whig party in the State of Missouri? Has Missouri been denounced again and again upon this floor, by Whig gentlemen, because the gentleman [Mr. GEYER] who holds his seat in the other branch of this Congress, was elected by a coalition, as I understand it, of those who favored and those who were opposed to the fugitive slave law, and the compromise measures, in the State of Missouri? Is it in the State of Wisconsin, where the gentleman nominated by a Free-Soil convention, and known to concur in their views, was elected, and the Whig papers, from one end of the country to the other, set up a shout of triumph at the Whig victory in the State of Wisconsin? The Free-Soil candidate of the Free-Soil party was elected, and hence it was, as one would suppose, a Free-Soil victory. But is a Whig victory a Free-Soil victory? Are they one and the same thing? The gentleman says they are not the same, but very different things; but yet there is no outcry of indignation against Missouri, or against Wisconsin for these enormities, but much applause, because a coalition has given to Whigs a share in the distribution of office and power. There is little to be urged against Ohio, or New York, or Georgia, but a great deal against Massachusetts. And why? I do not know, unless it is because her own sons contribute to heap imputations of dishonor on Massachusetts, on this floor, because the stab from the parical hand rankles most sorely, and stimulates the malignancy of strangers to follow up the blow and add fresh venom to the wound. I do not know why else she is made to bear the sins of all the other States—why else she is to be the “scape-goat” for all the other coalitions in the United States. Are not we in Massachusetts at liberty to judge of our own political position, and political course, as well as gentlemen in Missouri, or Wisconsin, or Ohio, or in New York, or anywhere else in the United States—in Mississippi, or Georgia, or any other State? Is it so clear that in any section of the country—East, West, North, South, or central—is it, I say, so clear that gentlemen, who call themselves by the same party name, agree upon these very questions? Is it so clear that, in South Carolina, or Alabama, or Mississippi, the Democrats all agree about this fugitive slave bill? Do not some of them say that it is constitutional, and others that it is unconstitutional? Do not some propose one course of action, and others precisely the opposite course of action with regard to it? Yet, day after day, with an insolence countenanced by her own sons, Massachusetts is denounced upon this floor, and no other State but Massachusetts—a State having a right equal to that of any other sovereign State in this Confederacy, to determine what she considers right and proper, and what course she deems best to pursue in her own domestic affairs, and for her own good government. Why, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] thinks he would not go to heaven with Democrats like those of Massachusetts—he could not bear to tread the same path. Sir, he has not trod our path heretofore, and we therefore had no reason to expect his company in the straight and thorny way at this time; but because he refuses to join us, we shall not the less firmly press on, and not the less safely arrive at our journey's end.

Massachusetts, I say, has the same right to manage her own political affairs, in her own way, with that of any other State in this Union. And she has not only the same right, but she has the same ability, energy, and determination, to maintain that right with any other State, and she will maintain it, at home and abroad.

But I am not going to take my stand behind the dignity of the State of Massachusetts, and say that she does what she pleases, and she will not give an account of what she does. I stand ready here to-day—what I have never done before in public, and what I would not do now, if I did not feel particularly clear and particularly free from doubt that I am doing right in what I am doing—to indorse the coalition in Massachusetts. I believe I understand what it was, and what it did, though I was not present at the time it was entered into. I was in the State of Illinois. But after my return I heard what had been done, and I am now in the condition of an impartial looker-on; and being thus free to take my own course, I can say, and do say, that I think it was eminently wise and patriotic in the majority of the people of that State to take the government of the State out of the hands of the minority, however unpleasant to the minority that proceeding might be.

Before proceeding to discuss the propriety of that movement, and of the masterly combination by which it was made, let me, however, inquire, for a moment, who it is that makes the charge of corruption against the coalition in Massachusetts? My colleague from the sixth district [Mr. DAVIS] undertakes to read lectures to the Democracy and Free-Soil party because they act together in Massachusetts. That is all. He has not impeached them for their acts, but only for their concurrence in those acts. He has not singled out any one act of those parties, except that of acting together. That he considers a violation of political principles. I have a right to presume that all our great measures were right, only that it was wrong for us first to agree to do right, and then to do it. He has not accused us of voting for any law or any resolution, but he has accused us of appointing men to office. He has not accused us of appointing bad men. He has not said that the offices are not better filled now than they were when the Whigs were in power. If he had, I should take issue with him upon that proposition. He has not designated one single act of these parties, but he has designated this coalition itself and per se as offensive to his political sensibilities.

And now, what does my friend from the sixth district mean by charging upon the Democrats a breach of political honesty in acting with those who agree with them upon certain particular points of action—in electing the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, and other officers of State administration, and in passing certain measures of reform, in which the Democratic party has been engaged for fifteen or twenty years past in Massachusetts, but which they had not accomplished, and could not have accomplished without the aid which he thinks they ought not to have received, when it was tendered? Does the gentleman from the sixth district believe that it is wrong for a Free-Soiler to act with a Whig, or a Whig with a Free-Soiler? To make my question more definite and more pertinent to his own position, does he believe it wrong for an Abolitionist and a Whig to act together? He must have undergone a transformation of heart and character as sudden, as entire, and as far beyond the reach of natural causes as that of Saul of Tarsus, and that, too, quite recently, if he does not believe such common action to be honorable and justifiable. Then why does he attack this coalition so furiously? This is a new thing compared with the old, standing coalition of the State of Massachusetts, in virtue of which the Whig party has retained its power for the last twenty or thirty years, by carrying with it the votes of those whose feelings towards the institution of slavery were not of a very favorable kind. They are the gentlemen, those influenced by their dislike of slavery were the gentlemen who kept the Whig party in power in Massachusetts, from the time when it came in by the amalgamation or coalition of 1825, till the time when it went out by the coalition of November, 1850, continued in January, 1851. If, then, it be wrong for a party opposed to the compromise to coalesce with a party in favor of the compromise, I tell this committee that such a coalition—such in principle, for this coalition in Massachusetts does not date only from the passage of that law—I say such a coalition has kept the Whig party in the State of Massachusetts in power down to the time when they went out of power. And a pretty prominent actor in that coalition was the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS] who charges the damning sin of coalition upon the Democrats of Massachusetts. Now, I am not in the habit of speaking in relation to matters of this kind without the evidence before me. Therefore, in order to substantiate my charge of this coalition between the Whigs and Abolitionists of Massachusetts, I shall single out the history of the gentleman from the sixth district in connection with this matter.

In 1835, my colleague [Mr. DAVIS] was a member of an anti-slavery convention of the county of Franklin, [laughter.] Massachusetts. Gentlemen will see that I have begun far enough back, so that my colleague cannot complain that I have not treated him fairly by not exhibiting his whole course on this subject in its just connection. I will remark that this was not a Free-Soil convention, but an Abolition convention. Some gentlemen may think the distinction rather a nice one; to those concerned it seems vastly important. This was a meeting of Abolitionists, for the purpose of organizing one of those anti-slavery societies, commonly called Abolition societies. The published account states that Mr. George T. Davis read the call for the convention, and was elected one of its secretaries. The organization of the society was proceeded with. A constitution was adopted, the second article of which defined the objects of the society, which was declared to be “THE ENTIRE REMOVAL OF SLAVERY FROM THE UNITED STATES.” [Great laughter.]

[Cries of “Read it!” “Read it!”] Mr. R. I cannot undertake to read all to which I refer, but the committee will be satisfied with extracts, for there will be a large number which I shall read.

It was a pretty large undertaking for a young man, but young men are always ambitious and sanguine. But it seems in 1835, my colleague undertook the entire abolition of slavery in the United States of America. [Renewed laughter.] I confess that it is somewhat more than I should have felt myself called upon to perform in the county of Franklin, in the year 1835. If I had felt a tendency that way, an inward call to that mission, I should have placed the bounds of my ambition within decidedly narrower limits.

The third article of that constitution pledges the members to “labor for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and in the Territories of the Union by all constitutional means.” A resolution adopted at that meeting declares that “slaveholding, as it exists in the United States, is SIN, and ought at all times to be regarded and treated as such.” And another resolution declares what my Southern friends will be glad to know upon this high authority, that “immediate emancipation would be without danger to the white population.” [Great laughter.] Of the society thus formed, George T. Davis was elected treasurer.

These were the sentiments of my colleague in 1835. In 1838, on Tuesday, October 24, “a convention of the young men of Massachusetts, who are the friends of immediate and universal emancipation,” met at Brinley Hall, Worcester. Perhaps my friend from that district [Mr. ALLEN] imbibed his principles there, and on that occasion.

Mr. ALLEN. I beg to say, that that meeting goes much further than I ever went or am prepared to go. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANTOUL. Then the gentleman from Worcester, it seems, did not learn his whole lesson, as the teacher [Mr. DAVIS] was then and there prepared to impart it. The proceedings of that meeting, published officially in the Boston Liberator, edited by Mr. Garrison, state that Mr. George T. Davis, of Greenfield, was elected President, pro tempore.

Then the committee to nominate officers reported—

[Cries of “Read!” “Read!”]

Mr. R., (continuing.) “The committee to nominate officers reported, and the following gentlemen were elected: President, George T. Davis, of Greenfield;” and then follow the names of ten Vice Presidents, and three Secretaries. Among the resolutions adopted at the meeting which elected Mr. George T. Davis President of this Abolition Convention, were the following:

“Resolved, That the man who sits still in Congress and permits our rights to be trampled upon and our lives to be threatened by Southern slave drivers, in silence, does not faithfully represent the freemen of free Massachusetts.”

[Laughter.]

I rejoice to know this from authority which cannot mislead me, because I am in daily expectation of that burst of eloquence which is to carry out this principle, from the gentleman from the sixth district. The freemen of free Massachusetts have at last a representative now who will not represent them in silence. [Laughter.] The next resolution is in these words:

“Resolved, That the Senators of this Commonwealth, Daniel Webster and John Davis, did so conduct, when that infamous threat of death to any Abolitionist who should set foot in South Carolina, was uttered on the floor of the United States Senate; that we regard their silence, on that occasion, with the deepest indignation; and that we wish we could say of both, as we can of one, ‘distinguished, but not born in Massachusetts.’”

[Laughter.]

My colleague from the sixth district, in the overflowing of his heart, thanked God that he was not obliged to confess that Daniel Webster was a native of his State. That is the meaning of this resolution. He wished he could say of John Davis, as he had of Webster, “distinguished, but NOT BORN in Massachusetts.” Here is one count in the bill of indictment against a learned gentleman who occupies a seat in the other Hall of this Capitol—that he stated that Millard Fillmore “had better never have been born than to have signed the fugitive slave bill.” Why should the member from the sixth district complain of that expression on the part of the gentleman alluded to, when he thinks it a matter of rejoicing that Daniel Webster was not born in Massachusetts? Why, if I wished a man had never been born in Massachusetts, or if I exulted that a man had not been born in Massachusetts, I would go a little further, I think, and wish that he had never been born at all. [Laughter.]

The next resolution is in these words:

"Resolved, That the people of the United States, and their representatives in Congress, are morally bound to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia and national Territories, and to prohibit the inter-State slave trade."

And another:

"Resolved, That all legislative enactments arraying the civil and military power of the nation against the slave, are an outrage on humanity, a violation of morality and religion, and therefore null and void; and that we will never return a fugitive slave into bondage, nor bear arms to keep him from his inalienable rights."

I do not know precisely what that means, but I should suppose it to include the idea that, in case of domestic insurrection in any part of this Union, these gentlemen resolve they will not take up arms to aid in the suppression of that insurrection. It asserts, also, that laws like the fugitive slave law are null and void by the higher law.

What comes next?

"Resolved, That it be recommended to the people of this State to petition the United States Senate, praying them not to advise and consent to the appointment of any person as a minister from this country to any foreign Court who is a slaveholder, because such representatives degrade the American name and character abroad, and make republicanism a hissing and a by-word before the civilized world."

[Laughter.]

This is almost a fair offset for the solemn league and covenant of similar proscription against non-sustainers of the compromises. [Laughter.] Well, sir, the other proceedings of that meeting are somewhat interesting, especially the resolution which speaks of "the visit of our dear friend, George Thompson, to this country." [Great and continued laughter.] And the resolution which assures him he shall "receive the support and countenance of the whole body of the young men of this Commonwealth"—I trust my friend has not escaped from that category, and is still one of the young men of the Commonwealth, young enough to countenance our dear friend George Thompson—"shall receive the support and countenance of the whole body of the young men of this Commonwealth, now represented in this convention." The Secretary was instructed to forward a copy of these resolutions to Mr. Thompson. William Lloyd Garrison seems to have taken a part with Mr. George T. Davis, in this convention. In the next year of this strange, eventful history—for I must follow it step by step—in 1839, October 23d, a meeting was held of the Franklin county Anti-Slavery Society; Elijah Alvord was chosen President, and George T. Davis one of the Vice Presidents; and in the afternoon, the President being absent, this George T. Davis presided. He was also a member of the business committee, and one of the resolutions adopted and reported by that committee was as follows. It goes rather strong, as gentlemen will observe:

"Resolved, That Abolitionists ought to withdraw all christian fellowship with slaveholders."

[Laughter.]

That is a denunciation of coalitions. Still it is a denunciation confined to matters ecclesiastical. The gentleman's practice shows that he had not then arrived at that sublime height of wisdom whence one may look down with contempt on political coalitions, for down to yesterday he was, though a zealous, thorough-going, consistent Abolitionist, engaged in a very close and confidential coalition with politicians who hold in common with him no one of the sentiments quoted from his various resolutions, as I will by and by show, if indeed it is worth the while to follow the matter so far.

It was also, on motion of Mr. Boies,

"Resolved, That we will vote for no man for Congress, who is not in favor of the immediate abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, of the internal slave trade, and opposed to the admission of any new slave State."

In the year 1840, my colleague from the sixth district was a member of the Senate of Massachusetts, and he was chairman of the special committee of the Senate of Massachusetts which reported those famous resolves, circulated over all the country, and so often quoted as showing the opinions of the Whigs of Massachusetts, upon the subject of slavery. My colleague, as chairman of that committee, made an able report, introducing the resolutions which were then adopted.

The resolutions were as follows:

"Whereas domestic slavery exists in the District of Columbia, under the express authority of Congress, &c.

"Resolved, That Congress ought to exercise its acknowledged power, in the immediate suppression of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

"And whereas, by the Constitution of the United States, Congress has power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and between the several States of the Union, in the exercise of which power Congress in the year 1808 abolished the foreign slave trade; and whereas, a domestic slave trade, as unjustifiable in principle as the African slave trade, and scarcely less cruel and inhuman in practice, is now carried on between the several States: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the domestic slave trade ought to be abolished by Congress, without delay.

"Resolved, That no new State ought to be admitted into the Union, whose Constitution shall tolerate domestic slavery.

"Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their utmost efforts to give effect to the foregoing resolves."

And the Governor was directed to send the resolutions to Senators, &c.

The report with which the resolutions were introduced, was signed by Mr. Davis, and I therefore conclude, was written by him, for I take it he is not in the habit of signing reports which he does not write.

In that same year, 1840, a bill was introduced into the Senate of Massachusetts, making a change in what is sometimes called the black code, the legislation regulating the rights of negroes. That change was a repeal of the preëxisting law, which forbade the intermarriage of whites with mulattoes and negroes. And that reform was brought about by the instrumentality of my colleague, from the sixth district, [laughter,] as he was the chairman of the committee that reported the bill providing for the change. That bill became a law; and I think I do no more than justice to the eloquence and talents of my learned and able colleague, when I say, that in all human probability, the young white men of Massachusetts would have been denied the privileges of connecting themselves with mulattoes and blacks, (in that interesting relation which the gentleman from the sixth district has opened to them,) down to this day, if it had not been for the disinterested exertions of my colleague from the sixth district. [Great laughter.]

On the 9th day of October, 1838, a meeting of the Anti-Slavery Society of Franklin county was held, and George T. Davis was reëlected treasurer of that Society. If there was corruption at that time the fund was in his keeping, and he may therefore have had better opportunities of understanding this question of corruption than most of his colleagues who have not had the fortune to be treasurers of abolition societies. Mr. George T. Davis was reëlected treasurer of the Anti-Slavery Society of Franklin county; and among the resolutions passed are some, which contain some rather severe remarks upon the honorable Daniel Webster, whose position then was not so far from that of this treasurer of the Abolitionists as it has been since; as it is now, when the treasurer thinks proper to form a coalition with him.

Now, down to 1840, I have traced this history. Down to 1850, has no change come over the spirit of the dream of my colleague from the sixth district? No, sir. No, sir! Judging from all public manifestations, I was led to suppose that the sentiments of my colleague from the sixth district remained down to yesterday, just the same as represented in the series of resolutions I have just read. If there be any public address, in any public meeting in Massachusetts, avowing a change of sentiment, I have not seen it, or read it, or heard of it. If there is any communication in any newspaper, magazine, or elsewhere; if there be any communication to the people of Massachusetts, who elected the honorable member, informing them that he did not entertain, when he was last elected, the same sentiments entertained previously by him—from 1835 down—I have never heard a rumor of them. There may be such; this part of the State is somewhat distant from my home, and I do not pretend to read all that comes out in the newspapers. I say I never heard a rumor, or saw an indication of any change of sentiment on this class of subjects, upon the part of my colleague.

But the convention that nominated my colleague for election to this place, ought certainly to know the truth in reference to the opinions of their candidate. They voted for him upon the supposition that his opinions coincided with their own, and they especially knew that they were voting for a gentleman so high-minded and chivalrous that he abhors all coalitions. Of course he would not receive the votes of those who differed from him. He would spurn them with a pure indignation. It must, then, be taken for granted that his party coincides with him in his sentiments. The inference is stronger in his case than in that of any other man; and if I find out what were the sentiments of the party who sent him to Congress at the time when they sent him, I shall find what his views were presumed to be at the time he was sent here, and that, too, by a presumption which he at least is estopped from denying.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The hour which the House had resolved to close debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the bill had arrived.

Cries, addressed to Mr. RANTOUL, of "Go on!" "Go on!"

The CHAIRMAN. The committee even by unanimous consent cannot, in the opinion of the Chair, disregard the order of the House.

Mr. RANTOUL. Cannot I proceed if there is no objection?

The CHAIRMAN. In the opinion of the Chair you cannot even by unanimous consent proceed.

Mr. ORR. Unanimous consent is given, and do I understand the Chair to decide that the gentleman cannot proceed?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. This matter may be quickly settled—I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. RICHARDSON. No! no! I should very much like to hear the gentleman through, but we must stand up to our rules.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will ask the Chair if, by unanimous consent, Governor McDowell was not on a former session allowed to proceed after the time had expired for closing debate? and if it was not done in several other cases?

The CHAIRMAN. Never when I was present. My recollection is, in the case of Governor McDowell, that upon two occasions the House refused to do it.

Mr. ORR. Let me inquire of the Chair, whether a proposition to reconsider the vote on the adoption of the resolution terminating the debate upon this bill was made and laid upon the table?

The CHAIRMAN. It is the recollection of the Chair that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNHAM] moved that the vote by which the resolution was adopted be reconsidered, and that that motion be laid upon the table. It was remarked at the time that the motion was unnecessary, as it had been reconsidered once, but the gentleman insisted upon it.

Mr. ORR. If the committee go back into the House, can the resolution be rescinded?

The CHAIRMAN. That is for the House to determine, and not the chairman of the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. Have I a right to debate my appeal?

The CHAIRMAN. No, sir; because the hour has arrived at which debate must terminate. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. HOUTSON,] who reported this bill, is now, under the rules, entitled to address the committee for one hour. After the expiration of the hour debate it will then be in order for five minutes' speeches, in explanation of such amendments as may be offered.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have this right certainly, and that is, to ask you whether an appeal cannot be taken from whatever decision you make sitting in that chair, and whether, if an appeal be taken, you are not bound to put the question?

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen were making inquiries, and it was not the intention of the chair to disregard the gentleman's appeal.

The Chair decides that the resolution of the House terminating debate upon this bill in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, being imperative and unconditional in its terms, cannot, even by unanimous consent, be disregarded. From this decision the gentleman from Arkansas takes an appeal.

Mr. STANLY. I submit that is not the question, unless unanimous consent is obtained. There were fifty objections in this part of the House. The gentleman from Massachusetts has not discussed what he promised to do—the coalition. He dodges the question.

Mr. RANTOUL. I desire to go on, and I will not dodge the question. The gentleman shall be gratified to the fullest extent.

The CHAIRMAN. There being objections, the gentleman's appeal falls.

Mr. BISSELL. I move the committee rise.

32d CONGRESS, 1st Session.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 28, 1852.

NEW SERIES....No. 25.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am in a very peculiarly embarrassing position, either in speaking upon the matters before the committee, or upon the main question that will occupy the time allotted to me; but I do not feel myself at liberty to resist the application that seems to come from all parts of the House to allow the gentleman to make the motion that the committee rise. It appears to me, however, that when we do get into the House, we will be in the precise condition that we are now. We cannot reconsider the vote.

Mr. BISSELL. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. ORR. There is no necessity for going into the House, for the resolution cannot be reached there.

Tellers were demanded and ordered.

Mr. BISSELL then withdrew his motion that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama will proceed.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I intend to occupy the portion of time to which I am entitled in endeavoring to call the attention of the committee to the issues that legitimately and properly grow out of the bill upon which we shall shortly be called to vote, and, if possible, present the subject free from all extraneous matters and influences. The circumstances which have just transpired have placed me in a position peculiarly embarrassing—the debate having wandered entirely from the question before the committee, and assumed a personal character. Such discussions being always exciting, command attention, while a debate which is pertinent to the question does not. Another cause of embarrassment proceeds from the fact that there was such an evident disposition for the speaker [Mr. RANTOUL] to proceed, when it was not in my power, nor was it in the power of the committee or of the House, if we had gone there, to have authorized him to do so. The committee itself must see that there was no other course left for me to pursue than the one I adopted. I was appealed to for a portion of my time—time granted to me under the rules of the House for the purpose of closing this debate, and which I feel bound to devote, or such portion of it as I may occupy, to a discussion of the bill and amendments before us. The usage of this body gives me—because of the position I occupy on one of the committees of the House—to some extent beyond what I might otherwise have, a general direction or charge of some of the most important bills that will come before the House for action; and I feel, therefore, a responsibility that forbids my yielding unnecessarily to a debate not upon the bill or proposition before us. The debate to which I was called to yield was not germane to the question before the committee, and if I had yielded to it, I would not only have abused the trust committed to my hands under a rule of the House, by making important legislation secondary to mere personal and party strife, but I would also have set a precedent which would necessarily have embarrassed me hereafter. Had I granted that request, I would soon have been called to grant a like one to the other side, or to a like contest between other members. And how could I justify myself in a refusal? Where could I have stopped?

Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose, if I can do so, to separate, as briefly as may be, the true from the false issues—the relevant from the irrelevant matter that has been brought before this committee; and in doing that, allow me, in the outset, to disentangle this bill from all extraneous matters of whatever kind or character. With the contest between the honorable member from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] and the Messrs. Green, of this city—with the contest that grew up a few days since between the members from Ohio—or with the contest that has been witnessed yesterday and to day between the members from Massachusetts—the question involved in this bill has nothing to do. Those things do not in any way pertain to the question under consideration. We are called upon to decide whether this bill shall pass with its present provisions, or whether it shall undergo amendment; and if so, in what way? In enabling the House to determine that question, it is not at all necessary or proper that we should settle any of the controversies to which I have alluded; they are not matters for our inquiry or action—they are in no legitimate connection with the bill now undergoing examination.

Mr. Chairman, a position was assumed a few days ago by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY,] that to some extent implicated the present Committee of Ways and Means, and to a larger extent implicated me as one of the members of that committee. I intend to direct my first moments to a reply to that position or suggestion, with the view of presenting the action of the committee of Ways and Means, as well as my own action, in its true light. I can satisfy the gentleman himself that we have done our duty fully. I feel satisfied that the honorable gentleman did not intend, by what he said, to cast censure upon any portion of that committee; but the course of remark indulged in by him has given a false coloring to the whole question, and has presented to the country an irrelevant, and, as I think, an unfair issue. He argued to show, that the Committee of Ways and Means had not discharged its duty, in connection with this bill, and that I, as chairman of that committee, should feel bound, in the proper discharge of my duty, to call in person upon, and obtain from the Secretary of State, information which would clear up the mist and fog, and obviate all the difficulties and troubles that seem to surround this subject. If I could have done that, Mr. Chairman—if I could have been successful in an enterprise so desirable, it would have been a pleasure to me to have done so. If I could, by any proper act of mine, have relieved the minds of the members of this committee from doubt, let the scale turn as it might, I would have encountered extraordinary difficulties to have accomplished so desirable a result. I am not here to make charges against the President of the United States, or any executive officer of the Government, nor am I here to defend them. It is my purpose on this occasion (from a conviction of its correctness) to advocate the adoption of a measure, which I have presented to the House as the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and I shall endeavor to show that this bill should become a law in its present form and with its present provisions. In order to do that, I propose to state the facts of the case, derived from authentic sources—from the Executive Departments of the Government, and not from sources which might seem to be interested or in any way biased on the one side or the other of the issues. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY,] however, substantially charges that the Secretary of State evaded the call which was made upon him by the resolution of the Senate at the last Congress. Then, if it be true that the Secretary of State evaded that call—a call which the Senate of the United States had an unquestioned and unquestionable right to make, and which it was the duty of the Department, in the proper form, through the President of the United States, to answer—if it be true, I say, that with all the authority of the Senate, the Secretary of State did refuse to give the facts—if he suppressed the facts, and thereby gave utterance to falsehoods—then, I ask, how could it be expected that I, or any other member of this House, could, upon his mere personal solicitation, obtain from the Secretary the facts he had thus wrongfully withheld from the Senate? If Mr. Webster evaded a proper, full, and truthful reply—if he did not state the facts existing in his Department, which were called for by the resolution of the Senate—he is guilty of a high offence, and one which Congress should punish, and the country should condemn. And under these circumstances, would it be reasonable in me to expect he would say more to me than he said to the Senate—in other words, that he would confess to me that he had withheld facts which he should have given to the Senate? How could I approach him? What should I say to him? Should I tell him that members of the House of Representatives believed he had not told the whole truth to the Senate, and that I had called to get it out of him? That would hardly do; for if he evaded answering what the Senate propounded, would my authority be so much greater than that of the Senate that he would disclose everything to me, regardless of the consequences to himself? He, of course, would know what use was to be made of his statements to me; and inasmuch as his statements given to the Senate are in writing, he would hardly contradict himself and thereby enable the House to convict him of a suppression of facts. He would know that any statement he might make to a member of this body in conflict with what he had said would be used against him, to show his duplicity. I am not charging these things upon Mr. Webster, but am arguing to show the singularity and untenableness of the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY,] I have always understood, and have not the least doubt of the correctness of that understanding, that the mode which either House of Congress should pursue to get information from the President of the United States or any of the Departments, is by a call of the House, by a formal resolution of the House desiring the information—

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I suggest to the gentleman that he extend the argument further, and say that the Secretary of State had no right to give copies of any papers in his office without the permission of the President. They are in his control, and he is responsible.

Mr. HOUSTON. Although that was not in the line of argument I had marked out for myself, yet I am perfectly willing to give it as my own opinion, that such is the rule which should govern such applications—the head of that Department, the Secretary of State, has no authority unless by sanction of the President. Calls upon that Department for information must be through the President of the United States, and not directly upon the Secretary; he has no authority to communicate to the public, or to either House of Congress, the secrets of State, if I may be allowed to use that expression, without the sanction of the President. What are the Executive departments of this Government? They are mere organizations for the purpose of enabling the Executive of the United States the more efficiently to execute the laws—of aiding him in the discharge of his important and responsible duties. In point of law, the President of the United States, then, is the responsible head of the Department of State, and whatever you may do in this case goes further than the Secretary. It reaches the head of the Government—the Executive of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, what are the duties of the Committee of Ways and Means in relation to appropriation bills? They are, as I understand them, that we shall examine and learn by what authority the appropriation is sought to be made, whether by law or treaty; that we shall obtain, if accessible, the information necessary to enable the House to determine whether the appropriation should be made. In the discharge of that duty, we have presented the treaty made between the Government of the United States and Mexico in February, 1848, in which, and from which, it appears that the installment of three millions, and one hundred and eighty thousand dollars interest upon such installment, becomes due upon the 30th of May next. Have we anything further to do? What further can we do? No one contends that that installment has been paid? Is there any other information which the House desires to enable it to pass upon this bill? If so, I would like some gentleman to make it known.

Here, then, we have satisfactory evidence that this money is due, and must be paid on the 30th of May, 1852, only four months from now, and that it cannot be paid until we make an appropriation for it. The treaty with Mexico cannot be complied with without the money; and to obtain the money it is necessary to make an appropriation, so that the Executive of the United States may be prepared to execute the treaty according to its requirements. Let me say a word further on this subject. Suppose I had gone to the Secretary of State and obtained information from him personally—and I will here say that I have obtained none of my information from that officer, or from any other person who is supposed to be implicated by the remarks of any member upon this floor, or suspected of wrong in this transaction: I have altogether avoided them, not because I supposed they would not tell me the truth, but because I preferred to speak from the record—I wished to leave no chance for doubt in the mind of any one as to the correctness of my statement: I have, therefore, resorted to the archives in your Departments; and I am sure that I am not mistaken as to the information I present—suppose I had gone and conversed with the Secretary of State, and had reported the result of such interview and what had passed, would it be at all likely that such course on my part would have given satisfaction to those members who think I should have pursued that course? The honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY,] who preceded me, as chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in his speeches states distinctly that he did converse with the Secretary of State, and that he communicated the result of those conversations to the House. Yet it seems that gentlemen are not satisfied; and would it be likely that what the Secretary might tell me would have a better effect upon their minds? Such a supposition is hardly a reasonable one. With the evidence, then, of that fact before me, I do not feel willing to become the medium of any unofficial communications from the Secretary of State to the House. We have a right to call by resolution, and that is the only mode we can adopt. In no other way can we hold official communication with the President of the United States, and we should never hesitate to adopt that mode when we think the public interests require it.

But further: the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] was unfortunate, in my view, in another thing. The gentleman seemed to press upon the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union the adoption of the call for information, but withheld it from the House. He was a member of the Thirty-first Congress, and at the first session of that Congress made a speech, of which his speech the other day was almost the counterpart, at which time he charged that these rumors existed, and, indeed, the whole tenor of his speech would indicate that his mind was not satisfied with the fairness of the transaction between the Executive of the United States and Mexico. He did not then, as I have been able to find, seek the information which he seems so much to desire. It is true, he said he tried to get it and failed. I do not understand that he called either in person or by resolution upon the President of the United States or the Secretary of State for it. Then who is most in fault, if fault exists at all? This bill was reported to the House and referred to this Committee on the 6th day of this month, and I have been pressing constantly to have action upon it; yet no effort was made in the House to obtain the information until some two days since, notwithstanding the gentleman knew that the House of Representatives (and not the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union) could legitimately make such call. The honorable member is a parliamentarian, and knows very well that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union cannot originate a resolution of that character; that the House must originate it; and yet he continued to urge it upon the committee, and seemed to desire, in his speeches, to put some of us in the position of endeavoring to suppress information—to smother inquiry and investigation; but, strange to say, he had not then made an effort to get the call in the House.

I think the gentleman was unfortunate in another view which he presented in connection with this bill. He asks why the Committee of Ways and Means have made this bill an exception to the general rule governing appropriation bills?—thereby charging that they have done so. I must say to the gentleman, in all kindness, that he is mistaken—we have not made it an exception. This bill merely proposes to appropriate the money; and that is the case with every appropriation bill, unless some special cause exists and is presented demanding something else to be done. You appropriate several hundred thousand dollars for the judiciary, and give no directions as to its payment—who pays that money? We appropriate millions of dollars to carry out our treaty stipulations with the Indian tribes, for the military, naval, and civil service of the country; but in none of the bills making those appropriations do we do more than we propose to do here—appropriate the money and place it at the disposal of the Executive, who is bound to execute the law. There we leave it, unless some reason is presented why Congress should do more. It seems, then, if I am right in this—and I am satisfied I am correct—that we have not made this bill an exception to the general rule; that we have done or propose to do everything that is usual to be done with appropriation bills, and no more. We have the power to do more, to go further, if a case is presented to require it; but unless such case be presented it would be both improper and unfortunate for us to intervene between the Executive and his duties, and thereby release him from responsibility or afford him a pretext for throwing an improper responsibility on Congress. The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MEADE,] who addressed the committee this morning, sustains me in this view. He says the Committee of Ways and Means could have done nothing but what it did do. Why? Because, he says, if the committee had reported a provision such as he and other gentlemen advocate, it would have been a reflection on the Secretary of State—an act which should be done by the House, if done at all, and not by one of its committees. If the House desire to reflect upon the President or Mr. Webster, surely it can do so; and the committee cannot be blamed for not having reported a provision that would have had that effect. I am not the advocate or defender of either of those public functionaries. No persons could be more antagonistic politically than I am to each of them. I do not propose, however, to occupy the time of this committee in either defending or charging them further than a frank and fair statement of the facts may go. I leave this committee to decide as it may see fit. We pass an appropriation for paying our foreign ministers, without directing in the bill who shall pay out the money. Who makes that payment? What department of the Government does it? It is left with the President of the United States. He, as the Executive of the United States, is bound by his oath faithfully, honestly, and fairly to execute the laws, whether making appropriations or otherwise. I am aware that he does not do it personally, but he does it through his executive departments, which are under his control and direction whenever he sees fit to exercise it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, (interrupting.) I desire to ask the gentleman if the payment of ministers, consuls, charges, and officers of that description, is not done by the Secretary of the Treasury, and not by the Secretary of State?

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman is very shrewd. I put a question to him, and instead of answering it, he rises and puts the same question to me. However, I will answer him. Those payments are made through the Department of the Treasury, upon a requisition from the Secretary of State, but also through the instrumentality of the Barings, as I am informed—those same bankers through whom the President proposes to pay the installment about which we are now debating. But I brought that matter up only for the purpose of showing that in our appropriation bills, after appropriating the money, we leave it, as a general rule, with the Executive Department, to be applied honestly and faithfully to the objects of appropriation, and not for the purpose of showing which Secretary did it. I presume no one doubts the fact, that the President has a right to employ either of his Secretaries, as his judgment may dictate. To make an appropriation is a legislative act. The Executive cannot touch the public money unless we authorize him to do it by the enactment of a law. He cannot draw a dollar from the Treasury any more than you or I, or any other citizen of the community, until a law is passed giving him authority to do it; and when such a law is enacted, it is his duty to see that the money is applied to the objects specified in the law. The application of an appropriation is, therefore, an Executive duty, and not a legislative duty; and to justify the legislature in making an encroachment upon the duty of the Executive in the application of an appropriation like this, there must be some evidence before Congress of fraud, corruption, or improper conduct upon the part of the Executive.

For these reasons it seems to me that the amendment of my friend from Tennessee [Mr. JOHNSON] should not be adopted, and if adopted, it will be of no avail. I understand his amendment to be, that the Secretary of the Treasury shall make this payment under the direction of the President of the United States. That is no more than the law as it now stands, only the President of the United States, as he had a right to do, has required the head of another Department, instead of the head of the Treasury Department. It would only substitute the Secretary of the Treasury for the Secretary of State.

Mr. BAYLY, (interrupting.) And Mr. Corwin told me, at the last session of Congress, that if the change was made, he should carry out the arrangement with the Barings, which had been made by the Secretary of State.

Mr. HOUSTON, (resuming.) If we were to adopt the amendment, what would be the result? The President has a right to employ whichever Department he chooses, to pay the installments running to maturity, unless we tell him that he shall employ one and not the other. He could make the payment himself, if he had desired it. Indeed, it is his duty to do it, if he had the physical ability, and at the same time attend to his various other duties. The wisdom of the country, knowing that he could not discharge all those duties, has given him executive departments to aid him. And it matters not which department makes this payment, the President is bound to supervise it, because the act is done upon his responsibility and under his direction, through the aid of the Secretary.

So then, if we should adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON,] we would accomplish no good for the country—at least, I am unable to see in what way the country would gain by it; and while we accomplish no beneficial result, we by that act interfere with the duties of the President of the United States, by directing him to do differently from what he has heretofore done and what it seems he proposes to do now. My friend from Virginia [Mr. MEADE] gave but one reason which can influence the minds of any one in favoring that particular amendment. I understood that gentleman to say that he wanted to adopt that amendment for the purpose of rebuking the present Secretary of State, because that Secretary had not consulted the wishes of Mexico in the payment of the third credit installment of the Mexican indemnity. Let us for a moment look at this matter. I am quite sure the honorable gentleman does not desire to do anything which would unfavorably affect the interest of the country. Then the question very forcibly presents itself, whether the amendment will result in any good? It is true, it may accomplish a personal object—to rebuke the Secretary of State. But if you want to rebuke him, do it directly, and not in this indirect manner. He is no favorite of mine, and has never been. I must say, however, that our action should be just and fair; let us not condemn him—let us not rebuke in advance of an investigation. Would my friend from Virginia be willing that we should take up a rumor of this sort, and without stopping to inquire into its truth, rebuke him without giving him an opportunity to be heard—to defend himself? I presume not. Such course would be repugnant to our nature. If gentlemen will prepare the issue—make up a case—I will go as far as any one to condemn guilt. When a resolution was offered in the House a few days ago by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BRIGGS,] proposing to institute an inquiry into the legality and fairness of the election of the Delegate from the Territory of Utah—whether he had not obtained his seat here by bribery and corruption, what was the argument used? and what were the indications of the sense of the House on that occasion? It was that the resolution implied a censure upon the Delegate, and that it should not be adopted without giving him an opportunity of being heard in explanation of the circumstances connected with his election.

Mr. MEADE. I distinctly stated in my remarks, that the amendment was intended not only to indicate displeasure at the manner in which the last payment had been made, but inasmuch as it had been made in a manner incompatible with the views of this House, if adopted, as indicative also of the mode in which payments should hereafter be made.

Mr. HOUSTON. We not only indicate the manner in which we desire the payment to be made, but we require it, if this amendment shall be agreed to, to be made in a mode different from the one adopted by the President. I feel sure, as I said before, that one of the inducements for the adoption of that amendment is, that it shall reflect upon the Secretary of State; for, if we transfer the payment of this installment to the Secretary of the Treasury, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] says the Secretary of the Treasury assured him he would adopt the arrangement of the Secretary of State; then what do we accomplish, except it may be to take an unnecessary responsibility, where no good can and some harm may result from our action. Both Departments are under the control and supervision of the President of the United States.

Mr. MEADE. The gentleman is mistaken. I will put him right upon this point. The question now is upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from California, [Mr. MARSHALL.] That amendment does not require the Secretary of the Treasury to do anything.

Mr. HOUSTON. What does it do then?

Mr. MEADE. It requires the President to so cause the payment to be made in the manner that shall be the most satisfactory to the Mexican Government.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I understand the gentleman from Virginia not to be in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON,] and to be willing that the Secretary of State shall continue to discharge this duty, and make the payments.

Mr. MEADE. I have no objection.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman has no objection to the Secretary of State continuing, but he desires that the payment shall be made according to the wishes of the Mexican Government. Now, I ask the honorable member, if he did not, in another part of his speech, admit that we had not now time to make any change in the order of things connected with the payment of the installment soon to fall due?

Mr. MEADE. I will reply to the gentleman, by saying that I made no such admission. I distinctly stated, that I believed that if we would signify to Mexico that we were willing to pay this installment in the manner which she should deem most advisable, that a contract might be made in thirty days.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman, as I understood him at the time, spoke of the propriety of a change in the treaty. But there certainly is not time now for the two Governments to make a change so as to allow the payment to be made differently—according to the wishes of Mexico—and I present it to this committee: is there sufficient time between now and the 30th May next for opening a negotiation with Mexico, for a change in the terms of the treaty? I do not understand the gentleman from Virginia as saying that the Executive Government of Mexico can make any change in the time or place or manner of receiving the money to be paid to her under the twelfth article of the treaty of the 2d February, 1848, but, on the contrary, that he agrees that there can be no substantial change made in the treaty, unless it be done by a higher authority than the Executive Government of that Republic. You must have the action of the treaty-making powers, before any material change can be made in any treaty. In this case, and in my view of it, we are bound to have at least the action of the Supreme Government of Mexico in favor of the change. Even that might not do—and anything short of it would surely avail us nothing. But I undertake to say that, according to my information, there is no evidence before the House, and there has been none since the meeting of this Congress—there was none before the Committee of Ways and Means—going to show that Mexico desires to draw upon this Government for this installment. Such evidence may have been before the last Congress; that is, however, denied.

Mr. MEADE. There is evidence before the House now.

Mr. HOUSTON. I should like to know what evidence?

Mr. MEADE. I will read it, if the gentleman desires, and will give me time.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not like to have my time taken up. I suppose it is General Green's circular to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. MEADE. No; it is contained in the correspondence submitted to us yesterday.

Mr. HOUSTON. In the correspondence submitted to us yesterday, the Mexican Minister says he conversed with Mr. Webster about the bills which he said his Government wanted this Government to accept. Mr. Webster substantially, if not in words, denies the statement. There is an issue; and upon that issue what can we do? Is the proof sufficiently conclusive to establish the fact; and if the fact be proven, is that enough to merit a censure in the absence of any previous indication by Congress that Mexico should be consulted and permitted to change the mode and place of payment if she desired? Admit, however, that at the last Congress it would have been better to change the mode of paying this installment, still the argument can avail nothing here, for circumstances have materially changed. Then we had quite twelve months in which to operate, now we have less than four months, and we must yield to the circumstances in which we are placed—we are controlled by the circumstances that surround us—and in the discharge of our duty we must make the best of what we have.

There is another fact which I wish to notice, and it is the action of Congress heretofore in relation to these installments. I believe this bill ought to pass, and I believe it ought to pass as it is, without amendment. I believe it, from the fact that we owe the money to Mexico, and have pledged our faith to pay it on the 30th of May next. There are other circumstances coming in to corroborate that belief. This subject was acted upon in the Thirtieth Congress, and at the last session of that Congress, with almost entire unanimity, a bill passed into a law providing for the payment of two installments: the one falling due in May, 1849, and the other one falling due in May, 1850. That bill passed with only eight dissenting votes. This bill contains precisely the same provisions of that one, leaving the money to be paid by the Executive. A bill upon the same subject, and with precisely similar provisions, also passed the first session of the Thirty-first Congress with but few negative votes. So the provisions of this bill have received the sanction of the Thirtieth and the Thirty-first Congresses—voted for by all parties and very nearly by all the members. All we ask now is, that we shall pass this bill as it is, without amendment. My anxiety to defeat all amendments to the bill grows out of my view of the best mode of advancing the public interest, and not for the purpose of shielding any individual, either in public or private life; nor do I agree that Congress must under all circumstances appropriate the money and leave it under the control of the President; not at all. If Congress should believe the money would, for corrupt purposes or otherwise, be misapplied, it would not only be competent for Congress to control it, but it would be its duty to do so.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] says that the last Congress, by passing the bill when these facts were before the country, adopted the arrangement that was pursued by the President; and if we pass this bill now, we thereby approve the course the Secretary has pursued and proposes to pursue. I take issue with the gentleman there. I intend to vote for this bill as it is. But then I repudiate entirely, for myself and for all these gentlemen around me, the idea that by so doing I indorse or approve what Mr. Webster has done or what he may do in this matter. If charges of fraud, corruption, or mismanagement be presented against Mr. Webster, then will be the proper time to examine into his course, and to investigate the conduct of the Executive. Then will I be prepared to go into that investigation, I hope, with fairness to all concerned, but with an unflinching determination to discharge my entire duty.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to repeat, what I a few moments since stated, that, by the adoption of this bill in its present form, we only do that which we have done heretofore, and that which we usually do in regard to all other bills of like character—appropriate the money to enable the President to carry out the treaty; and we by no means indorse the plan he may choose to adopt.

Mr. MEADE here made a remark inaudible to the reporter; but he was understood to inquire if the Government of Mexico would not prefer to have the money paid here; or deposited in some bank in New York, rather than to have it paid in the city of Mexico?

Mr. HOUSTON. I will reply to the question, and I will do it frankly. I presume I am in his condition upon that point, wholly without proof. I can guess, as he can guess; that is all either of us can do. There is no evidence before Congress, nor has there been this session, showing the present wish of Mexico. But then, even admitting that the correspondence just received shows that at the last Congress Mexico desired the payment to be made by the acceptance of her bills, that while that proposition was never presented in form to this Government, the very correspondence itself also shows that even if it had been, it has been long since entirely withdrawn, and is not now before us. If that is again brought about, it is to be done anew, and we could not safely act in the absence of proper authority from Mexico. And while I am unwilling now to discuss the question of the power of Congress over treaties, I am free to repeat what I have before said, that we cannot alter this treaty as to the mode and place of payment, by any authority short of the Supreme Government of Mexico—I mean that the Congress of Mexico must legislate, and give authority to do the act. I might be willing to risk a discharge under that authority, but I would certainly accept nothing short of that; and if we pay this money in any other mode than that pointed out in the treaty itself, without such authority, I fear we would not discharge our liability. There are other remarks I would like to submit, but for fear my time may be exhausted before I get through, I wish to call the attention of the committee to the facts connected with the payments which have heretofore been made. The honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY,] who is now at the head of the Committee on Foreign Relations, was inaccurate, to some extent, in his statements in regard to the payment of some of the installments which have already been made. I find, from an examination of the books and records in the Departments, that the first payment—a payment made in cash after the treaty—was made by the President of the United States, Mr. Polk, not through the Rothschilds, as the gentleman stated, but it was, to a large extent, made through the War Department. It was arranged by the Secretary of War, all except about eight hundred thousand dollars. I have some extracts here from official documents, which I will read. Eight hundred thousand dollars of the cash payment was made by the purchase here from A. Belmont of bills upon Lionel Davidson, of the city of Mexico. Those bills, it is true, as the gentleman stated, were purchased by Mr. Walker, and paid for in Treasury notes, dollar for dollar. But those Treasury notes were not at a premium at that time, or if at a premium, it was small. These bills were purchased in March, 1848, and before this Government knew certainly whether the treaty would be ratified in due form by the treaty-making power of Mexico. I will read an extract from a letter of the Secretary of War to Major General Butler, throwing light upon this subject:

"WAR DEPARTMENT, }
"WASHINGTON, March 30, 1848. }
"SIR: Should the treaty sent out by our commissioner be ratified, it will be necessary for the United States to make immediate payment to Mexico of $3,000,000. To meet this payment, you have been invested with authority to draw for that amount on the Treasury of the United States. Apprehensions are here entertained, that by a combination among those who would be able to purchase such drafts, or from some other cause, you might not be able to raise so large a sum of money on them without a discount, perhaps an exorbitant one. It has, therefore, been thought advisable to make arrangements here, providing for a considerable part of the amount which may be wanted."

Then follow the instructions to pay the proceeds to that installment. So if there was a premium on Treasury notes at that time, that advantage was not lost, because, in the arrangement which was made by Secretary Walker in the purchase of those bills, this Government was not to pay interest upon the amount until the bills were disposed of by our commissioner in Mexico, and the proceeds applied to our debt there. So that it enabled this Government to hold itself in readiness to pay, whenever the treaty would be ratified. And that was a contingency beyond our knowledge, and one which might not happen for several months. We could not tell when it would be ratified. The bills were purchased in that way. These bills were purchased in March, but the proceeds were realized in June. Upon the return of the bills in July, the Treasury notes were issued, but to bear interest from June, the time the money was realized, so that the Government lost no premium, or if it did, it was made up in interest.

Then, again, the sum of $1,151,874 16 of that cash payment was made through bills drawn by Major General Butler upon the Treasury here in favor of Nathan Clifford, then the Commissioner of the United States in Mexico. Those drafts were negotiated by Mr. Clifford, with Hargous & Co., who paid a premium upon them of $41,107 66. The balance of that cash payment was made by the use of money in the military chest—military contributions—and by turning over property of the army to the Government of Mexico.

[Here the Chairman's hammer fell.]

MR. HOUSTON. I think my time has not expired. I believe I have some six minutes yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has fully expired, and the question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON.]

Mr. DUNCAN. I have an amendment I wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order now, there being an amendment to an amendment pending.

Mr. DUNCAN. Can I offer an amendment to the original bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The two amendments pending are to the original bill.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was then taken, and on a division there were—ayes 91, noes not counted.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman of the committee [Mr. JONES] reported that the Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union had had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and especially House bill No. 46, providing for the payment of the Mexican indemnity, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, the House then adjourned to meet on Monday next.

The whole time from New York to San Francisco will take but twenty days.

By THOMAS M. HOWE: The petition of William Bagley & Co., Lyon Shorb & Co., and others, praying Congress to authorize the purchase of the remaining interest of private stockholders in the Louisville and Portland Canal, and for the construction of such additional work as shall be capable of passing boats of the largest class around the Falls of the Ohio river.

IN SENATE.

Monday, January 26, 1852.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. Butler.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Treasury Department, transmitting a list of the contracts made for light-house purposes in the year 1851, including those previously made but not received in time to be included in the last report of the Fifth Auditor; which was read and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DAVIS. I present, also, the petition of Albert Tyler and others, who represent themselves to be citizens of the county of St. Lawrence, in the State of New York. They represent, that in their opinion the construction of some artificial mode of navigation around the Sault Ste. Marie and the Falls of Niagara would be national works and of great public utility; that the country has reached in its progress a march of improvement which justifies the taking up that subject now. They believe it to be necessary, and pray that it may come under the consideration of Congress. I do not know that it is pertinent, but I will venture to suggest that inasmuch as this is a very grave work it would be worth while to appropriate some of the public lands to accomplish the great public object of getting round the Falls of Niagara. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The petition was so referred.

Mr. GWIN presented a petition of the working men employed at the Washington navy-yard, praying that pensions may be allowed for long and faithful services, and for disability incurred in the discharge of their duty; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, the petition of the widow of Ebenezer Brown, praying a pension for the services of her husband during the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have the petition of Joel Hickman and some forty or fifty others. They are Kentuckians, and they pray for an object which meets my cordial approbation. It is that the Congress and Government of the United States may take such steps in their relations and intercourse with foreign nations as will tend to establish a tribunal by which questions which have heretofore involved nations in war may be peacefully settled by arbitration, so as to prevent the evils resulting from war. I hope that it may be received and referred, without reading, to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWSON presented the memorial of William C. Daniell, against the projected improvements of the General Government in relation to certain obstructions in the Savannah river, and recommending the construction of a ship channel across Hutchison's Island, as the most effective method of overcoming the obstructions known as "The Wrecks" in the Savannah river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Owen on the Geology of Iowa, Wisconsin and Minnesota, be printed, in accordance with the resolution of the Senate at its last session, requiring the same to be printed under the direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office; and that five hundred copies of the same be for the use of the General Land Office; two hundred copies to be given to Dr. Owen, and three hundred copies to the Smithsonian Institution for distribution.

ADDITIONAL COMMITTEE CLERK.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution reported by Mr. WALKER the 22d instant, to authorize the Committee on Revolutionary Claims to employ a clerk.

Mr. WALKER. I will simply state that I reported that resolution in accordance with the unanimous instruction of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims. To that committee a clerk is absolutely necessary, in consequence of the increase of the matter that comes before them. They have much correspondence to attend to, and there is necessarily some traveling, in which they require the assistance asked for, if it is contemplated that they shall get through their business.

Mr. HALE. I want to suggest whether it would not be advisable, as a matter of economy, for the Senate to adopt the suggestion of Dr. Franklin as to the barrel of pork, and say the blessing over the whole barrel at once. Would it not be better to introduce a general resolution?

Mr. WALKER. I may make a statement by the authority of the committee. There are matters now before the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, involving about four millions and a quarter of dollars. Every case before that committee would, perhaps, if submitted to a court of justice, be an intricate and litigated lawsuit. We have to examine these matters; they involve in many instances an examination into the most minute portions of the history of the Revolution. To get papers from the departments, and have them properly certified, involves an amount of labor which I am inclined to think few committees in this body are called upon to perform. If these claims are to be reported upon in proper time, and in a proper manner, it is necessary that the committee should have a clerk. These are the considerations which have influenced the committee.

The resolution was adopted.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. CLEMENS gave notice that he should ask leave to introduce a bill to extend the benefit of the act to regulate intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers, approved the 3d of June, 1834, to the people of the State of Texas, and others.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. WHITCOMB, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the States of Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa, in aid of the construction of a railroad from the Wabash to the Missouri river; which was read and passed to a second reading.

BRIGADIER GENERAL TALCOTT.

Mr. SHIELDS submitted the following resolution for consideration; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to transmit to the Senate a copy of a letter from Brigadier-General Talcott to Colonel B. Huger, dated November 1, 1850, the purport of which was stated in the proceedings, but the original letter was not found until afterwards and forwarded to the War Department by Colonel Huger.

MISSION TO EASTERN ASIA.

Mr. CLARKE submitted the following resolution for consideration; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, the report of Mr. Ballastier, late Consul at Singapore, upon his mission to Eastern Asia, together with such of his correspondence and reports, including his negotiations with the Sultan of Borneo, as may be deemed of public interest.

LAND CLAIMS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. GWIN submitted the following resolution for consideration; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to communicate to the Senate a copy of such instructions as may have been given by the Department to the commissioners appointed pursuant to the act of Congress approved 3d March, 1851, entitled "An act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California," with a copy of such instructions as may have been transmitted to the Surveyor General of California in connection with the subject.

MARY W. THOMPSON.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Mary W. Thompson; and

On motion by Mr. JONES, of Iowa, it was Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to Friday next.

NON-INTERVENTION.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the resolution some time since offered by Mr. CLARKE, reaffirming the doctrine of non-intervention; and

On motion by Mr. CLARK, it was Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed to Wednesday, the 4th of February next, and that it be made the special order for that day.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. FORNEY, its Clerk, was read:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The Speaker of the House of Representatives having signed two enrolled bills, I am directed to bring them to the Senate for the signature of its President.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. signed the two enrolled bills this day reported to have been examined, and they were delivered to the committee to be presented to the President of the United States.

They are as follows:

An act for the relief of Edward Everett, late a sergeant in the United States Army; and

An act for the relief of the Virginia Woolen Company.

DEBATES OF THE SENATE.

The resolution to authorize the Secretary of the Senate to audit and settle the accounts of J. C. Rives, for reporting the debates and proceedings of the Senate, came up on its third reading.

Mr. GWIN. I hope that resolution will lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. BADGER. Why not pass it now?

Mr. GWIN. I wish to move an amendment. There will be no opposition to the resolution.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

RAILROADS IN IOWA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the State of Iowa, in aid of the construction of certain railroads in said State.

The pending question is on the substitute reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. UNDERWOOD addressed the Senate on this bill through the remainder of the day's session. His speech will be found in the Appendix. Before resuming his seat, he submitted the following amendment as an addition to the substitute:

Be it further enacted, &c., That there shall be granted to the States named in this section, for purposes of education and of internal improvement, so much of the public domain as is specified for each, that is to say: To the State of Maine, 583,040 acres; to the State of New Hampshire, 317,760 acres; to the State of Vermont, 313,920 acres; to the State of Massachusetts, 994,240 acres; to the State of Rhode Island, 147,520 acres; to the State of Connecticut, 370,560 acres; to the State of New York, 3,097,280 acres; to the State of New Jersey, 489,280 acres; to the State of Pennsylvania, 2,311,680 acres; to the State of Delaware, 90,560 acres; to the State of Maryland, 546,880 acres; to the State of Virginia, 1,231,680 acres; to the State of North Carolina, 753,280 acres; to the State of South Carolina, 514,240 acres; to the State of Georgia, 753,280 acres; to the State of Tennessee, 906,560 acres, and to the State of Kentucky, 697,920 acres; which land, so granted, shall be located in parcels conformably to sectional divisions and subdivisions, of not less than 320 acres in any one location, if so much can be had, on any public land except such to which a right of preemption may have attached, or such as is or may be reserved from sale by any law of Congress, or proclamation of the President of the United States; which said locations may be made at any time after the lands shall have been surveyed according to existing laws. And it shall be lawful for the Governors of said States, respectively, to appoint one or more agents to locate the lands granted as aforesaid for the State of which he is the Governor. Such agents, in making their locations, shall be governed by such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may from time to time prescribe, and when the lands for each State have been located and selected, patents therefor shall be issued to the State entitled to the same.

And be it further enacted, That the lands granted to the States according to the preceding section, shall be disposed of by said States, respectively, in such manner as their respective Legislatures may direct: Provided, however, That no portion of said lands shall be sold at less than $1 25 per acre, until otherwise authorized by a law of the United States; and the net proceeds of the sales of said lands shall be faithfully applied to objects of internal improvement, or to purposes of education, or to both, as the Legislatures of the States, respectively, owning the lands granted may direct: Provided, further, That all roads, railways, bridges, canals, and water courses, which shall be exclusively built, constructed, or improved, by the funds arising from the disposition of said lands, shall be free for the transportation of the United States mail, and munitions of war, and for the passage of their troops, without the payment of any toll whatever.

And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the agents aforesaid, or any one of them, in selecting lands and making locations for his State, to select and locate any of the alternate sections, or any part thereof, which may have been or may hereafter be reserved from sale by any act of Congress granting lands in aid of the construction of any railroad or canal whatever: Provided, however, That in locating any such section, or part of section, the State for whose benefit it may be selected or located shall be charged with, and the quantity of land granted to such State shall be diminished by double the quantity of acres contained in the reserved section, or part of section, thus selected and located. Nothing in the three last sections contained shall authorize the location of any lands granted by them, or either of them, within the limits of the State of California, or the Territories of New Mexico, Utah, and Oregon.

Mr. BADGER. I hope that by the unanimous consent of the Senate, an order will be made for printing the amendment of my friend from Kentucky, and that then the Senate will adjourn.

The amendment was ordered to be printed; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 26, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. Mr. BUTLER.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

CLAIMS PAID BY THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The SPEAKER stated that the first business in order was the unfinished business of Monday last, being a motion made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FULLER] to suspend the rules of the House to enable him to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of War, and the Postmaster General, be, and hereby are, instructed to cause to be reported to this House, as soon as may be practicable, full and complete lists of all claims, if any, (including principal and interest, and designating each separately,) allowed and paid, by the respective Departments, or any bureau thereof, since the 4th day of March, A. D. 1849, which had been previously presented, suspended, or disallowed, in whole or in part; and specifying the character of such claims; and also, that they cause to be reported the names of all persons who at any time acted as the agents or solicitors for said claims, and the persons who received any portion thereof, or were interested therein.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Maine, whether he will not so modify his resolution as to make it go back to the 4th of March, 1845? I hope he will do so, as I would be glad to have the information.

Mr. FULLER. If the gentleman desires, he can introduce another resolution to that effect.

The yeas and nays were demanded and ordered.

The question was then taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 134, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Charles Allen, Ashe, Averett, Thos. H. Bayly, Bartlett, Beale, Bissell, Bragg, Breckenridge, Brenton, Brooks, A. G. Brown, Geo. H. Brown, Buell, Busby, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Colcock, Daniel, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dimmick, Disney, Dockery, Doty, Dunham, Eastman, Edgerton, Faulkner, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Fowler, Freeman, Henry M. Fuller, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Gaylord, Gentry, Giddings, Gilmore, Goodrich, Gorman, Green, Grow, Hall, Hamilton, Isham G. Harris, Hart, Haven, Hebard, Hendricks, Henn, Hibbard, Hillyer, Holladay, Houston, Howard, Thos. Y. How, Ives, Jackson, Jenkins, John Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kurtz, Letcher, Lockhart, Mace, Mann, Mason, McCormick, McDonald, McMullin, McNair, Meade, Miller, Millson, Molony, Morrison, Murphy, Murray, Nabers, Newton, Olds, Orr, Andrew Parker, Samuel W. Parker, Peaslee, Penn, Phelps, Polk, Porter, Price, Richardson, Riddle, Robbins, Russell, Scudder, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Smith, Snow, Stanley, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stevens, Stone, Stratton, Stuart, Sweetser, Benjamin Thompson, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Venable, Wallace, Walsh, Washburn, Watkins, Addison White, Alexander White, Wilcox, Woodward, and Yates—134.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Allison, Barrere, Bibb, Briggs, Burrows, Caldwell, Chandler, Cullom, Evans, Grey, Harper, Haws, Hascall, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, James Johnson, Geo. G. King, Kuhns, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, Morehead, Outlaw, Penniman, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Schoonmaker, Scudder, Alexander H. Stephens, Taylor, Tuck, Walbridge, Ward, Welch, and Williams—36.

Mr. HAMILTON, pending the announcement of the vote, stated that his colleague, Mr. HAMMOND, was detained from the House by the severe indisposition of his family.

So the rules were suspended.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine, demanded the previous question upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I appeal to the gentleman from Maine to withdraw the call for the previous question, that I may move to amend the resolution so as to embrace the time since the 4th of March, 1835. I desire that this investigation shall be thorough. I promise to renew the call for the previous question, if the gentleman will withdraw it.

Mr. FULLER. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that he will fully accomplish his object by a separate resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The mode I desire will save a good deal of time, and I wish to avoid the necessity of consuming so much time as a separate resolution will require. If the gentleman is afraid of the investigation, he can persist in his refusal.

The SPEAKER. Discussion is out of order.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I rise to request my friend from Maine to withdraw the call for the previous question. I wish to suggest a modification of the resolution, and not to debate. After I make the suggestion, if the gentleman does not acquiesce in it, I will renew the call for the previous question.

Mr. FULLER. I will hear the suggestion.

Mr. BAYLY. The suggestion is, that the practice we are getting into of calling upon the heads of Departments for reports to this House, and thus treating, to a large extent, as independent branches of the Executive, is a very bad practice. The Executive is an unit; the President is the responsible man, and when we undertake to make these independent calls upon the heads of the Departments, we are giving them a consequence which the Constitution does not contemplate. In the early days of this Republic, they were treated as nothing but head clerks. They are now growing into a consequence, which I think is inconsistent with the spirit of the Constitution. That consequence arises, to a great extent, out of the manner in which Congress treats them.

Mr. FULLER. I concur in the main with the remarks made by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY:] but I do not wish, for reasons best known to myself, to concur in the proposed amendment in this case.

The question being upon seconding the demand for the previous question,

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, called for tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. HARRIS, of Tennessee, and CHANDLER were appointed.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 83, nays 69.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question now being, Shall the main question be now put?

Mr. MILLER demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. MILLSON. I wish merely to inquire if the House should determine that the main question shall not be now put, whether the question must not go over to some other day?

The SPEAKER. It will go over until Monday next.

The question was then taken, and there were—yeas 125, nays 63; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, Charles Allen, Willis Allen, Andrews, John Appleton, Ashe, Averett, Babcock, Thomas H. Bayly, Bartlett, Beale, Bissell, Boeck, Bragg, Brenton, Albert G. Brown, Buell, Busby, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Churchill, Clark, Cobb, Colcock, Curtis, Daniel, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dimmick, Disney, Doty, Dunham, Durkee, Eastman, Edgerton, Edmundson, Faulkner, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Henry M. Fuller, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Gaylord, Gentry, Giddings, Gilmore, Gorman, Green, Grow, Hall, Hamilton, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Hart, Hendricks, Henn, Hibbard, Hillyer, Holladay, Houston, Howard, Thos. Y. How, Ingersoll, Ives, Jackson, Jenkins, Andrew Johnson, John Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kurtz, Letcher, Lockhart, Mace, Mann, Edward C. Marshall, Mason, McCormick, McDonald, McLanahan, McMullin, McNair, Meade, Millson, Morrison, Murphy, Murray, Nabers, Olds, Orr, Andrew Parker, Peaslee, Penn, Phelps, Polk, Price, Richardson, Riddle, Robbins, Robinson, Russell, Scudder, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Smith, Snow, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stevens, Stone, St. Martin, Stratton, Stuart, Sweetser, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Wallace, Wilcox, and Woodward—125.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Barrere, Bell, Bibb, Briggs, Bowne, Brooks, George H. Brown, Burrows, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Chandler, Clingman, Cullom, Dockery, Duncan, Evans, Fowler, Goodrich, Grey, Harper, Haws, Hascall, Haven, Hebard, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, James Johnson, Geo. G. King, Kuhns, Martin, Miller, Miner, Morehead, Newton, Outlaw, Samuel W. Parker, Penniman, Perkins, Porter, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Schoonmaker, Scudder, Stanley, Benjamin Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Strother, Taylor, Benjamin Thompson, Walbridge, Walsh, Ward, Washburn, Watkins, Welch, Wells, Addison White, Alexander White, Williams, and Yates—63.

So it was ordered that the main question be now put.

Mr. MEADE. I understand that the mover of the resolution is willing to accept the modification suggested by my colleague, [Mr. BAYLY:] and give the resolution a different direction, that is, instead of having it directed to the heads of the Departments respectively, to direct it to the President of the United States. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow of the modification.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio, objected.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

ASSIGNABILITY OF LAND WARRANTS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to consider now the motion pending, to refer the report of the select committee, and also the bill from the Senate making bounty land warrants assignable, to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that they be made the special order for Wednesday next, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. CARTTER objected.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the rules be suspended for the purpose.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I request my colleague [Mr. HARRIS] to make it Thursday. The Mexican indemnity bill, and the bill to pay the expenses of bringing back the American citizens who have been liberated in Spain are yet undisposed of. It is important that these bills should be acted upon without delay.

Mr. HARRIS. I will adopt the suggestion of my colleague to make it the special order for Thursday next.

The question was then taken, and the rules were suspended.

The question then recurred on the proposition to refer, and make the bills the special order for Thursday next.

Mr. JENKINS. Will a division of the question be in order?

The SPEAKER. It will, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. JENKINS. I then ask for such division.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, demanded the previous question; which received a second, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The SPEAKER. The question will be first upon referring the two bills specified to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I understood the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] was to take up and make them the special order for next Thursday.

The SPEAKER. That question will recur after the motion to refer is disposed of.

The titles of the bills were then read as follows: Senate bill entitled "An act to make land warrants assignable and for other purposes," and the resolution of the House explanatory of an act approved September 28th, 1850, entitled "An act granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States."

Mr. ORR. I desire to inquire of the Chair if the Senate bill has received two readings in this House?

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. On Saturday, the Journal will show, it was read twice, and a motion was made to refer.

The SPEAKER. By the unanimous consent of the House, it was taken up and read twice on Saturday. It was constructively so.

Mr. ORR. I only wanted to have it read twice.

The question was then taken on the motion to refer, and it was agreed to.

So the bills were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HARRIS. Is the previous question exhausted?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. HARRIS. Was there a motion to print included in this motion?

The SPEAKER. There was not.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to have them printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be so ordered.

The question was then taken on the second branch of the proposition, to make these bills the special order for Thursday next, and it was agreed to.

So the bills were referred and made the special order for Thursday next.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, moved to reconsider the vote by which these bills were made the special order for Thursday next, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN MR. KOSSUTH AND CAPTAIN LONG.

Mr. SMITH asked the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to furnish this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, all the correspondence between Captain Long, of the United States frigate Mississippi, and Mr. Kossuth, growing out of an alleged difficulty or misunderstanding between the said Captain Long and the said Kossuth; and also, the collateral correspondence, including the letters of and to Commodore Morgan and Consul Hodge, arising upon the said misunderstanding and connected therewith.

Mr. BELL inquired if this was not resolution day.

The SPEAKER replied that it was, but that it was also competent to suspend the rules of the House.

Mr. GIDDINGS objected to the resolution, and called for the regular order of business.

Mr. SMITH moved to suspend the rules, to enable him to introduce the resolution.

The motion was agreed to, and the rules were suspended.

The question now being upon the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. SMITH demanded the previous question.

Mr. CARTER. I wish the gentleman would alter his resolution so as to embrace the correspondence of the other officers of the Mississippi. I do not think it now embraces that correspondence.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; it embraces the whole.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered on the adoption of the resolution.

And, the question being taken, the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH moved to reconsider the vote on the adoption of the resolution, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BARRERE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported back, as correctly enrolled, an act for the relief of Edward Everett; and an act for the relief of the Virginia Woolen Company.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. HOUSTON. My purpose is to move to suspend the rules, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

[Cries of "Oh, no!" and "Let us have the call for resolutions!"]

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to make a suggestion in connection with the business of the House for to-day. It must be very evident to every gentleman here, that if we are to proceed as we are now doing we shall accomplish very little. Now, if by general consent, and each member will stand to it, we can receive resolutions and bills and petitions, and let them be referred; and all that give rise to debate be rejected, I would be willing to go on with that sort of business, and let every member clear out his drawer. If the States can be called, I am willing to have it done; but directly I yield the floor for that purpose, some gentleman will rise and move to suspend the rules, and thus the whole day will be lost. I am perfectly willing, however, if the House will agree to it, that the States shall be called for resolutions.

PRINTING OF THE CENSUS.

Mr. GORMAN, from the Committee on Public Printing, reported the following joint resolution:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the joint committee on printing be directed to contract with Messrs. Donelson & Armstrong for printing and binding the Census on such terms as they may think reasonable and proper, the work to be executed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and to be paid for as it progresses by the head of the Census Bureau, with power to abate from the amount stipulated if the work when executed shall prove deficient or below the standard which may be agreed upon.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. GORMAN said: Some considerable anxiety has been manifested by the Census Board, by the Superintendent of the Census, and by the House, upon the subject of this census report. I will say to the House, that the Joint Committee on Printing this morning unanimously passed a resolution that the public printer had not complied with his contract in regard to the materials. This printing is required by almost every member, and I am from day to day—I will not say annoyed, for that would be incorrect, improper, and perhaps indelicate—but it is insisted upon me that I shall do something to expedite this printing. In addition to the anxiety manifested by the members of the House, the Secretary of the Interior has been a good deal annoyed by the manner in which he has been unable to get this printing forward. The Superintendent is also exceedingly solicitous for action upon this subject. I apprehend that at first blush, gentlemen would be under the impression that this printing belonged to the public contractor; but by a reference to the acts of Congress of 1851, it will be seen that it was therein prescribed that the preparatory and preliminary printing, such as the forms and so forth, should be prepared and printed under the direction of the Census Board, and all the other printing connected with the census, as Congress may direct. So that question is not even debatable. There was not one single member of the committee, of either party, who was not clearly of the opinion that this printing does not come within the contract with the public printer.

This joint resolution is offered for the consideration of the House, for the purpose of expediting the printing of the census. It has been before the Senate, but has been postponed by that body for a week or ten days, for the reason that certain statistical and historical accounts of the several States were being given which some of the Senators conceived to be in violation of the original census law. Now, after a full investigation of the subject, I am thoroughly satisfied that the express language and letter of the law authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to do precisely what he has done. It may seem strange that they should adopt something like an historical account of each county in the respective States; yet it is, in my opinion, highly proper; and I apprehend that the law clearly gives the Secretary of the Interior authority to adopt such a form as he may prescribe. It gives him a kind of blank authority, and in his annual report he has alluded to this.

It is unnecessary for me at present to add a single remark, except that gentlemen need be under no apprehension that, under the law passed by the last Congress, this order of the House, if it passes, will conflict in the slightest degree with the contract of the public printer.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Printing [Mr. GORMAN]—and I have no doubt he will take pleasure in answering the inquiry—what has been done in relation to the printing of the abstract of the Census, which were ordered last week? Gentlemen will recollect that a resolution was adopted last Monday, authorizing the Committee on Printing to contract for the printing of one hundred thousand copies of the report of the Superintendent of the Census; a report which was published the 1st of January in the Globe. I desire to know what has been done in regard to that matter?

Mr. GORMAN. I will answer the gentleman. That subject was before the Committee on Printing. I addressed a note to the public printer. I called upon Mr. Rives, and I also addressed a note to Donelson & Armstrong. Mr. Rives did not desire to have anything to do with the matter if it came in the least in conflict with the contract of the public printer. Although he had it in type, he did not wish to print it, until it was directly ascertained by the Committee on Printing that it did not interfere with the contract of the public printer. The reason assigned by him was, that he did not wish to be considered as throwing any obstacle in the way of the public printer's carrying out his contract. He therefore declined for the present, until further action by the committee. Messrs. Donelson & Armstrong also declined to do the job. I shall this evening, I presume, if the other members of the committee concur with me, order the printing to be done; and the document will be furnished to the House in a few days.

Mr. EVANS. It is pretty well known in this House of Representatives that there has been no single thing in its history for many years past which has been a more fruitful source of corruption, and a more fruitful source of dissension—nothing has been so entirely covered up from the notice of members—nothing has been so wholly excluded, and yet so badly executed, as this very public printing. It has, I believe, generally been taken by both political parties as a prolific job, for the sake of supporting partisan purposes and partisan editors in the District of Columbia who had no circulation and subscription sufficient to maintain their papers. Why, I ask, are Donelson & Armstrong named in this resolution? Who are Donelson & Armstrong? Why, sir, they are two individuals, neither of whom I have ever seen or ever known. There are hundreds of practical printers in the United States, and why are Donelson & Armstrong inserted expressly in this resolution? What are their capabilities for performing this work? What are their prices likely to be? How many copies of this census report are we to have published? Before we rush blindfold into this matter, and authorize the Committee on Printing to negotiate this contract, let us at least know something of the expense to which we are to be put. The Superintendent of the Census has prepared, or is engaged in preparing, a volume with regard to the census of the State of Maryland. I understand that volume is to be about the ordinary size of a volume of the Congressional Globe—not, perhaps, as large as that of the first session of the last Congress, but about the size of that of the second session. It will be a considerable sized folio volume. That is what I understand. I may be mistaken, but that is my belief. I understand that it contains a historical account of every county in the State of Maryland, besides a complete account of the census of that State, involving all of the one hundred questions which, by a law of the last Congress, the deputy marshals were required to ask every individual, or at least every head of a family. Now, if a similar account is to be furnished of every State in the Union—and if this is done for one State it should certainly be done for all the States—then we shall have thirty-one folio volumes, each of which will comprise the census of one State alone; and if one hundred thousand copies, or perhaps more likely five hundred thousand copies, we shall involve the country in an expense for printing, amounting to millions of dollars. We are going, blindfold, to make this enormous appropriation, and I do not know for what purpose. How many copies, I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Printing, [Mr. GORMAN,] is it proposed to publish? How many volumes is it expected it will make? And how much money is it proposed to appropriate for that purpose? Unless this information can be given, I will never consent to give the power which is asked for in this resolution to any committee however respectable, or however honest—and none can be more so than the present Committee on Printing—never, sir! What does this resolution propose? It proposes to give the Committee on Printing power to enter into an arrangement with Messrs. Donelson & Armstrong—two gentlemen whom I do not know—they may be very worthy men and excellent printers. I believe they are the editors of the Union. The committee have no discretionary powers. They cannot call in anybody else. If other printers offer lower or better terms, they cannot accept them. But they are required to make a contract with Donelson & Armstrong. They do not tell us beforehand, nor do we limit them in the extent of the contract. Why, we ought at least to insert, "Provided, that the expense shall not exceed so much," or, "Provided, the number of copies shall not exceed so many." I do not believe we ought to give an unlimited power to contract in this matter, and thus to vote away the public money to any man, or set of men, however honorable, or however honest, their character may be. That is a power which belongs exclusively to this House, and we have not the right to delegate it to others. I do not believe any gentleman will be able to answer these questions, and unless we receive this information, I will never consent that we should rush on, blindfold, to incur this enormous expense now. Suppose this turns out to be a profitable job. This Committee on Printing have the power to go on, and employ Donelson & Armstrong to print as many copies of these thirty-one volumes as they please—for all the States ought to stand upon the same footing. If this history of each county is given to Maryland, it should also be given to Virginia, and New York, and Pennsylvania, and Ohio, and every State in the Union. Every State has as much right to have the details of its resources and statistics spread out at length and printed, as the State of Maryland has.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will ask the gentleman from Maryland if it is his understanding that there is to be a volume made out for every State, as large as the Congressional Globe?

Mr. EVANS. I do not know. The resolution does not state. But I can tell the gentleman that they are preparing a volume for the State of Maryland about that size; and if a like volume is prepared for every State it will make thirty-one volumes.

Mr. JONES. If that is so, I will vote against having them printed at all.

A Voice. That for Maryland is prepared as a model volume.

Mr. EVANS. I understand that volume is to be a model volume. So we are perhaps to have thirty-one volumes. I suppose we shall have at least one hundred thousand copies published.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him whether the volume which is being prepared is for the census printing or for the State of Maryland?

Mr. EVANS. As a part of the census returns.

Mr. STANTON. I understand that the whole returns will not make a volume larger than the Congressional Globe for the last long session of Congress.

Mr. EVANS. I do not understand so. But I do not want any gentleman to understand me as denying the gentleman's assertion. It may be so. But I do say this: we have no positive information upon that subject, and until we have, we ought not, blindfold, to adopt this resolution. I do assert that this model volume which is being prepared, is not by the order of, or for the State of Maryland, but for the use of the House and Senate. And if such a volume is to be prepared for Maryland, why should Ohio be neglected any more than the State of Maryland? And if we adopt this resolution without any knowledge of its extent, I know no reason why we should not expect to see the whole thirty-one volumes. Let gentlemen offer an amendment that the whole shall be included in one volume, and that the whole number of copies shall not exceed fifty thousand and the expenses not more than $100,000. You will have, then, something reasonable, and the House will not be under the necessity of adopting the resolution without knowing what it is about.

I now pass to another branch of this subject. We should not pass this matter by lightly. This public printing has been the cause of much dissension here. I now mean to refer to the course pursued in the last Congress upon the same subject. It was asserted in the last Congress, that Messrs. Trenholm and Belt—the public printers to Congress—had violated their contract.

[A message was here received from the Senate, announcing that several bills had passed that body.]

Mr. E. continued. Now, Mr. Speaker, the honorable chairman of the Committee on Printing [Mr. GORMAN] has told us that the committee had unanimously concluded that the present contractors for the public printing had violated their contract in the quality of paper upon which the printing was done. I want to ask that gentleman if the same thing was not done by the contractors for the printing in the last Congress? I want to know if it was not proved by testimony introduced before a committee of this House, organized for that especial purpose, that Trenholm & Belt had used paper many pounds less in weight than that specified by the contract, viz., that of say fifty pounds to the ream? I want to know if, upon any occasion, Trenholm & Belt ever used the quality of paper which they contracted to use? I ask if Mr. Ritchie did not prove, or if Trenholm & Belt did not—for I do not desire to mention the name of Mr. Ritchie but with respect—I ask if Trenholm & Belt did not attempt to prove, by Mr. Farnham, a bookseller and stationer of this city, that the lighter paper which they used was not the better paper? I want to know if he was not allowed to go on printing upon that kind of paper, not only without complaint, but with the express approval and sanction of gentlemen in this House, many of whom are now here? Yet now, when Mr. Boyd Hamilton, of the city of Philadelphia, has done precisely the same thing, what do the Committee on Printing propose to do? I think no one will deny what I say in relation to the contractors for the printing of the last Congress. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] was a member of that committee, and I call upon him to deny it if I am wrong.

Mr. ORR. I will state to the gentleman that the paper upon which Messrs. Trenholm & Belt contracted to use was to weigh thirty-eight pounds to the ream. They used that weighing thirty-two pounds. I think the gentleman from Maryland stated that fifty pounds per ream was the weight contracted for.

Mr. EVANS. I was wrong in the weight. But it was proved before the committee of the House that these contractors used paper weighing six pounds per ream less than that contracted for. I made it at the time the cause of a grave and serious charge in this House, for which I subjected myself to great censure. However, let those controversies now sleep with the dead. I do not think that any gentleman should allow any such thing to become indelible; let him rather strike it from his memory. The fact which I desire to bring to the notice of this House is, that the same thing which was approved in Trenholm & Belt is now regarded by the Committee on Printing as a great crime in Mr. Boyd Hamilton. Now, what are we to do with the public printing? Up to the Twentieth Congress it was given to the fortunate newspaper editors of both political parties by the way of jobs, and it had been a source of great corruption. That Congress determined to put a stop to all the iniquity which had or might spring out of the public printing. It was therefore determined by that Congress that the public printing should be thereafter let out to the lowest bidder. It determined that the old system of corruption and patronage should be done away with, and that the printing should be let out to the lowest bidder who would give good security. Well, what was the consequence of that change? Messrs. Wendell & Van Benthuyzen, residents of Albany, in the State of New York, came on here to Washington, and entered into a contract with the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, as directed by law, and they performed the public printing at certain specified prices, and as soon as they had finished the printing they informed the House that they had lost fifteen or twenty thousand dollars by the contract. I must say they printed the documents required to be printed by them upon inferior paper and with inferior ink; they did not more than ordinarily delay the public printing, but did it in good time—certainly did not delay it as much as it latterly has been—and they manifested in every way a spirit of determination to comply as nearly as possible with the terms of the contract. Now let us see the effect.

Wendell & Van Benthuyzen, having lost money by that contract, did not become bidders for the printing of the Thirty-first Congress, if I recollect aright—for I have not the documents by me, but trust to memory, and if I am not accurate gentlemen will correct me. The bidding was to be relet for the Thirty-first Congress. The prices of Wendell & Van Benthuyzen were well known, and they had a memorial before Congress by which it was shown how much they had lost by their contract—some fifteen or twenty thousand dollars.

Now bidders had everything before them to enable them to make their bids fairly, honestly, justly, and uprightly—and what was the result? Mr. John C. Rives was one of the bidders, and Mr. Towers, a practical printer in the city of Washington, was another. Wendell & Van Benthuyzen were not bidders, but Messrs. Trenholm & Belt, two persons entirely unknown to anybody, except to some printers in the city of Washington personally acquainted with them, and totally unknown to every member of this House, were found to be the lowest bidders, and very low bidders, considerably lower than the prices of Wendell & Van Benthuyzen, upon which prices those parties had lost fifteen or twenty thousand dollars. Well, sir, Messrs. Trenholm & Belt went on with the printing, and partially executed it, and in so doing—without meaning any unjust reflections upon them—if I recollect aright, and if I do not I will take occasion to correct it hereafter, the great mass of the documents was long delayed in the delivery, and, if I am not mistaken, the President's message was not delivered to us until about the month of July or August of the long session. It was a subject of great complaint upon the part of members.

Another fact was developed, and it is contained in the sworn testimony taken before a select committee. There were certain documents laid upon the tables of members, as specimen numbers, for them to look at, as is usual here when public documents come out—for instance, the Patent Office report. But documents of the same kind, intended for distribution, are always left in the folding-room. Upon an examination by this select committee it was discovered that those documents, which were laid upon our tables, were printed upon good paper, and with good ink; but those in the document-room, folded up and requiring to be broken open in order to examine them at all, were printed upon paper six or eight pounds less in weight, and with ink which cost several cents less per pound, and were every way different from the contract. Here was a fraud attempted to be played upon members and upon this House.

Now, what was the upshot of this whole matter of public printing? I must return one moment. It was proved in the testimony—and I go upon the testimony and nothing else—that when Messrs. Trenholm & Belt took this contract, and entered into it, they declared they did not take it for the purpose of fulfilling it, but that they expected to make Congress sick of this whole system of contract printing, and make them return to the whole job system of giving out the public printing to editors in this city. It is proved that they declared, before they took the contract, they took it at low prices for the very purpose of breaking up the contract system. They came forward, notwithstanding this proof of iniquity, and made a claim upon the House of Representatives, which would have amounted, I am told by practical printers, and those who understand their business, to the sum of two hundred thousand dollars, because they had a hard bargain, notwithstanding they took the bargain for the purpose of breaking up the contract system. Now, how did it eventuate? It turned out that Trenholm & Belt were men of straw. The real contractor was Mr. Ritchie, then the editor of the Union. Mr. Ritchie was the actual contractor, and went security for Trenholm & Belt, and thereby became his own security, they being merely nominal parties, and he came forward and asked of this House indemnity, which, it was stated, amounted to two hundred thousand dollars. It was not declared that this was the amount in money, but was covered up in indefiniteness, as it is in this resolution. What did he state? He acknowledged his paper did not weigh enough. He did not pretend to deny it, but justified himself by saying the lighter paper was the better paper. The matter was discussed, at the last Congress, elaborately and at length, by members upon both sides of the House, and very ably discussed too, and Mr. Ritchie was, by certain members, justified in using lighter paper.

I wish to call the attention of Congress to this one fact, that Congress adopted the contract system, and that contract system was faithfully observed during the Twenty-ninth Congress, and during the Thirtieth Congress Messrs. Trenholm & Belt took the contract with the express declaration that they intended to break up the system, and force Congress to come back to the old and corrupt system, and they nearly succeeded in it. They got their bill through the House, and would have got it through the Senate, but for want of time. But it not having been done then, it becomes necessary for this Congress to step forward and do it—to abandon the contract system, and go back again to the corrupting old method of giving it out to selected favorites and partisan editors.

I do not care what amount may be honorably and reasonably realized under a fair contract by the gentlemen named in this resolution; if they succeed in obtaining the work, I trust they may meet with just and proper success; neither do I oppose the resolution because Donelson & Armstrong are Democrats. If I know myself, I would say the same thing against Gideon, of the Republic, and Gales & Seaton, of the Intelligencer.

But I feel assured that this is a part of the old exploded and heretofore-defeated scheme, to force Congress to go back to the old corrupt system, and abandon the contract system. For that reason they have brought in the resolution to-day, which says we shall print the Census, without telling us how many volumes it will make, how much it will cost, and how many copies, but goes on to designate the names of the very men who are to have it, and nobody else.

Every gentleman in this House knows that this ought not to be. Every one is aware that a fair field of competition should be opened to all, and that we should give that fair arena without fear, favor, or affection.

The honorable gentleman says the Committee unanimously agreed that Boyd Hamilton is not entitled to this printing. I call the attention of the House and of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. Orr.] to the fact, that the great effort made in the last Congress, and the strong ground upon which Mr. Ritchie fastened himself, and the heft of his argument was this, that Congress had taken the Census printing away from Mr. Ritchie when he was entitled to it as public printer; at least, so it was argued upon the other side of the House. Now, they have come to the conclusion that the public printer is not entitled to this same printing. Is not that so? Mr. Ritchie argued so, and contended ably for it. I examined this question with great care, and I think it was the great ground he had, if he had any. And before this Congress is over Mr. Ritchie will come forward in this House, and claim indemnity upon this very ground. He will be here, my word for it, asking that real or imaginary losses incurred during the last Congress shall be made good to him. He may perhaps obtain it, for he is powerful; he holds in his control the destinies of members of Congress. And Mr. Hamilton has this disadvantage, that he is no partisan editor, while Mr. Ritchie was. Hence there is sympathy, and there are votes, for the one; and no sympathy and no votes for the other.

Mr. FULLER, of Maine. Was is not upon the ground that Mr. Ritchie was deprived of the printing of the proceedings in relation to the death of General Taylor, and of some Supreme Court cases, that he claimed indemnity?

Mr. EVANS. The gentleman is mistaken. Mr. Ritchie sent in a letter, assenting to the printing, in a northern city, of the proceedings in reference to General Taylor.

Mr. FULLER. Was not that after he offered to give up the contract? And was not that one of the jobs Mr. Ritchie claimed as falling within his contract, and upon that ground that he claimed before Congress that he was relieved from the contract?

Mr. EVANS. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state this—and I wish to state nothing unfair—Mr. Ritchie did certainly claim he had a right to print the obituary notices of General Taylor, but he came forward voluntarily, and by a letter addressed to the Speaker of the House, expressly waived all right to perform such printing, stating that it would be much better, and much more speedily executed elsewhere. Thus, I say, he delivered a message to this House, expressly waiving his right.

So with regard to the opinions of the Supreme Court, in the celebrated passenger cases—Norris vs. the city of Boston—those cases which, at the time, excited so much interest. Mr. Ritchie claimed about $36,000 for that printing, which was very small in amount, and was executed at a special session of the Senate. The committee determined that he was entitled to—say $500, and he was actually paid $12,000, as I shall always believe wrongfully and improperly. Mr. Ritchie contended that he was entitled to a dollar for every page, or every line—I forget which—of these documents, and he sent in a bill of $36,500 for printing these opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States. The committee examined it, and said it came to $500, and that was the whole amount he was entitled to; but they pushed it so strong, that the Secretary of the Senate allowed Mr. Ritchie $12,500, more than twenty times what this contract made it. But all this is collateral to the matter in question.

Mr. Ritchie did say that the census printing belonged to the public printer, and made an able argument to prove it, and members of this House, a great body of them, assented to it, and the committee to which it was referred, I think, reported in favor of it. Now, the Committee on Printing comes in and says it does not belong to the public printer. It did belong to the public printer when Mr. Ritchie was such, but it does not when Mr. Hamilton is public printer. I do not say whether it does or does not, and this House has not inquired whether it does or not. It has not made a proper investigation. But it becomes this House, and is consistent with decency, with honor, and with propriety, before it passes this resolution, to inquire whether it does belong to the public printer, and if it does not fall to Mr. Boyd Hamilton, to inquire where does it fall, and to whom it does belong.

I should like to have some gentleman to tell me why it was that the contract was not proposed to be given to John Doe or Richard Roe, or somebody else? That Donelson & Armstrong is put in here is the most mysterious part of this matter. It seems to me to be a sacrifice upon the part of Donelson & Armstrong of a considerable portion of that fortune they have been all their lives in acquiring for the benefit of the Government. I am aware of the patriotism of our citizens, that they will yield up their lives upon the battle-field, that they will give away their estates for taxes, that they will give up their all in order to support the Government, but this seems to be a sublime sacrifice. I never yet knew a public printer that has not professed to have lost money by his contract, and why Messrs. Donelson & Armstrong should be picked out and pressed into this resolution to be sacrificed, to sustain the loss which they must inevitably as public printers, and I never knew it otherwise, I cannot tell. I do not know why their destruction is resolved upon. I protest, as the friend of Donelson & Armstrong, with whom I am not acquainted, against their being thrust into this losing business. Now why does not the House pass a resolution saying that the contract shall be let out to the lowest bidder for cash, who comes with good security, the Government furnishing the paper? Look to the State of Massachusetts, which prints highly creditable documents. If gentlemen will see the books published by order of that State, in our Library, they will acknowledge that they are creditable. So it is with the State of New York, all the New England States, and, I might add, of almost all of the States. The only printing in the whole country that is wretchedly and miserably executed, at the highest price, is that of the Government of the United States. It is a disgrace to them. The English, French, and Russian Governments furnish us with their public documents, which are magnificently printed and elegantly bound. We send ours in return, which an American would be ashamed to know in a foreign country. If this House resolves that the census printing shall be let out to the lowest bidder, the Government furnishing the paper, and the contractor to be paid for composition and press-work, and nothing else, we will have it well printed, and will ourselves get rid of the suspicion, that I am sure every member will be unwilling to be attached to himself, that Donelson & Armstrong are receiving an extraordinary pecuniary compensation. Your contract will be well executed, and millions of dollars, perhaps, will be saved to your Treasury. You will receive documents in good time, and, I will repeat, you will divest yourselves of all suspicion. Your consciences, in future time, will not be weighed down, as I know they will if you allow Messrs. Donelson & Armstrong to be put in here. Members are too virtuous, too intelligent to here subject themselves to the suspicion of making a job. I should like while I am upon the floor, that somebody would tell me why Messrs. Donelson & Armstrong are selected and put into this resolution? I do not want Gideon, of the Republic, I do not want any Whig to be placed there. If you make a job of the matter, say so, and let the Democrats have it, for they have a majority here. If you go upon principle I demand, if Boyd Hamilton is not entitled to it, that it shall be let out by contract. Is it proposed to build up, on the eve of a presidential campaign, a formidable press to be sustained out of the Treasury? I cannot believe it. I would disdain to see either Whigs or Democrats in this House, building up political power in this manner, and I know there are as high and honorable men in the other party as are to be found anywhere. Do you seek to build up, on the eve of a presidential campaign, in the city of Washington, a formidable press, the expenses of which are to be defrayed out of the Treasury? Is that your design?

Mr. GORMAN. I apprehend that the gentleman, if he will look at the proceedings of a former extra session of Congress, he will find that the contract was taken from the Democratic public printers, Messrs. Blair & Rives, when the Whig party were in power, and $100,000 voted into the pockets of Gales & Seaton. That is an answer to the gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. EVANS. I do not know whether that is a fact; but the gentleman asserts and I believe it.

Mr. GORMAN. I have the vote here.

Mr. EVANS. If it be, as the gentleman states, it was a miserable piece of swindling, and unworthy of an American Congress; I do not stand by it. I wash my hands clean of it, for it was a disgrace to the country. I hope the gentleman will not urge that example by a former Congress, for the action of the present one. Donelson is a man of talents, and has distinguished himself in the councils of the country, or at least in its service abroad. I seek to take nothing from him. I am willing to see him prosper fairly and honorably, but not by this job.

Mr. GORMAN. I would inquire of the gentleman, which is the most euphonious to his ear—Gales & Seaton, or Donelson & Armstrong?

Mr. EVANS. Gales & Seaton are not more euphonious than Donelson & Armstrong. I never voted a job to Gales & Seaton, nor to anybody else, and never will. This whole matter is all so vague, so misty, so floating, that I cannot make out from it any certain statistics; but were I to venture a guess, I would say that $500,000 profit might be made out of this job. Here is an amendment that a partisan press shall be set up, encouraged, and paid out of the public Treasury to endure forever. Gentlemen will find, if that is the design, that it will bring down this evil upon their own heads. These men, inflated by prosperity, having filled themselves to repletion with the public patronage, will wreak vengeance upon some of you. They will turn upon you if you step over the line they have marked out, and woe unto him who censures any doctrine they advocate, for his political grave will be dug! That will be the pay you will receive for your services you now do them. Partisan editors of both parties forget when prosperous, their friends, and wreak their vengeance upon those who dissent from their dogmas and their dicta. When I have another opportunity upon a similar question to this, I promise the House to bring out all the facts with regard to the public printing, in a speech of less than an hour in length, and will show them such a system of fraud and corruption as would be disgraceful to an American Congress longer to sanction. I hope we will do nothing of the kind proposed in the resolution. I do not object to Donelson & Armstrong, if they can get it on a fair competition. As fair competitors let them have it, and I will say amen to it. I wish them success in their paper. When under the editorship of Mr. Ritchie, and when it was edited by Donelson & Armstrong, it advocated principles which I professed, and sustained measures which I sustained, and I honor them for it. I believe it also maintains the great compromise principles which have been passed here. Those measures I defend, and those measures they have defended. The present editor, I believe, has never forsaken the great broad Union ground which embraces the whole government, and for that I honor him, and wish the paper success and prosperity; but not for that or anything else they can do will I mix in the dirty mire of miserable politics to give them public plunder, or to enable any partisan press to control offices, and finally to control the very members of this House. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will pardon me for detaining them so long upon this question. I hope it will consider the intrinsic importance of this proposition. I assure every gentleman, no matter what his politics are, that if he will examine into the subject—and it will not take much time as the documents can be all found in the proceedings of last Congress—he will find that it is worthy of his most serious examination, and he will discover that this one single job will come to one twenty-fifth part of the whole expenses of the Government. I repeat, that it is worthy of our consideration, and I trust every one will see the necessity of letting out this contract to the lowest bidder, the Government furnishing the paper upon which the matter is to be printed. We will then get it done honorably and honestly. I move the following amendment:

To amend by striking out "Donelson & Armstrong," and to insert "the lowest bidder for cash, the Government furnishing the paper."

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Speaker, I am very much gratified—being called out of the House by business—that I returned during the discussion of this question. I should have been exceedingly unwilling to have had it passed without expressing my opinion and giving my vote upon it. When I say this, I do not suppose that any expression of opinion I can present will control that of individuals of this House. But, sir, I have been at all times unwilling that this subject of public printing should pass from before this House until the country should understand, and fully understand, all that was meant by this corruption fund. We have heard gentlemen make great objections to letting the printing out to the lowest bidder, which has been denounced all around this House as a miserable failure; and, by way of amending it, it is proposed to let it out to the highest bidder—by way of relieving the House from difficulty they let it out to the highest bidder; that is, they limit the committee; they designate the individual with whom that committee is to make the contract, and they cannot make a contract with anybody else. Now, I should suppose—

Mr. GORMAN. The contract is to be made upon such terms as the committee shall deem reasonable. I ask my honorable friend from North Carolina if he supposes the gentlemen composing the Committee on Printing will make the contract upon terms unreasonable and unjust to the country and the Government?

Mr. VENABLE. My gallant friend is a fair-minded man. I know he has no purpose, but a fair purpose. Why not say, the committee shall contract with some person to do the public printing? Why give it to Donelson & Armstrong? What claims have they upon us, or upon the country? Mr. Donelson has been called the administrator of General Jackson's opinions. I say, he is administrator not only in his wrong, but in General Jackson's wrong. Aye, sir, he has no claims upon me, or upon those whom I represent. I felt the influence of his power during the last summer. I will never pay a man to whip me. I can get it done cheaper. [Laughter.] The Union paper contains the highest Federal doctrines—doctrines with which I never had any sympathy, and never can have, and therefore it has no claims upon me. If it held the best of principles, I would oppose it, whether it had claims upon me or upon those whom I represent. I oppose the principle, by which the offer for this printing is to be narrowed down, and the contract given to a single individual. If there were one hundred men in the country who sell bread, can you say that the hungry shall trade only with one man? There can be no question upon that subject. Why are Donelson & Armstrong suggested? Do we mean to give away the public printing as a pension?—propose to make the public printing a tax upon the Treasury—and say that the present system of giving it to the lowest bidder is a bad one? I can differ with gentlemen upon a principle, and respect them because they have a right to their opinions. They assert them independently and act upon them; but I can feel no such sympathy or respect when the question becomes one of plunder. I know where it begins, but not where it ends. Then I ask, is the committee restricted to a contract with Donelson & Armstrong, and Donelson & Armstrong alone? If that is so, they have some claims upon us. Let those claims be pointed out. Let them tell the country, and let us all know how great pension they are entitled to. Let us fix the amount, so if we make the settlement, we will know when we are done paying. If a pension is to be given, let us know how much we are giving. If the contract for printing is to open it to the world, open it to all competition, and give the committee the discretion to make the contract with individuals who shall execute it in the best manner and for the least sum. I will go with my friend from Maryland [Mr. EVANS] in the proposition that the Government should furnish paper, and we should leave nothing but the mechanical work to the printer—pay the printer what his work is worth, and give him fair rates. I shall never consent to make a sort of contract where no man in this House but a practical printer ever knows how much is to be drawn from the Treasury for the purpose of filling the pockets of one who has, for the time, the favor of a majority here. The remarks made by my friend from Maryland [Mr. EVANS] deserve thorough consideration. I have seen men make public printers, the organs of parties, and thus fixed upon them, of whom the fabled story of Sinbad the Sailor's "Old Man of the Sea" is a very striking illustration: He first rode by charity, and ended in demanding to ride by right. They are right gentlemen at first, but there is no getting rid of them at last. You will find them very accommodating in their first essays in playing a tune, but soon give you those in which you can perceive no harmony, and which it is a great inconvenience to be compelled to dance to after them. I can never consent that the funds of this Government, which have been collected by taxing the people, shall be taken for the purpose of giving pensions to any individual. While I am willing to pension the soldier, and take care of his widow and orphans—the reward of actual services—while I am willing to allow all claims of that kind, I am not willing to select any individual and give him the means of becoming wealthy out of the public purse, and to place him in a position in which he has an opportunity to form public opinion, simply because he is an editor of a leading journal disseminated extensively throughout the country. I want no man to make public opinion for me, nor do my constituents desire it. I hope I shall never see the time when party ties and party allegiance shall be so strongly fixed upon me that I shall be willing to sacrifice principle for the purpose of advancing the position or standing of any one. I do not mean, under any circumstances, to give a vote in which I shall have to part with the principle for the purpose of promoting the aspirations of any man to the Presidency. Thank God, I am foot-loose. I represent a constituency that require me to be foot-loose, who have returned me by a large majority. I am foot-loose, and bound by no party ties or obligations which require me to abandon any principle which I have asserted. I will take occasion to say, while I abhor the consolidation doctrines which have spread over every sheet of the Union newspaper, while I naturally abhor and eschew them, if the editors will do the printing any cheaper than anybody else, they are welcome to do it. If a Mahometan or Mormon will do the printing better and cheaper than anybody else, I am willing to pay for it. I trust there will be a decided effort in this House, to keep this printing out of the hands of any men who will be likely to make use of so great a power in the presidential campaign. I prefer a practical printer who is not an editor; and I hope we will not be called upon to give fuel to kindle a fire that will give power to any machinery which will generate a miasma over the whole length and breadth of the country. I take this occasion, and am glad of the opportunity, to say, that in regard to the vote which I shall give upon this question I consider myself as detached from any sort of obligations to sustain any man's pretensions for the printing; neither will I vote for any man for the Presidency who does not in his avowed opinions come up to my views of what a patriotic, constitutional American statesman ought to hold and adhere to.

I have been much entertained as well as amused, within the last few days, by the revelations made in the discussion between several representatives from Massachusetts. There was disclosed by the recrimination between those accomplices in abolition what I always believed—that both the Whigs and Democrats, as a party, in that State were deeply hostile to the peculiar institutions of the South. I had no interest in such a contest, except for the information of the people whom I represent. I shall take occasion to circulate those speeches freely amongst them, that they may have the highest evidence of the correctness of those conclusions with which I had made them familiar in my intercourse with them. It was a battle in which I desired the full exhibition of prowess on both sides, and that at the close of the combat, bystanders would have to do the kind office of burning the slain. Governor Boutwell carried the State because he and his friends bid higher than their competitors at the auction. A bid of one quarter of a dollar more by the other side would have carried the day against them. The price was the consideration; the offices and emoluments were irresistible. Did the Democracy coalesce with the Abolitionists? Let those representatives of that State who here denounce them, say why they voted for Mr. Winthrop? They profess to be satisfied with the compromise, and yet support Mr. Winthrop, who within a few days after the passage of those measures, voted in the Senate for a bill abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia. He bid for the Abolitionists of Massachusetts; endeavored to revive agitation on the slavery question, and upon that achievement was nominated as a candidate for Governor. He did not bid enough, but showed a willing mind. Those who supported him have but little cause to complain of any tampering with Abolitionists or combinations with them for power. He spread the banner of agitation to the breeze, and was sustained by the Whigs of his State. I have no interest in the matter further than the truth of history is concerned, and as a recorded evidence of what sort of materials we are called on to rely upon in the hour of trial. It will teach my constituents that I am no alarmist, and that I have told them the truth. It is evident, from all the circumstances, that both parties had a common purpose, but neither party had any feeling for us. I am neither malignant nor resentful. If my temper is excitable, it is easily appeased; but there is one thing which I never mean to do, and that is, to fawn upon the hand that strikes me. No, sir, I will never do it. I will never be brought to sustain the pretensions of any man for the Presidency who is not a republican; who does not distinctly acknowledge State sovereignty and State rights upon the principles of their great apostle, Mr. Jefferson; who does not pledge himself to arrest agitation of the slavery question, and carry out the fugitive slave law by all the power with which he is clothed. I will make no compromise here. I opposed every measure of the compromise except the fugitive slave law; and I regretted that I was not able to defeat all of them against which I voted. The State to which I owe my allegiance, and the people whom I represent, were willing to try the experiment of these measures, as they had become a part of the laws of the land. They are a law-abiding people, and I acknowledge the authority of the will of my people. I voted for the fugitive slave law; and it is the only one of the compromise measures for which I voted. But though I acquiesce in them, no man has a right to inquire as to whether I do so cordially or not. I will say, that I have changed no opinion as to the character of these measures, and I feel now as I felt then. My constituents feel now in regard to this subject, as every good citizen ought to feel, a strong desire for the repose of the public mind by a general acquiescence in and faithful execution of these laws. I am for preserving the Government upon the principles of the Constitution, and for obedience to the law in every part of the United States. So far as I am concerned, the recipient of my vote for President must be willing to carry out the law of the land. I have no sympathy with those who are disunionists per se, and have never been willing to resort to the highest remedy without the most serious cause and the general approbation of a majority of those who felt the grievance of unconstitutional oppression. When I differ with gentlemen upon principle I can understand them. It may be that I shall be compelled to act with gentlemen with whom I differ as to some minor questions not involving great principles. But when it is a perfectly clear and conclusive indication that the difference between us will be about plunder, and not about principle—about the disposition of the offices and emoluments of Government, there can be neither cooperation nor confidence. I represent a plain, unsophisticated, agricultural people, who do not look to this Government for anything by way of support. They acquire an independence by cultivating the earth. They do not look here for laws to put money in their pockets, nor to the Federal Treasury to supply their wants. They labor not only to supply themselves, but to aid in maintaining here an efficient and economical Government; to manage affairs in which all the States are concerned; and I can vote for no measure which is to take the public treasure to sustain a paper which sets itself up here as the organ of any particular party. I will vote for no measure which will place an immense money power in the hands of metropolitan editors, and thus add to their peculiar advantages for forming public opinion in the next presidential canvass.

But, sir, I do not wish to be misunderstood. I must ask the indulgence of the House for a short time longer. Having been exceedingly unwell all the morning, I had not anticipated this debate. Nothing would have induced me to make a single remark now, but that I had determined since the commencement of the session that upon the very earliest opportunity I would be distinctly understood upon those great questions which now so much agitate the public mind. In order that I may not be misunderstood, I ask gentlemen to attend to the remark that I am about to make. When I say

I want a fair, free fight in the next presidential canvass, I mean that I desire that the people may have some hand in arranging the preliminaries and making the selection between the individuals presented as candidates for office. I am very far from objecting to a candidate because he is the nominee of the Baltimore Convention. Indeed such a nomination would highly recommend him to my choice. Such an expression of preference by that body would demand and receive my respect. If he should be sound, true, and capable, frank and honest in the declaration of his republican doctrines, desirous for the repose of the country, and the faithful execution of the laws, the fact of his nomination would recommend him to my confidence and secure my zealous support.

But, sir, the Baltimore Convention might make a nomination of those who do not answer this description—who do not possess these qualifications; and I will not support any such nominees. No party ties shall induce me to perform an act by which I lose my self-respect. I am not ignorant that all liberty—all that is valuable in free governments—have been often lost agreeably to the usages of parties, and in due form of party discipline. An empty shadow takes the place of substance—the power transferred to the few from the many, and the screws of party discipline may be applied to crush all who have independence to speak the honest convictions of their own hearts. Should they nominate a man who dodges votes, and who is not to be found in his place when vital questions are to be decided—whose letters and communications require a second Daniel to interpret them—or, like the riddles of antiquity, give employment and reputation to a second Œdipus for his skill in unravelling the mysteries which they contain; or, like the Delphic oracle, which made response to a certain king, who inquired whether he should go to war with the Romans, in the following oracular words: "Ibis, redibis, nunquamque peribis"—words admitting the double translation: "You shall go, you shall return, you shall not perish"—or "You shall go, you shall not return, you shall perish." The inquiring king took the first interpretation—he went, he did not return, he perished. Other followers of the propounders of oracles have in recent times renewed the experience of this ancient king—they interpreted for themselves—they went, and did return, but sadly beaten in the struggle.

The handwriting on the wall and the dream of Nebuchadnezzar were explained by the prophet; but in these days we are without prophets or priests. Experience must be our instructor, and history our guide. I desire a matter-of-fact man, whose heart delights in an honest declaration of his opinions; who will leave plain men, like myself, in no doubt as to his meaning. No convention can have authority to discharge a candidate for the highest office in the gift of the people for such a frank and open avowal of his views. Timidity and reserve presuppose a state of things which must create distrust. No honest politician dreads the disclosure of the fixed convictions of his mind. There is a captivating beauty about the boldness of integrity. You see it in the fearlessness, in the demeanor even of a child who has never been depraved by deception. Conscious purity of purpose desires no concealment. A triumph of principle binds honest men together; but woe to that party who are united only by the system which derives its strength from the desire of plunder. Should that Convention give us the man who does not require and would scorn to have a new version put on his declarations—one who will not hesitate to declare that he holds the republican doctrines of Mr. Jefferson, our acknowledged leader,—I say Mr. Jefferson, because I think it unwise to refresh ourselves at the branch when we can come at the spring. Besides, sir, we have had many mutations and interpolations in the creed since his day. Although having the highest confidence in the purity as well as the great ability of General Jackson, I never adopted or approved of many of the doctrines of the proclamation. I adhered to him, however, and none feel a more profound reverence for his services and his memory than myself. I would not abandon him, as some did with whom I agreed about everything but some doctrines of the proclamation, and go over to a party with whom I disagreed about everything, and the proclamation too. Those who did so, were placed in a false position.

The explanations of the Globe of that day and the conversations with Mr. Ritchie in some measure softened the sternness of the text, but it left a hazy fog in the atmosphere which caused small objects to loom in the distance. You have experienced this, sir, doubtless, when in a morning mist a cow would seem to be as large as an elephant. I prefer a return to the clear bright republican days of Mr. Jefferson, for whom General Jackson cherished the most profound regard. We must return to that simple unsophisticated republicanism of the pure and palmy days of our country, before the distribution of fifty millions of money, and whole empires of land gave the means of temptation and corruption, and placed in the hands of Congress the control of jobs by which opulence may be attained in a few months or a year. To such a candidate who believes in the sovereignty of the States, I care not whether he approved or disapproved of the series of measures called the compromise, but who is determined to execute the laws and preserve the repose of the country, there will be such a gathering as we have not seen for many years.

To endeavor now to agitate the public mind on the measures of the last session would be the extreme of folly. The most of them are res perfecta. California is a State. Texas has accepted the ten millions. Utah and New Mexico are complete in their organization as Territories, and the other laws stand on the statute-book. Who would engage in the perille, as well as wicked purpose of again agitating the public mind, without any prospect of a good result? And whilst I do not approve of a policy which would assume the necessity of sustaining those laws of last session by a buttress of resolutions this session, and whilst I do not perceive the wisdom of making the move, and amend the Constitution which recognizes its imperfections and provides the mode of amendment, I am utterly averse to any course which would revive agitation or revive discontent.

Mr. POLK, (interrupting.) I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. VENABLE. Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. POLK. My point of order is this: That I cannot see what connection the coalition in Massachusetts, and the State-rights doctrines have to do with passing a resolution about public printing, and as a general charge that he is laying about so loose that I cannot see what he is at myself. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair, in obedience to what seemed to be the desire of the House, did not feel at liberty to arrest the course of remark made by the gentleman from North Carolina. The Chair, however, the point being raised, feels called upon to say, that, in his opinion, the gentleman is wandering from the question before the House.

Mr. VENABLE. I think I can satisfy the Speaker that I am not wandering from the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is very well satisfied that the remarks of the gentleman have been irrelevant.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE. Will the gentleman from North Carolina allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VENABLE. I want first to put myself right with the Speaker.

Mr. HOWE. I merely want to ask whether we are to understand that you will not vote for Cass or Douglas? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina are not in order.

Mr. VENABLE. And I propose to show that the course of remark which I was pursuing—

Mr. SWEETSER, (interrupting.) I ask for the enforcement of the rule. The gentleman from North Carolina being called to order, and the Chair having decided that he is out of order, he must take his seat, under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the gentleman from North Carolina is not at liberty, under the rules, to discuss the presidential question upon the proposition now before the House, and that his remarks were consequently irrelevant.

Mr. VENABLE. I hope I may be allowed to proceed in order.

Mr. WILCOX. I hope the gentleman will be permitted to proceed with his remarks, and that the same latitude of debate will be extended to others.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I move that my colleague have leave to proceed in order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposition?

Mr. SWEETSER objected.

The question was then taken on Mr. CLINGMAN's motion; and it was agreed to.

Mr. VENABLE, (resuming.) I profoundly regret that I should have been so unfortunate in presenting my views, as that any gentleman, or the Chair, should have supposed that I was out of order. I was arguing to show, that my objection to the proposition to give this printing to the particular individuals named in the resolution, might give color to the charge that this House were sustaining a press with the view of giving it weight in the coming presidential election; that this Congress was making themselves a party to such an arrangement, and identifying themselves with a party struggle by pensioning a press, which would be active in the formation of public opinion. It seems to me that this was relevant, as an argument why the printing should not be given to Donelson & Armstrong. I assure the House, however, that I had no purpose to say anything that was not directly relevant to the subject before us. But suppose that this proposition—as is not the case—limited the committee to bargain with a notoriously corrupt man—and I am only putting an extreme case—it would then be certainly in order to say that the resolution was wrong, because it limited the committee to bargain with a very unsuitable person. And that was the whole drift of my remarks. Such a press, fed by the Government out of the public Treasury, might succeed in forcing upon the country one who was not suitable for the object in view. The committee, in no event, should be limited by a vote of this House to any particular individual, inasmuch as it narrowed down the field of selection, and must result, in the progress of events, in a system of favoritism, which neither the principles of justice nor the good sense of the people would tolerate.

When called to order by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK,] I had yielded the floor to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. HOWE,] who asked me whether I would vote for General Cass or Mr. Douglas? I hope it is not out of order to be respectful to the gentleman, and I reply—that I drew a character for whom I would not vote; if it fits no person, it damages no one; if it does, it is his fault, not mine; but I decline to make a personal application of my remarks upon the call he has made. I have now said what I intended to say relative to the Presidency, and what I have said was legitimately connected with the subject-matter before the House. I have said it because I think it due to the country, that its representatives should not adopt an indirect system of pensioning the press. No editors of the journals of the country should be enabled by jobs thrown in their way to make a fortune out of the Treasury for mere party purposes. I appeal to this House to say whether it is proper that this job should be appropriated in the manner which this resolution proposes, merely because a majority of this House have the power to do it. If the House desires to elect a public printer, let it be done, and the rates and compensation fixed. But it is certainly wrong to do so by indirection. Every man should have his just dues. But if it is a bad plan to let out the public printing to the lowest bidder, do not adopt the other extreme of letting it out to the highest bidder! If we pass this resolution, and give the contract to Donelson & Armstrong, we exclude competition; and if they will not do it at what the committee consider a reasonable price, you will have no printing done, or you will have this subject back again in this House for discussion. The whole matter will have another hearing and another decision. I trust the time is near for us to have a printing bureau, as a part of our organization, and the printing executed by our own employees—when the whole work shall be done by us, and the entire matter be under our own control—that the time is near when we shall get rid of this job-work—this bleeding the Treasury in order to obtain the means of propagating particular political doctrines, and for the purpose of controlling public sentiment. We have already had a good deal of experience in this matter. I have lately seen at least one article published in an organ, and editorially introduced, as possessing the entire proportions of the original publication, when, in fact, one half of the original article which it professed to quote, was excluded, and the portion republished was turned to an entirely different purpose from that designed by its author. The first part published apparently as a whole was quite unexceptionable, and this latter portion which did not appear giving an offensive character to it all. It reminded me of Milton's archangel, ruined, still beautiful and imposing in the upper portion of his person, but very much deformed about the lower extremities, [laughter.] For myself I decline to give such papers the public patronage. While I am for paying to the last cent every man in our employ, and while I am for making a liberal allowance for that time—while I am unwilling that any man should work for me, or the people I represent, or the government to which I belong, without a full, fair, liberal, and generous compensation, yet I demand that our accounts shall be settled in a business-like manner. I wish to know for what we are contracting. When the bargain is to be made, all the printers in the country, all the press of the country, should be invited to come into fair and honorable competition. Let the committee receive propositions from any who may propose to do the work, and then let them decide as they may think proper, according to the merits of the several competitors. I am in favor of the amendment of my friend from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS,] that the paper shall be furnished by the Government, and the names of the individuals in the resolution be stricken out.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the gentleman from North Carolina allow me for a moment? That gentleman is aware that Blair & Rives did the printing for the last census. Now, the price paid in that case may be a guide for the price in this. Now, I ask the gentleman from North Carolina, if he supposes any committee composed of honorable men, and honest men, who have the letting of that contract, will, for the purpose of allowing any party to make money for any political purpose or any other purpose, make an arrangement for this census printing at rates above those generally paid for the same kind of work?

Mr. VENABLE. The gentleman knows that I do not doubt the honesty and integrity of any member of that committee.

Mr. GORMAN. Then I hope the gentleman will not continue to insist that the course of proceeding proposed in this resolution will result in corruption. If I supposed myself capable of an action of this kind, I should consider myself unworthy of a seat in this body.

Mr. VENABLE. It was no part of my purpose in making these remarks, to implicate my honorable, gallant friend, the chairman of the Committee on Printing. I know that he would recoil from contamination or the suspicion of corruption with the sensibility of a wound—his nature is too elevated, and his heart too pure. This is also true of honorable gentlemen connected with him upon that committee. I have the highest confidence in them. But they are not practical printers. They do not understand the art and mystery of printing, and therefore I say that the contract should not be given unconditionally to Donelson & Armstrong, and leave them to set their own prices. Besides, I will show that the census printing under Blair & Rives was very different from the census printing now, and that the prices of printing and paper are now greatly below the rates at the date of their contract.

Mr. GORMAN. If the gentleman will allow me I will tell him that one member of the Committee on Printing, upon the part of the Senate, [Mr. HAMLIN,] is a practical printer.

Mr. VENABLE. That makes the chance a great deal better. But, as I was proceeding to say, I will show that the census printing under Blair & Rives was a very different matter from what the census printing is now. We have been shown that it will take volumes upon volumes to complete it. The office of Superintendent promises to fill the coming decade. I have not stated, nor do I intend to state, what Blair & Rives made by that contract. They confess to a large amount made by contract, and it is theirs. But if I have made an improvident bargain once, and did not avoid the mistake the next time, then experience would be worthless. We learn nothing if not made more cautious, and we repeat the same blunder. It is best that you should strike out the names of the individuals designated from the resolution. They may obtain the contract if they will perform it cheaper and better than anybody else. But prudence demands that whenever this bargain is made, that propositions should be received from any and all practical printers to do the mechanical work, and the Government furnish the paper. I ask, and I hope some gentleman will tell me, why Donelson & Armstrong are to have this printing? I ask again, and I receive no answer, why are they selected from all others to do this work? What peculiar claim have they?

A Voice. Why should they not have it?

Mr. VENABLE. Why should they have it? They have no claims upon me that I know of. They have held me up in common with those with whom I have acted as Southern fanatics cooperating with Northern Abolitionists! They have denounced us in the strongest terms which they were capable of using. They have no claims upon me, and I wish to let them know it. A course such as this journal has pursued can never create a claim upon the confidence of those who received their denunciations. What claims have they upon the Government? What claims have they more than any other printers? What more than Blair & Rives—more than Boyd Hamilton, already executing a ruinous contract, struggling with the embarrassments arising out of that contract, and claiming this printing at our hands? It is a job of practical printing, and practical printing alone; but Boyd Hamilton is no editor, merely an humble laborer at the press. Then I should like to know—and the question has not been answered—from whence and how did this claim of Donelson & Armstrong originate?

Mr. Speaker, I have spoken plainly, because I think plainness and candor becoming and proper. I have, without resentment, given expression to the convictions of my understanding, and the feelings of my heart. I mean to act independently and without any concealment of my views. The time when I had feelings of resentment has passed away. The assault upon the old line Republican State-Rights Democracy was, so far as I was concerned, fierce, but impotent. But the memory of events is not so easily obliterated. I believe that we are deeply responsible for the dissemination of unsound opinions—more so, indeed, than for criminal acts. The one is a general and extensive evil; the other limited its effect, and disarmed by the deformity of the vice. I confess that my spirit chafed when I saw in a paper purporting to be the organ of the party to which, from my youth up, I had belonged, denunciations on those, the gravamen of whose offence was, that they concurred with Jefferson and the Republican fathers—that they adhered to the ancient Republican landmarks, and venerated almost to idolatry the Constitution. The selection of the editors of that organ as the peculiar favorites of this body is the exclusion of all others—the extinction of any chance of competition; a selection which, to be just, must be founded upon acknowledged public service and extraordinary individual capabilities. No evidence of either has been furnished, and I insist that so extensive and costly an operation be submitted to the ordinary competition which the custom of the country has made law; that the law requiring the printing to be let by contract to bidders be complied with, for it is unrepealed, and that our present printer at least have a chance to recuperate from the effects of a bad contract, by a chance for a better one.

Mr. NABERS. I shall take particular pleasure in paying a little attention to a few of the observations which have fallen from the lips of the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE.] I am prepared, to some extent, to appreciate his allusion to the Washington Union. And I am prepared, to a limited extent, to appreciate the feelings of the gentleman, for he has, no doubt, felt the weight of that paper during the last summer and the last fall.

Mr. VENABLE. If the gentleman will allow me, I will merely say, that I was elected by one thousand four hundred and forty majority of the voters in my district.

Mr. NABERS. I will say to the gentleman, if that will give currency to a speech, I was elected by three thousand majority of the voters in my district. But I am going to speak of the doctrines promulgated in the Washington Union, and before the people too. And by the by, without meaning the slightest disparagement to the gentleman from North Carolina, or his constituents, I will say, that I was elected by a constituency equal in intelligence with those of the gentleman to whom I propose, briefly, to reply. Now, I ask, what terrible thing has Donelson & Armstrong done? What breach of the law have they been guilty of, that they are to be condemned here, in connection with the resolution now under consideration? Why, they have been teaching consolidation! They have been teaching Federalism! Now, I put it to gentleman upon this floor, Have the editors of that paper been engaged in teaching federalism, or consolidation? or have they only departed from the gentleman's particular views of these things? To be more explicit, have they departed from the text, or from the gentleman's commentary upon the text? I wish to know that. While the gentleman charges upon that paper the inculcation of such sentiments as have fallen from his lips to-day, I desire to know if it may not be possible that he, too, might possibly be mistaken with regard to the true and orthodox doctrines of the Democratic party? Who are Donelson & Armstrong? I never heard them charged as Consolidationists and Federalists until 1851. Never!

Mr. ORR. I call the gentleman to order.

[Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"]

Mr. ORR continued. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to proceed in discussing the resolution before the House; but it seems to me this debate would be much more appropriate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

A MEMBER. Then let us go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was not disposed to arrest the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. NABERS] in the course of his remarks; but it certainly is not in order to discuss the subject proposed to be discussed by that gentleman. His remarks, in the opinion of the Chair, are irrelevant to the subject.

Mr. FREEMAN. I move that the gentleman have liberty proceed.

Mr. McMULLIN. I ask the gentleman from Mississippi to give way in order for me to move an adjournment.

[Cries of "Oh no!" "Oh no!"]

Mr. McMULLIN. I desire to inquire of the Chair if this matter will not come up to-morrow again?

The SPEAKER. It will come up as unfinished business.

Mr. McMULLIN. Then I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and

The House adjourned till twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. STOCKTON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Wm. A. Christian, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Ordered, That the report be printed.

Mr. NORRIS, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the petition of G. Thomas Howard, reported a bill for his relief. The bill was read and passed to the second reading.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. FISH gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of William Bedient, late a sergeant in the 4th regiment of artillery.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. CLEMENS, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to extend the benefit of the act to regulate intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers, approved the 30th of June, 1834, to the people of the State of Texas, and others; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

On the motion of Mr. WHITCOMB, the bill introduced by him yesterday, entitled "A bill granting the right of way and making a grant land to the States of Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa, in aid of the construction of a railroad from Wabash to the Missouri river," was read a second time and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

GOVERNMENT WAREHOUSES.

Mr. HUNTER submitted the following resolution for consideration; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to the Senate the number of public warehouses now leased by the Government, the places where leased, the periods for which they are leased, the terms upon which they are leased, and the amount expended upon them for labor and other purposes.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. PEARCE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings be instructed to inquire into the expediency of enlarging, repairing, and refitting the principal apartment heretofore occupied by the Library of Congress, so that it may be entirely fire-proof and capable of further extension in harmony with the general plan of the Capitol, upon the removal of the Senate and House of Representatives and their offices to the wings of the Capitol.

NAVAL APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law that appointments in the naval service of the United States shall hereafter be for a limited time, which shall be expressed in the commissions.

CAPTAIN WILLIAM K. LATIMER.

The Senate, on the motion of Mr. HALE, proceeded to consider the following resolution, reported from the Committee on Printing:

"Resolved, That two thousand additional copies of the charges and specifications, before the court of inquiry against William K. Latimer, a captain in the Navy of the United States, and the accompanying papers, which were ordered to be printed, be printed for the use of the Senate."

Mr. BORLAND. I simply wish to call the attention of the Senate to the character of that resolution. The proceedings of the court of inquiry, in the case of Captain Latimer, were called for by a resolution of the Senate, and when they were received they were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. The usual number of copies of those papers was ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate, on the recommendation of the Committee on Naval Affairs. This is a proposition to print two thousand additional copies. The Committee on Printing directed me to report in favor of the resolution, and I have done so. My opinion, however, as an individual Senator is, that the resolution ought not to be adopted. I say this without reference to the merits of the question involved in the papers, but simply because I think it is contrary to the rule usually acted on, that is, to refuse to print additional numbers of copies of papers of this sort. They relate, as I understand it, simply to a personal quarrel between individuals, and the printing of the papers will be, to that extent, taking a part by the Senate in the quarrel. No public interest, that I can see, is to be advanced by the publication. If the parties desire that the public should be more generally informed on the subject, let them print these copies at their own expense, and send them out to the country.

Mr. HALE. I ask the attention of the Senate, and I will not occupy its time for five minutes. I have read these papers. They relate to two of the most important questions that can come before the Senate. They relate to the government of the Navy. They relate to the rights of junior officers, under alleged oppression by their superiors. It must be manifest to everybody that they are questions of high interest. I do not pretend to pass an opinion upon the merits involved in the case; but I tell the Senate, that these papers relate vitally, to the rights of every junior officer under a superior. And what strikes my mind with more force is, they relate to the rights of every private seaman in the Navy of the United States. They have been submitted to the Naval Committee, and ordered to be printed. The usual number has been ordered to be printed; and it seems to me, on questions of this magnitude, if we have a report of the Committee on Printing, it is but a small matter to print two thousand copies of an official document, relating to the most vital questions that affect the American Navy, and not, as I understand, to a mere private and personal quarrel.

Mr. ATCHISON. I have but one word to say in relation to this matter. I suppose this document was communicated, in the first place, for the action of the Senate, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate. In addition to that, it is now proposed to print two thousand extra copies for distribution. For whose information are these two thousand copies to be printed? Is it for the information of the American people at large? Or is it for the information of a few select individuals, outside of the Senate Chamber, outside of the walls of Congress? I would like these questions to be answered.

If this is a question for the action of the Senate, it is proper and right that the document should be printed, in order that each Senator may examine it for himself. But I can see no earthly good to be effected by printing these additional numbers. I do not know what portion of the community is to be enlightened by the printing of two thousand additional copies of this document. If it is a document of high importance; if it is one in which the American people feel a deep interest, ten thousand or twenty thousand copies should be printed. It seems to me that the motion does not go far enough, on this account. The fact that the resolution only proposes to print two thousand copies satisfies my mind that it is for the purpose of distributing this document among a very few. I have not read the document, and from what has been said of it, I cannot conceive that it would be of the least interest to any portion of the people of the State of Missouri. It may be of interest to the officers of the Navy, for aught I know. It may be of interest to persons connected with the Navy. If so, ascertain the number actually necessary, and place them at the disposal of the Secretary of the Navy, for distribution. For my own part, I do not desire to be troubled with documents of this character. If this resolution should be adopted, I suppose my distributive share would be one sixtieth part of two thousand. What disposition to make of such a number I do not know.

Mr. HALE. I am exceedingly sorry to meet this opposition. I believe that yesterday we ordered five thousand extra copies to be printed of the geological survey of the State of Iowa. That is a matter certainly more local than this. We have printed extra copies of documents about everything under heaven; and, not satisfied with printing documents about everything under heaven, we have gone into the clouds, and printed extra numbers of documents containing speculations upon storms, for whose information I know not; for the action of what body I know not.

If the Senate will look into this document, they will find it as I stated; it relates to vital and important questions pending before the country: the rights of junior officers under superiors, and the rights of sailors. I carefully avoided, when I was up before, expressing any opinion on the merits of the controversy involved in this case, because it seems to me, that if there ever was a single document that ought to command the respectful consideration of the Senate, and ought to induce them to print such a number of copies as would enable this question to be understood, it is this one, which relates to the rights, the interests, the protection, and guardianship of a class of American citizens, who are without protection, and without guardianship, if they do not find it in the legislation of Congress. I refer to the sailors. The question of their rights is before the Senate. Here is a document containing the proceedings of a court of inquiry, touching that very matter. Here is a report showing what the action of the Government has been on that very question. Here is a report which shows the construction which the head of the Department puts upon the administration of the law in that particular. Upon a question of this sort, when we ask to have such a document printed, it is objected to. The honorable Senator from Missouri finds fault that we have not asked for a larger number. Perhaps if I had been brought up in a larger part of the country, where the boundaries of States are larger, and the rivers are larger, and everything is larger, I might possibly have inculcated larger ideas, and asked for the printing of ten thousand copies; but I come from a modest part of the country; and, therefore, when I ask for the printing of a small number of copies, I hope that this fact may not be made to prejudice the claim which I make, if it is small.

Mr. BERRIEN. Mr. President, assuming that this document contains those important questions, which it is said by the Senator from New Hampshire are embraced in it, his argument is perfectly conclusive to prove that the Senate ought to inform themselves of the contents of these papers. If they really do involve questions which are important to the rights and interests of officers of the Navy, and of the sailors belonging to that arm of the country's service, it behooves the Senate to inform themselves of these questions; and if it be necessary to regulate their legislation according to the information which is communicated, it is the duty of the Senate to require that they should be printed. But the argument of the Senator from New Hampshire does not proceed a single step, unless we mean, according to what seems to be the propensity of the day, to look beyond this Senate Chamber for legislation, and invoke instruction from without. I do not perceive that there is any, the slightest ground, for the expenditure which is proposed to be incurred on this occasion. Relying upon the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire, I should think it my duty to adhere to the original recommendation of the Committee on Naval Affairs. Upon their recommendation this document was printed for the use of the Senate; and I intend to inform myself of its contents for the guidance of my judgment; but I do not feel that I am under any obligation to distribute two thousand copies of this document among the people of the United States to invoke their aid in the formation of my opinion. I am opposed to the resolution.

Mr. PEARCE. I should like to know whether it is proposed to publish not only the charges and the finding of the court, and the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy, but also the evidence in the case?

Mr. BORLAND. No, sir.

Mr. PEARCE. I should still like to know precisely what it is that is to be published. I cannot understand what we are to publish from the reading of the resolution.

Mr. BORLAND. It is not proposed to publish the testimony at all. That is all to be left out.

Mr. PEARCE. It may possibly be necessary for the vindication of the officer charged, that his defence should be printed with this document. I cannot tell what ought to be printed until I see the papers. Unless we can know exactly the state of the case, I am opposed to this printing.

Mr. BORLAND. I will state to the Senator that the resolution does not propose to publish the testimony at all. It leaves out a large portion of the report, and it seems to me that if the purpose is to enlighten the public in regard to the matter, the whole of the proceedings and testimony should be published. We should thus involve the publication of a very large book, for this is one of the largest documents that has ever come before us.

Mr. HALE. How large a pamphlet will this make?

Mr. BORLAND. About one hundred pages.

Mr. STOCKTON. I desire to say that I cannot see the propriety of publishing a document now before the Senate for its action. I may be wrong, but it does appear to me that as we are going to act upon the subject, all that is necessary for us is to have the papers printed for our own use.

The PRESIDENT. That has already been ordered.

Mr. RUSK. I should have voted against this proposition at any rate, believing it entirely useless to add to our expenditure and delay other necessary printing. But when I learn that the testimony upon which the papers were founded is to be left out, I certainly cannot be guilty of such gross injustice towards this officer, who seems to be assailed by the Senator from New Hampshire, of putting part of the proceedings before the community and leaving out the testimony. I cannot consent to publishing only that objectionable matter which I understand the Senator from New Hampshire to desire to spread out before the country, certainly not for the information of the country. The ordinary number—some three hundred copies—have already been printed for the use of the Senate. I do not wish the inflammable matter to which the Senator alludes sent out as part and parcel of the proceedings, for I consider that this document will be inflammable matter without the testimony upon which the findings of the court were made.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Texas misunderstands me entirely if he understood me as assailing any officer. I stated expressly that I would not state my opinion on the merits of the case one way or the other.

Mr. RUSK. Did not the Senator say that he desired to place before the country the construction placed upon the law by the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. RUSK. If that is not conveying an insinuation against an officer, I misunderstand language.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senator will be at a loss to find for whom censure is intended or implied. I said that here was the construction which I understood the Secretary of the Navy to put on the administration of that part of the law. I carefully avoided expressing any opinion, and, indeed, I cannot say that I have any opinion on the merits of the particular controversy involved in this case. I only say that the Senate should act informedly on the matter. I have no interest in this matter. I have no friend involved in it at all.

Mr. MANGUM. This is a very small matter. I am opposed to the publication of this additional number of copies of this document, and I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the history of the Committee on Printing. Sir, that committee was raised for the purpose of diminishing unnecessary and extravagant expenditure in regard to the public printing; and the first year it was in operation, of an equal session with the session preceding of the same length, the expenditure for the public printing was reduced from $39,000 to $14,000. I regret to see that we are running into ancient extravagance. I think we ought to adhere to the recommendation of the committee in most cases, especially when they refuse to publish additional numbers of these documents. We print a vast deal of matter here that is of no interest to anybody. As far as is necessary for our legislation here, we have already printed the usual number of these documents. On questions of this sort, involving flogging in the Navy and discipline generally, it may be a desire to scatter such a document in some portions of the country to produce agitation and to annoy Senators with petitions on the subject of which the petitioners know very little practically. I hope the Senate will refuse the printing of these additional copies.

The resolution was rejected.

NAVY-YARD AT SAN FRANCISCO.

On the motion of Mr. BADGER, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill to establish a navy-yard and dépôt on the Bay of San Francisco, in California, and for other purposes.

Mr. BADGER stated that his object in calling for the consideration of this bill was, that he might have the opportunity to submit several amendments for the purpose of having them printed.

The amendments having been submitted,

On motion by Mr. GWIN, the further consideration of the bill was postponed till to-morrow.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

Mr. BRADBURY. I desire to call up the bill to provide for the ascertainment and satisfaction of claims of American citizens for spoiliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801, for the purpose of making it a special order for some future day. I gave notice, at the time I reported the bill, that I should propose to have some day assigned for its special consideration. It is a matter of so great importance that I think it should be taken up now for the purpose I have indicated.

Mr. RUSK. I think our experience with regard to the assignment of a particular day for the consideration of matters which Senators desire to be made special orders, shows that the effect is to delay them and our other business also. It promotes debate much more when bills come up out of their regular order. I think every one will agree with me, that the result has been as I have stated; and I hope, therefore, the motion may not prevail. I shall vote against it.

Mr. WALKER. I entertain the same opinion with regard to the assignment of particular days for the consideration of particular bills, which the honorable Senator from Texas has expressed. I do not intend to ask for the assignment of any particular day for the consideration of any measure in which I am particularly interested. I am willing that any bill, in which my State is specially interested, shall take its regular turn on the Calendar; and if it gets no action, I am willing to let it take its chance in its order. There are individual States which are as much interested in the passage of other bills as the claimants for indemnity for French spoiliations are for the passage of this bill, and the representatives of these States may, with as much propriety, ask that their favorite measures shall be set down as special orders as these claimants. I hope we have got through with special orders. I agree with the Senator from Texas, that special orders provoke debate. Members come here prepared to make speeches, and their speeches touch somebody who feels bound to reply, and that reply begets another, and so the debate is continued for a long time. I hope this bill will not be made a special order, and that no other special order will be made.

Mr. BRADBURY. This bill is certainly one of very great importance. It is one upon which I suppose every Senator will desire to be called to vote, and my purpose in making it a special order was, that we might know beforehand when the subject was to come before us for consideration. It is usual to give some consideration of this kind to bills of so much importance, involving so much general interest. I believe it will not lead to any increase of debate; but, on the contrary, that debate will thereby be lessened. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will agree to the motion.

Mr. GWIN. It is because this is a bill of great importance that I am opposed to making it a special order. I am anxious to take up the Calendar, and to clear it of all bills as they stand there in regular succession. I wish to proceed with the business of the Senate, and I feel assured that by refusing to make this a special order, and proceeding with the Calendar, we shall accelerate business; because gentlemen, understanding that to be the rule will push the business, in order that the particular bills in which they have an interest may be reached at an earlier day* I have no desire to delay action upon this bill. On the contrary, I agree with the Senator from Maine that this bill is one of great importance, and I wish to have it acted upon as early as possible. But this I think will be best attained by permitting the bill to retain its present place on the Calendar, while at the same time great advantage will result to the business of the Senate generally by adopting that course.

Mr. BADGER. Every day furnishes additional evidence of the propriety of an amendment to the rules of the Senate, which I submitted last session of Congress, and that is, that all questions in relation to the taking up of bills should be decided without debate. Now, all that I ask of gentlemen is, do not let us consume the whole day in debating whether we will take up this bill.

Mr. BORLAND. I think if nothing else had ever been said against this practice of making special assignments, there is one argument which ought to be conclusive against it. That argument has been repeated so often, that it has now become perfectly familiar to every member of the Senate, and it is, that in very many instances, more time has been consumed on the question of taking up bills than has been consumed on the merits of the bills themselves, and the question of their passage. For that reason, I think that the impolicy of continuing such a course must be demonstrated to the Senate. And, sir, there is another matter which I would mention as a reason why this practice of making special orders has been resorted to, and thus far sustained. I know of no other reason that is usually assigned for making such disposition of a bill, than that it has some special merit over other bills, and on that ground precedence is claimed for it. I suppose, however, that there is no Senator who brings forward a bill here who does not consider it as of sufficient importance to claim the speedy attention of the Senate. Now, sir, there are between fifty and one hundred important bills before the Senate at this time, and yet matters which I certainly do not consider of much importance, have been made special orders, and a day has been assigned to each of them. And what advantage do we gain by this? We certainly gain nothing in favor of the particular bill, if we are to take equally and fairly the measures which are brought forward by Senators on this floor. So far as my short experience has taught me, I am satisfied that this course of making special orders has delayed the business of the Senate, while it has done nothing to advance the progress of the particular bill, the furtherance of which it was intended to promote. Here is an illustration: How much time have we lost here this morning, in the mere discussion of whether we will take up a bill? The amendment, to which the Senator from North Carolina alluded, was not adopted—

Mr. BADGER. I know it was not.

Mr. BORLAND. And I have made these remarks to strengthen the remark made by that Senator, and with the view of putting a stop, if possible, to the practice of making special orders.

Mr. BELL. I have one word that I wish to say, not upon this question, because by parliamentary law it is not a debatable question, and I deny that any gentleman is able to show any parliamentary law, or anything more than a loose practice which has grown up in this body, to warrant any debate upon this question. I never knew in my experience in the other House, that debate could be extended further, except by general consent, than when a member desired to give priority to any bill, to give him the opportunity of stating his reasons why it should be taken up out of its regular order. If another member rose to speak upon the question, it was out of order for him to proceed, except by general consent. This discussion is clearly out of order, and it is clearly out of the indulgence of the body that such a practice has grown up. I know it is very difficult for you, Mr. President, to restrain members when so many desire to express their sentiments and opinions for or against a proposition of this kind; but I must maintain that it is now out of order. I have not said anything except in vindication of what I consider to be the parliamentary order of the body. If Senators choose to indulge in a licentious debate of this description, it is their own fault, but it is out of order.

Mr. BADGER. Following the example of my friend who has just taken his seat, and endeavoring to add some reasons to those offered by the honorable Senator from Arkansas why the amendment of the rules which I proposed should have been adopted, I will not say a word about this proposition. My friend thinks he has escaped all the difficulty of an irregular debate, because he has made a speech, and did not say one word upon the question before the Senate. [Laughter.] Now, I will follow his example, because I know I shall then be in order; for he says it is out of order to speak upon the question before the Senate, and you avoid all difficulty by speaking upon questions not under consideration by this body. I will follow that example, and in the first place, I beg to suggest to the Senate that our rules specify the questions which shall be decided without debate, and that I do not know any other parliamentary body whose rules can add to the number of unobjectionable questions in this body; and every question, which is not by a rule of the Senate, or by the long and well-established usage of the Senate—which supplies the place of an express rule—declared to be not debatable, is of course debatable. The right of debate exists in every case, except when it is excluded by an express rule.

Now, when my friend speaks of "licentious debate" here, I take occasion to say, that though such debate may exist in other bodies, it is totally unknown here.

I wish to say, that from the little experience we have had to-day, added to the days upon days and weeks upon weeks that have been consumed, during the five years that I have had the honor of serving in this body, in determining whether we should take up one question or another in order to give it precedence over some other, I am induced to hope that some gentleman of greater powers of persuasion than I possess may yet introduce a rule which will declare that the question of priority shall be decided without debate. This question ought to have been decided long since, one way or the other. If I may be pardoned for the suggestion, I will say that I see no impropriety in giving precedence to claims of this sort to which this bill refers. They are of half a century's standing, and have been discussed and rediscussed in both branches of Congress for twenty-five years, and the most able reports have been repeatedly made upon them in both Houses of Congress, uniformly favorable. The bill has once passed both Houses of Congress, authorizing their payment, and it was rejected by the Executive for three reasons, one of which was, that we were at war, and not in a situation to pay our debts. That reason has passed away. We have, according to a report made at the beginning of the session, a surplus of twenty millions of dollars, and I think this is a very good time to bring forward these claims and pass them, and show that the reason given before was true, that we needed the money for fighting and could not pay our debts; but that we now have it, and will apply it to satisfy just demands.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on postponing the special order.

Mr. BORLAND. On that question I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HAMLIN. By your kindness, Mr. President, I have been allowed to take from your table the list of the present special orders, and by that list I find, first of all, the bill offered by the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. JONES,] in relation to a grant of lands for the making of a railroad in that State.

The PRESIDENT. That is the unfinished business.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, sir, it was a special order, and became the unfinished business. Next we have a resolution, offered by a gentleman who is no longer a member of this body—a very practical resolution, sir, [a laugh]—the resolution offered by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. FORT,] on the subject of the compromise. The next is a bill to improve the navigation of the Upper Mississippi; and then another, in the shape of a joint resolution in regard to the printing of Seventh Census. Now these subjects have all been wrested from their order on the Calendar, and made special orders. I think that my friend from Arkansas, [Mr. BORLAND,] as well as my friend who sits before me, [Mr. WALKER,] both favored the propositions making them special orders.

Mr. WALKER. You are wrong in that supposition.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator from Wisconsin says I am wrong. It may be so, but such was my impression. At all events, I think that those who are so devoted to the measure for giving away two millions of acres of the public land, will not deny to this class of claims which, as the Senator from North Carolina has truly said, have been of more than half a century standing, the right of being placed in an equally favorable position. I think, too, that those who have aided in this bill—and the thing is not alone, nor are those special orders without their particular friends, and I think that the early improvement of the navigation of the Upper Mississippi, and the question of the printing of the Seventh Census, are subjects of importance—may be expected to join in giving to this measure a place on the Calendar, which shall only ask the action of the Senate affirmatively or negatively, so that if adopted it may go to the House of Representatives, and be there adopted or rejected, as that body may decide. I have been one of a small minority of the whole Senate who have from time to time urged an adherence to the Calendar, so that business may come up in its order, and on this question I have been voted down on every occasion; and I now ask, and I trust that I may ask with some confidence, those Senators who have obtained their special orders to allow this question to have a position equally favorable with their own.

Mr. BRADBURY. I desire to add to the remarks of my colleague, the statement that this bill stands next—or nearly next—on the Calendar to the bill granting lands to the State of Iowa, so that, had that bill not been made a special order, this one would have followed almost immediately afterwards, and it would be doing no more than the same measure of justice that has been done to that bill, to make it a special order. It would come up at an early day, without any assignment; but we wish to see this bill taken up and acted upon, if possible, on the first day that it may be brought before the Senate for consideration. It is not my purpose to consume a long time in the consideration of this bill, and for that reason I thought it might be deemed proper to have a day designated for it, so that we might have a full Senate, and have it disposed of without unnecessary consumption of time.

Mr. BORLAND. In response to the Senator from Maine, with regard to the order of business on the Calendar, I desire to call attention to the Calendar, by which it will be perceived that the bill granting land to the State of Iowa, to aid in the construction of a railroad, is number one, and in the order of business is number twenty-two; that to provide for the ascertainment and satisfaction of claims for spoliation by the French, is number fifty-nine in the order of business, and number sixty-four in the order of bills presented to the Senate. The bill granting land to Iowa stands at the head of the list, where it stood at the beginning of the session.

Mr. HALE. It is with great reluctance that I separate myself from the friends of this measure on the question now before the Senate. I have uniformly voted for the bill, and shall continue to do so; for I believe it is one of the few cases in which I can honestly vote money out of the Treasury, because I think it is to pay honest debts. But I shall vote against the motion to take up the bill out of its order, for the reason given by the honorable Senator from Maine; for I do not want to put it in the same company with the resolution offered by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. FORT,] nor the one relating to the printing of the Census, and other measures, which have been made special orders. I have very rarely voted to make special orders; I have contended with the Senator from Maine, in a small minority to enforce the rules, and adhere to the Calendar. I shall vote against all special orders, and if the Senate will vote with me, I will vote to lay all bills on the table till they are reached in their regular order. When this bill comes up, I will give it all the support I can, but I cannot vote to take it up out of its order.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I suppose, Mr. President, that there is no more decided enemy to these French spoliation claims than I am; but the courtesy which is asked by the advocates of this bill is one which I feel bound to concede to them. I wish them to have an opportunity, at an early day, of trying the strength of this measure; and in view of its magnitude, and the length of time that it has been pending, I shall vote for taking it up now, in order that that disposition may be made of it which is asked for.

The question was taken upon the motion to take up the bill, and resulted—yeas 26, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Bayard, Berrien, Bradbury, Clarke, Cooper, Davis, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Downs, Felch, Fish, Foot, Hamlin, James, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, Mallory, Miller, Penrose, Smith, Soule, Sprance, Sumner, Upham, and Wade—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Borland, Clemens, Dawson, Douglas, Gwin, Hale, Houston, Hunter, King, McRae, Mangum, Norris, Rusk, Sebastian, Walker, and Whitcomb—17.

So the motion to take up the bill was agreed to.

Mr. BRADBURY. I now move to postpone the further consideration of the bill till the first Monday of February next, at one o'clock, and that it be made the special order for that day.

Mr. FELCH. I would suggest to the Senator from Maine to postpone it for a longer period.

Mr. BORLAND. There is another special order appointed for that day.

Mr. FELCH. One of the members of the committee, I believe, wishes to make a minority report. I refer to the Senator from Indiana, who is now sick. I would, therefore, suggest the third Monday in February.

The PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan make a motion to that effect?

Mr. FELCH. I will make that motion.

The PRESIDENT. The question will first be taken on the longest day.

The question was then taken on the motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill till the third Monday in February; and it was decided in the affirmative.

RAILROADS IN IOWA.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the unfinished business of the preceding day, the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. UNDERWOOD to the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands to the "bill granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the State of Iowa, in aid of the construction of certain railroads in said State."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HUNTER. I was not present yesterday when this amendment was offered, nor had I the good fortune to hear the speech of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD.] If I understand the amendment it is to propose an equal distribution of the public lands among all the States of the Union.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It proposes a pro rata distribution among States which have not received public lands, according to the population, to a certain extent. All the States omitted in that amendment which I offered have received a larger portion than the States provided for in the amendment. They are a great deal in advance of the other States already in the amount they have received, and in order to make the amount given to the States named in the amendment equal to that received by the new States, not mentioned in the amendment, I propose to give about 14,500,000 acres to the States which I have named in my amendment; the other States having received much more.

Mr. HUNTER. I merely rise to state that I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, although I shall vote against the bill, whether that amendment is adopted or not.

Mr. ATCHISON. I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator from Kentucky, and that is, why he has left out of his amendment the State of Texas? She has never received any of the public lands.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state the reason, for the satisfaction of the Senator from Missouri, which operated upon me in doing so. I thought that the grant of $10,000,000 to the State of Texas, and the further grant of thirty thousand square miles of land, which she did not own, was a great deal more to Texas in land, and money too, than we ever could expect to get for the old States, from any portion of the public lands. That is the reason why I left it out. [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMNER addressed the Senate, in favor of the bill. A report of his speech will be found in the Appendix.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 29, 1852.

NEW SERIES....No. 26.

Mr. FELCH. Mr. President, I desire to say something on this bill, having reported it from the Committee on Public Lands. As the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has proposed an amendment, which in point of fact changes the whole policy of the system proposed by the original bill, it becomes a matter of a great deal of importance. Before saying anything on the subject, I should like to refer to some statistics, given us yesterday in the speech of the honorable Senator from Kentucky.

If it be agreeable to the Senator from Iowa, who has charge of the bill, I would move to postpone its further consideration until the day after to-morrow, that I may have an opportunity of referring to the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky, which have not yet been published. The amendment has just been laid on our tables, and I would like to examine it. I would, therefore, suggest to the Senator from Iowa, the propriety of allowing the matter to lie over until the day after to-morrow, or some subsequent day. I move to postpone the further consideration of this subject until the day after to-morrow, (Thursday.)

The motion was agreed to, and then, on motion, The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 27, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. Mr. BUTLER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to know if there is any question before the House?

PUBLIC PRINTING.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business of yesterday is the business in order, being the report of the Committee on Printing, and upon which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. NABERS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is it not in order for me to make a motion to go into Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It will be in order, if the gentleman from Mississippi will yield the floor for that purpose; but not in order otherwise.

Mr. HOUSTON. I appeal to the House, I appeal to the gentleman from Mississippi, to permit this question to pass over until to-morrow, or some subsequent morning, and allow me to make a motion that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with the view to dispose of the bill upon which debate was closed last Saturday, providing for the payment of the last installment of the indemnity to Mexico. The debate has been closed upon that bill, and all that is necessary is to go into committee, and finish it. I think it ought to be done; and therefore I feel bound, in the discharge of my duty, to make that appeal to the House and to the gentleman.

Mr. McMULLIN. I suggest to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON], and also to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. NABERS], if it is practicable at this stage of our proceedings to do so, to refer the subject, which comes up as a matter of course, to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Then the object of the gentleman from Alabama can be effected; and the gentleman from Mississippi will have much more latitude in committee than he can have in the House. I desire to know of the Speaker, if it is now competent to submit the motion by the consent of the gentleman from Mississippi?

The SPEAKER. The motion to refer is in order. The gentleman from Mississippi, however, is entitled to the floor.

Mr. McMULLIN. Then I ask my friend from Mississippi to yield me the floor for the purpose of submitting that motion.

Mr. NABERS. Very well.

Mr. McMULLIN. I have obtained the consent of the gentleman from Mississippi to move that the subject be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and upon that question I demand the previous question.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. I desire to suggest, for the benefit of my colleague—for he may not be aware of it—that, if he yield the floor in this way, he would not be entitled to it in the committee, and therefore could not go on then without general consent.

Mr. VENABLE. He will get it, of course.

Voices. He will have it by general consent.

Mr. GORMAN. I rise to inquire what the question is?

The SPEAKER. The Chair was about to propound the question. It is: That the joint resolution reported by the gentleman from Indiana, from the Committee on Printing, be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and upon that question the previous question has been demanded.

Mr. ORR. I desire to inquire, what would be the effect of sustaining the previous question? Suppose the House, after the previous question has been sustained, refuses to refer this resolution to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I ask if it would not bring the House to a vote immediately upon the passage of the resolution, as it is, without further discussion upon it?

The SPEAKER. That would be the effect.

Mr. McMULLIN. Mr. Speaker, I—

The SPEAKER. The Chair must interpose, and say to gentlemen that this conversation is entirely out of order.

Mr. McMULLIN. I desire to know what will be the practical effect of the motion which I have submitted?

The SPEAKER. It will be to bring the House to a vote—first, upon referring, and if that be negatived, then upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. McMULLIN. Without further discussion?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. McMULLIN. Then I must beg leave to withdraw the call for the previous question; and I appeal to the House, upon all sides, to allow this motion to prevail; and when the subject shall have been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I hope that, by general consent, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. NABERS] will be allowed to proceed, and occupy the floor with a view to reply to the extraordinary speech of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE.]

Mr. VENABLE. I hope he will reply.

Mr. McMULLIN. I wish, before I take my seat, to withdraw the call for the previous question, and then make an appeal to the House to let the subject be referred as proposed.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask the gentleman if he desires to strangle the proposition, and kill it?

Mr. McMULLIN. So far from it, I desire to have the resolution discussed, and finally passed.

Mr. GORMAN. I beg of him, then, not to persist in his motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. That would be its grave, out of which it could never be resurrected.

Mr. STANLY. Will the gentleman allow me a word?

Mr. McMULLIN. For explanation.

Mr. STANLY. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. HOUSTON] is desirous that the House shall proceed with the important business of the country, and I suggest that we postpone the consideration of this printing resolution to some day next week. It will then come up again. What difficulty is there in the way to this mode of proceeding?

Mr. McMULLIN made a response not heard by the reporter.

Mr. FOWLER. I rise to a question of order. I wish to know what is the question before this House. It appears to me that all of this talk is out of order; but perhaps I do not understand the question.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the adoption of the resolution reported by the Committee on Printing. The gentleman from Virginia called for the previous question; and having withdrawn it, he is now discussing the general proposition.

Mr. FOWLER. If I understood right, he only obtained the floor by the permission of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. NABERS], to make the motion to commit the resolution. If that is so, is it in order for him to hold the floor for discussion?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order for the gentleman from Virginia to deprive the gentleman from Mississippi of the floor, who is entitled to address the committee upon the merits of the resolution.

Mr. FOWLER. I then make this question of order, that it is not in order for the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] to discuss any point, and that he can only submit the motion for which the gentleman from Mississippi yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the gentleman from Virginia obtained the floor for the purpose of submitting the motion to commit; and that if he withdraw it, he loses his right to the floor.

Mr. McMULLIN. As the result of this matter, if my motion prevails, is involved in doubt, I will, with the approbation of the gentleman from Mississippi, withdraw my motion of reference, which will entitle him to the floor.

Mr. NABERS. Mr. Speaker, allow me to say that I have no unusual anxiety to address the House. I did not desire to urge myself forward before this House, but it struck me with a great deal of force that the various attempts made to obtain the floor would indicate that gentlemen have something peculiar—some extraordinary views—to present. There is another consideration. I desire to reply to the remarks which fell yesterday from the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE.] It was with the view of enabling me to reply to him properly that I desired that the House would go into Committee of the Whole; for I am fully aware of the fact, that if I am expected to reply to that speech in order, it is totally impossible. The impression was universal yesterday that the observations of the gentleman from North Carolina were out of order, and hence it is out of the question, as I apprehend, for me to follow him in the course he saw proper to take without being guilty, to a greater or less extent, of violating the rules of the House. I do not desire to do that. I do not desire to do it now, because I am aware of the fact, that if one gentleman claims the right of proceeding out of order—if one gentleman claims the right upon a given proposition to tell you about things in general—that any other member may claim the like privilege, and hence it would be totally impossible for us to have the least order or the least propriety in our discussions. Then while I know that some remarks which I may offer may not be in strict accordance with the rules of the House, I trust that the same kind indulgence will be extended towards me that was given to the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE.] I shall briefly advert to the considerations growing out of the resolution and amendments now under discussion; and if gentlemen expect to call me to order, if I should take occasion to talk about myself, I hope he will tell me so now before I begin.

Mr. MEADE. If the gentleman will permit me, I will suggest, that if he is permitted to go on out of order, it must be expected that every gentleman in the House will do the same thing, and we shall then be virtually in Committee of the Whole. We had better preserve the rules of the House by going into Committee of the Whole. If that be the understanding of the House, I have no disposition that anybody who chooses may not discuss the question; but I know very well that when the House gets tired of the debate—members pursuing the same line of argument—it will be cut off; and I therefore give notice to the House that I will call to order, when necessary, and that I would have done so yesterday, when the gentleman from North Carolina was speaking, had I been in the Hall.

Mr. McMULLIN. I am very sorry that my colleague was not in the Hall.

Mr. NABERS. I had better, then, proceed. I do not intend to get a great way out of order.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I barely rise to say, by way of suggestion to the gentleman and to the Chair, that I doubt if there was anything said yesterday in the debate strictly out of order. Gentlemen seem to suppose that when in Committee of the Whole they are allowed a greater latitude of debate than when in the House. In that they are mistaken. The same rules govern the debate. When in the Committee of the Whole upon appropriation and other bills, custom has allowed a large latitude to gentlemen, but the parliamentary law is the same—the rules of the House govern us. Now, I submit to the Chair and the House whether everything in connection with this proposition pertaining to the ability and suitability of the selection of these gentlemen to execute this part of the printing, is not legitimate in discussion. I am not expressing any opinion as to the merits of these gentlemen, but I submit that it is a fair subject-matter of debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair on yesterday did not feel disposed to call the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VENABLE] to order, when it was the evident desire of the House that he should proceed. The Chair would have pursued the same course to-day with reference to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. NABERS:] but when a gentleman rising in his place, calls to order, it is the duty of the Chair to confine gentlemen to the subject-matter under debate.

Mr. NABERS. I am fully aware of that, and shall not complain if called to order for not strictly conforming to the rules of the House. If called to order, I will feel inclined to take my seat until the question is decided. Now, I was about to proceed, on yesterday evening, to state what I deemed to be the reason of the peculiar hostility manifested by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VENABLE] against the editors of the Washington Union newspaper, I propose to give these reasons briefly now, and trust they will be satisfactory to a large proportion of gentlemen occupying seats upon this floor.

Mr. ORR. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. NABERS. I was about to talk about Messrs. Donelson & Armstrong. I believe they are named in the resolution.

Mr. ORR. I call the gentleman to order for irrelevancy. The gentleman stated that he proposed to discuss the reasons of the hostility of the member from North Carolina [Mr. VENABLE] to the editors of the Union. I submit that it is not germane to the question now before the House for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is in order.

Mr. MEADE. Allow me to make a suggestion. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. NABERS] is desirous of discussing a question which must open a wide field of debate. I would suggest to him, if he is desirous of giving himself a full latitude, and allow the powers of his mind to operate without being cramped by apprehensions of the rules of the House, and of being called to order, to let the discussion take place upon some other question in Committee of the Whole. Then he will have ample time to reply to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE.] I will suggest another thing. If it is his purpose, or that of any other man, to break up the present harmony that exists in the Democratic party, it is very well to let this discussion go on, and I will tell you why. It is well known that the Democratic party are—

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I call the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEADE] to order. He is not stating his point of order. [Laughter.]

Mr. MEADE. It was a suggestion I was about to make, that he was not going on with the discussion upon this bill.

Mr. STANTON. I thought you had called him to order.

Mr. STEPHENS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEADE] a question.

Mr. MEADE. I would rather reply to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. NABERS.] I cannot answer a question until I have made my own suggestions.

Mr. STEPHENS. I would ask the gentleman whether he believes that the harmony of the Democratic party depends upon giving this job to Donelson & Armstrong? [Laughter.]

Mr. MEADE. I thought the gentleman was about—

Mr. SWEETSER. I call the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEADE] to order. My point of order is, that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. NABERS] cannot yield the floor to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEADE] for a general discussion of this question.

Mr. MEADE. I am not going into a discussion, but only to make a suggestion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEADE] sought the floor for the purpose of making a suggestion to the member from Mississippi, [Mr. NABERS,] that gentleman having yielded the floor for that purpose. The Chair does not think that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEADE] is out of order.

Mr. MEADE. The suggestion I make is simply this: that the Democratic party are agreed in relation to the powers of the Government and the rights of the States. They differ about the remedy in case those rights are invaded. Now, I suggest to him whether there is any good to grow out of the discussion of a question which ought to be postponed, at least until that question arises, by some event that is yet to take place? If we choose to make two parties out of the Democratic party in regard to a remedy for the preservation of the rights of the States, while we are all agreed about those rights and the powers of the General Government, this discussion may go on. If it is politic for us to reserve that question till the time arrives, then I would suggest that it is best for us to act in harmony until it does arrive.

Mr. NABERS. I think that the very point to which the gentleman from Virginia has called my attention, would have been answered in my speech before this time. In connection with the suggestion made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEADE] I will say, that there is no member of the Democratic party, entertaining views similar to those which I hold, who has manifested the least disposition to throw a fire-brand into this Congress. It is my purpose studiously to avoid anything of the sort. But at the same time, whilst I do not propose to divide, distract, or cut into fragments, if I could, that or any other party, I cannot suffer myself or my friends to be assailed by others, who entertain particular views, without vindicating not only the sentiments which I entertain, but those of the newspapers, which entertain a similarity of sentiment. It was clearly indicated in the speech delivered by the honorable member from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE,] yesterday, that he expected to say just precisely what he pleased, and that he would denounce any man, or set of men, who might chance to differ with him. And yet if the party assailed see proper to vindicate themselves, they are to be charged with introducing fire brands into the party—they are to be charged with introducing disturbances into the harmonious action of the Democratic party. So far as I can see, without the speech of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE,] it is not so harmonious at the North as it might be. That is my deliberate opinion. I am aware of the fact, that there are questions of peculiar delicacy growing out of this resolution incidentally, and it is with pain that I allude to the strife and bitterness that characterizes or did characterize the late contests in various parts of the United States. Allow me to say, that the contest alluded to by the gentleman on yesterday—the contest which prevailed in my own gallant State—was not as to the particular course pursued by any gentleman with regard to these exciting questions, or as to the manner in which those measures were to be received, after they became the law of the land. I never made war upon any living human being, in regard to his particular views, during the pendency of these measures before Congress—

Mr. ORR. I again call the gentleman to order.

Mr. VENABLE. I hope my friend will withdraw it, and let the gentleman proceed.

Mr. ORR. I should have no objection to hear the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. NABERS] in Committee of the Whole, if he desires to reply to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE.] I should be gratified to hear him; but upon this resolution I do not think that his remarks are in order. The gentleman from North Carolina was ruled out of order yesterday. I call for the enforcement of the rules. I call the attention of the Chair to the 31st rule.

Mr. STUART. Is this question of order a debatable one?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman from Mississippi cannot under the rules discuss political contests which the people in Mississippi have had, nor the merits of the late compromise measures, with regard to the Territories, and slavery as connected with them. The Chair is bound to say that the gentleman is out of order.

Mr. CARTTER. I move that the gentleman be permitted to proceed in order.

The question was then taken and it was agreed to. Mr. FICKLIN. With the permission of my friend from Mississippi, I will suggest to him, as he has the floor, to make a motion to refer this subject to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It is evident that he cannot debate it here.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. He cannot debate it in Committee of the Whole, any more than he can here. The same rules govern the committee.

[Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"]

Mr. NABERS resumed. I dislike very much to occupy the time of the House, and really I have no very great anxiety to address it. I discover that gentlemen thoroughly misconceive the object I have in view. My object is to put an extinguisher upon all these fires of contention before I am through. My object is not to assail any one. I believe I will heed the suggestions of my friends around me. I have no feeling about it for myself. Representing, as I do, a most glorious constituency, I should love to make a speech, under the circumstances, if I were at liberty to do so. But being a new member, unacquainted with the rules of the House, and subject to constant interruption, it is impossible for me to proceed, and I therefore yield to the suggestions of my friends.

Mr. HOUSTON moved that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and on that motion he demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, on a division—ayes 95, noes 45—and the main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. GORMAN. I would inquire of the Chair whether this motion precludes me from making an argument?

The SPEAKER. At this time.

Mr. GORMAN. I mean now.

The SPEAKER. The motion would preclude the gentleman from making a speech at this time.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would suggest to the Chair that, by the rules and practice of the House, the gentleman from Indiana, as chairman of the committee that reported this proposition, is entitled to an hour speech at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts whether that rule applies to a motion of reference. There can be no doubt that the gentleman from Indiana would be entitled to be heard in case the motion to commit did not prevail; but the Chair is of opinion that he cannot be heard upon the motion to commit, all debate having been cut off by the previous question.

Mr. JONES. I suppose, then, that if the motion to commit is negatived, he will be entitled to be heard before the question is taken on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. GORMAN demanded the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

And the question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 148, nays 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, Willis Allen, Allison, John Appleton, William Appleton, Ashe, Babcock, Barrere, Bartlett, Bell, Bibbhaus, Bocoek, Bowie, Bragg, Briggs, Brooks, Albert G. Brown, George H. Brown, Buell, Burrows, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Caskey, Chandler, Chastain, Churchwell, Clark, Clingman, Colcock, Conger, Cottman, Cullom, Curtis, Daniel, George T. son, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, George G. Seymour, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, St. Martin, Stratton, Stuart, Sweetser, George W. Thompson, and Wilcox—45.

So the joint resolution was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

CLOSE OF DEBATE ON CENSUS PRINTING.

Mr. POLK offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That all debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on joint resolution No. 12, shall cease on Thursday next at two o'clock, and they shall then proceed to vote on such amendments as may be pending or offered to the same, and shall then report it to the House with such amendments as may have been agreed to by the committee.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I submit that that resolution is not in order at this time. It is not proper to offer such a resolution until the matter has been up in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and has been debated there. It has been so decided by the last Speaker. I know that fact. I remember it distinctly.

Mr. POLK. I have not surrendered the floor yet.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the resolution is in order.

Mr. STANLY. Then I move to lay it upon the table.

Mr. POLK. The gentleman from North Carolina cannot submit that motion until I yield the floor.

The SPEAKER. The question not being debatable, the gentleman from Tennessee had no right to retain the floor.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I intended to appeal from the decision of the Chair—that this resolution is now in order.

Mr. POLK. It is very strange that gentlemen upon the other side should be so anxious that the debate should progress upon this question. There must be some object—some purpose in it.

Mr. STANLY. There is. We desire to save the public money.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the resolution offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK,] closing debate upon the joint resolution just referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, is in order, and from that decision the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] appeals.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask for the reading of the rule making a resolution of that kind in order.

Mr. POLK. Will the gentleman from North Carolina state when such a resolution would be in order?

Mr. CLINGMAN. After the joint resolution had been debated in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. POLK. For how long?

A MEMBER. For one minute even.

The SPEAKER. The rule is as follows:

"The House may, at any time, by a vote of a majority of the members present, suspend the rules and orders for the purpose of going into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and also for providing for the discharge of the Committee of the Whole House, and the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, from the further consideration of any bill referred to it, after acting without debate on all amendments pending, and that may be offered."

The Chair is still of the opinion that the resolution is in order.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Will the Chair allow me to state that the ground upon which his predecessor based his decision was with reference to the words "further consideration?"

The SPEAKER. So the Chair understands.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I know that Mr. Cobb decided again and again—and so did Mr. Winthrop—that it was not in order to offer a resolution of this kind until the matter had been considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I see no reason for changing that practice.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the general power given to the House extends to the fixing of a time for closing the debate on a proposition in advance of its actual consideration in the committee.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I would inquire of the Chair, by way of suggestion to the gentleman from Tennessee, whether there is not a special order for Thursday next, and from day to day thereafter? A majority of the House cannot supersede a special order already made.

Mr. POLK. Can the gentleman from Georgia inform me what was the hour fixed for that special order?

The SPEAKER. For the entire day and from day to day thereafter until disposed of.

Mr. STEPHENS. I would suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee, that he can attain his object by modifying his resolution so as to read, that the debate shall cease in fifteen minutes, or one hour, after the committee shall take the subject up.

Mr. POLK. I will accept of that modification.

Mr. ORR. Was not an appeal taken from the decision of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. There was; but the gentleman from Tennessee has a right to modify his resolution.

Mr. HIBBARD. Is not the question now pending upon the appeal?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. HIBBARD. Then I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. POLK then modified his resolution so as to read that the debate should cease in one hour after the committee should take up the subject.

Mr. CLINGMAN. My objection still lies. The usual resolution has been, that the debate shall cease within one hour after the committee shall resume the consideration of the subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it competent for the House to order the committee even to be discharged from any consideration of the subject.

Mr. STEPHENS. There is no doubt about that, but that is under a different rule.

Mr. POLK. Will it be in order, to avoid the objection of the gentleman from North Carolina, to amend the resolution so as to make it read, "on Wednesday next at three o'clock?"

The SPEAKER. That would not obviate the objection raised by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay the appeal upon the table, and, on a count, there were—ayes 71.

Mr. CLINGMAN demanded tellers; which were ordered.

Mr. POLK demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. MEADE. I desire to inquire of the Speaker what is the state of the question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, for the information of the gentleman and the House, that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] desired to offer a resolution closing debate in Committee of the Whole upon the joint resolution in relation to the Census printing. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] made the point of order that the House could not close debate in the Committee of the Whole upon a subject until the committee had had the subject first under consideration. The Chair decided that the resolution was in order. From that decision the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] appeals. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. HIBBARD] moves to lay that appeal upon the table. The question now is, therefore, "Shall the appeal from the decision of the Chair lie upon the table?" Upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was then taken, and there were—yeas 76, nays 107; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. W. Allen, Thomas H. Bayly, Bartlett, Beale, Breckenridge, Briggs, Buell, Busby, Caldwell, T. Campbell, Chastain, Clark, Cottman, Curtis, Dawson, Dean, Dimmick, Dunham, Edmundson, Freeman, Gaylord, Gentry, Gilmore, Gorman, Green, Hamilton, Isham, G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Hart, Hascall, Hendricks, H. Henn, Hibbard, Hillyer, Howard, Ingersoll, Robert W. Johnson, J. Glancy Jones, Preston King, Kurtz, Letcher, Lockhart, Mace, Mason, McCorkle, McLanahan, McMullin, McNair, Morrison, Murray, Nabers, Olds, Andrew Parker, Samuel W. Parker, Penn, Polk, Price, Rantoul, Riddle, Robbins, Robinson, Russell, Savage, David L. Seymour, Skelton, Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, St. Martin, Stratton, Stuart, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Wilcox, and Wildrick—76.

So the House refused to lay the appeal upon the table.

The question now being, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?"

Mr. CLINGMAN called for tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. CLINGMAN, and STANTON of Tennessee, were appointed.

Mr. SKELTON. I desire to move to reconsider the vote by which the House referred this resolution to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's motion will be entertained, but the Chair thinks that the question of order must first be disposed of.

The resolution was then again read as modified.

Mr. POLK. If the resolution is still under my control, I desire again to modify it, so as to close debate in five hours, instead of one hour after the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union shall again have entered upon its consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can so modify the resolution, if the decision of the Chair is sustained; but the question of order must first be determined.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 59, nays 96.

So the decision of the Chair was overruled, and the resolution of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] was ruled out of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I now propose—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SKELTON] has the floor—if he desires to claim it—upon his motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SKELTON. I now desire to make that motion; and upon that motion I wish to make one or two remarks.

In voting for the reference of this resolution, I did so for the purpose of obtaining additional information upon the subject before it was finally disposed of. Since that reference has been made, however, my views upon that subject have undergone a change. I am satisfied that we are as well prepared to vote upon this resolution now, as we shall be ten days or ten weeks hence, or at least any future time. I am in favor of the most rigid economy in the administration of the affairs of this Government. And it is for these reasons I desire that this subject shall not be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I believe this House is now prepared knowingly and understandingly to vote upon this subject, and that if it is referred, the consequence will be unnecessary delay. The interests of this House and the country demand that this subject of public printing shall be acted upon, and acted upon speedily. It is, in my opinion, a bad economy for this House to prolong the consideration of this question from day to day, when its own business is suffering for want of the necessary printing, to give the information required in the transaction of its own business. I say that is a bad economy. Upon the other hand, it has been admitted, I believe, by all the committees which have reported to this House upon the subject, that the printer who contracted to do the public printing for this Congress, has utterly failed to comply with that contract. With this state of things before us, it becomes our duty to adopt some other system, by which the business of this House and of the country may be promoted. It becomes us to order, in some manner, the public printing necessary to accomplish our purposes, to be done as speedily as possible. The question, then, arises, Shall we delay this matter from day to day, as we have done since the commencement of this session? Shall we allow the interests of the country to suffer for the want of expeditious printing? I think not. I think it is our duty, and the public interests demand it, that we should act upon the present occasion upon this subject, in a manner that shall expedite the business before the House. It is not only necessary that we should have the printing done in time, but it is necessary that we should have it done in a proper manner. Heretofore the printing for this body has been performed in a manner that is not creditable to us. It has been printed upon bad paper, and badly printed upon the paper used.

Mr. FLORENCE. I desire that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SKELTON] will specify what printer it is who has performed his work thus badly. I desire to know whether he refers to the present contractor or the contractors for a former Congress?

Mr. SKELTON. I will state to the gentleman that, so far as my observation has extended, the public printing not only for previous Congresses, but for this House since the commencement of the present session, has been done very badly, and upon very bad paper. Will that satisfy the gentleman from Pennsylvania? I do not know who has done this printing, but, by whomsoever it has been done, I do know that it has not been done according to the contract.

Mr. FLORENCE. It satisfies me so far as the gentleman's declaration is concerned, but no further. I have my own opinion as to the conclusion which he arrives at, as to whether the public printing for the present Congress has been well executed or not. I have some of it before me, and as far as my experience goes, and according to my own judgment, I have no hesitation in saying, that it is the best public printing I ever saw, and quite as good as any I ever saw either by contract or by the publisher of any newspaper in the country.

Mr. SKELTON. I will say, for the information of this House and the country, that the gentleman who has the contract for the public printing is a stranger to me, and I have, therefore, no personal feelings in the matter whatever. I do not even know the politics of the gentleman, and therefore I have no political feelings to gratify in this matter. My only object is to have the printing of this House and of Congress done in time, and properly done. That is my only motive. I leave the quality of the paper heretofore used, and the printing heretofore done, for the consideration of the members of this House. I have given my opinion, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania has given his, and it is for the House to decide between us. I presume a majority of the gentlemen in this House will admit that the printing has not been done according to the contract entered into by the public printer. I believe that this contract system has failed; and that having failed, it becomes indispensably necessary that we should adopt some other method by which we can have this work done expeditiously. We have now a resolution before the House which looks to the accomplishment of this object. I do not believe it is necessary to refer this resolution to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

I shall insist, when the work of this House is to be done, that it shall be done in a proper manner; and while I insist upon the most rigid economy in giving out the public printing, I will say—and I believe the members of this House are willing to take the same ground—that I am in favor of giving a fair compensation for such labor, so that men shall not, after the work has been done, come before us and say they have not been paid for their work, and have lost by their jobs. I say this is all wrong. We should give them a fair compensation, and insist upon the work being done in a proper manner and at a proper time. If the printing of this House costs us a little more in money, under the arrangement proposed to be entered into by the committee who have the special charge of this matter, we shall gain in other respects more than we lose in dollars and cents in this. For while I am an advocate of economy in the matter of dollars and cents, I am an equal advocate of economy in other matters, and I call the attention of the House to the subject. I would not save money in the action of this House at the expense of intelligence. Every farthing we spend for the promotion of intelligence through our widespread and prosperous country, will return to us a hundred-fold, though it may appear to cost us a large sum in dollars and cents. The census returns should be printed as speedily as possible, and given forth to the country, to stimulate the intelligence, the industry, and enterprise of our citizens, and it will return to the coffers of the nation a hundred-fold. I will not occupy the time of this House in a lengthy and elaborate discussion of this subject, for I am aware that these topics were discussed when this subject was before under consideration. I wish merely to give my views, and my reasons for changing my vote upon this question. I desire the question shall be speedily settled, and so settled that the printing of the House may be done in the most expeditious and correct manner, and at the same time we shall be able to give to the people of this country that information which the circumstances of the present time seem to demand. I hope, sir, that this resolution will be reconsidered, and that this question will be retained in this House and speedily acted upon; and for the purpose of bringing this question to an issue, I move the previous question.

Mr. GORMAN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his call for the previous question for a short time.

Mr. SKELTON. As the chairman of the Committee on Printing desires it, I will withdraw the call, upon condition that he renews it.

Mr. ORR. I desire to know whether the previous question can be demanded upon a motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. There is no question of that. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GORMAN. The confusion upon this subject has created some little excitement, and if I could be heard I am well satisfied that I can satisfy this House—I care not to what party gentlemen belong—that this question need not, and ought not, for the public good, to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Gentlemen upon both sides of the House are calling upon the Committee on Printing—I am besieged upon the right hand and left—to have the public printing done, and have it laid before the country. You ask me, my friends ask me, what are you doing upon this subject? The point first before the House—and I stated it briefly when I got up—is, Does this printing come within the contract of the public printer? By reference to the law, it will be seen that this species of printing was expressly reserved from the contract. Every gentleman upon that committee—the distinguished Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. SMITH,] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVENS,] being members of that committee upon that side of the House—every gentleman was clearly of the opinion that there was no legal doubt upon the question at all. Then that being settled, what next? Here is a job—if you may so call it—of census printing. It has to be done, and by somebody. In the first place, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Vinton) introduced this census law in the last Congress, and he put into that census law, at the request of the authorities of Government—I am authorized to say so—and at the request of some of the members of the Administration, that this preparatory part of the census printing should be left under the control of the Superintendent of the Census Board and the Secretary of the Interior. That law so stipulated that it should be so left there. They have had all the preparatory printing done as fast as they could. Then there was another part of the printing which Congress said should be reserved, to be done according as you might direct hereafter. What printing is that? It is the compendium, making—if you publish this historical account—about two volumes of the size of the Congressional Globe. And it was shown to my friend from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS,] who made a speech yesterday, not an hour ago, by the Superintendent of the Census, that the size of this historical part, if published, would only make a volume of the size of the Congressional Globe; and if you leave off this historical part, it will make about thirty per cent. less. Am I right?

Mr. EVANS. If the honorable gentleman will allow me, the Superintendent of the Census has shown me the book. The gentleman is perfectly correct. He says it will make two volumes about the size of the American Archives. If the Compendium of Maryland will make one hundred pages, I argue from it that the whole will make about four volumes, and not thirty volumes, as stated yesterday.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. If the gentleman will allow me, I have a letter from Mr. Kennedy, the Superintendent of the Census, and will send it to the Speaker's table to be read.

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. EVANS. I will further state, that the Superintendent of the Census told me that the specimen-work for Maryland will be laid on every member's table on Saturday next; and from that every one can judge for himself, if Maryland makes one hundred pages how much the whole Union will make.

The communication from Mr. Kennedy was then read, as follows:

CENSUS BUREAU, January 27, 1852.

SIR: The census returns, as I propose to arrange them, will make two volumes (not quite so much) of the size of the American Archives. The second volume of the fourth series is a fair sample of the size. If my comments are omitted, it will reduce the size thirty per cent.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. C. G. KENNEDY,

Superintendent Census Bureau.

Hon. R. H. STANTON.

Mr. GORMAN, (resuming.) That letter from Mr. Kennedy says, that if the printing proceeds as suggested by the Secretary of the Interior, and by the Superintendent of the Census, it will make two volumes something less than the size of the American Archives—that is about the size of the Congressional Globe substantially.

Now, the next thing is, will this House order the printing of the historical part? I will consent—and my colleagues upon the committee will consent, I understand—that you strike off this historical part. Then it will make two volumes—thirty per cent. less than the two volumes I have described. It is in such a state of forwardness at this time, that it can be left off without interrupting the printing at all. Do you desire to leave off the historical part?

A VOICE. No! no!

Mr. G. If you do, I will propose an amendment, or will accept one, that it shall be left off, and let the printing proceed, as is the earnest desire of the Secretary of the Interior, the Superintendent of the Census, and of you all. Strike it out, then.

A VOICE. Oh no! let us have it all.

Mr. G. Now, whether it is struck out or not, why delay? The next thing, Mr. Speaker, is, why is this resolution introduced with the name of Donelson & Armstrong? Will my friends hear me? and I will tell you the reason. Here is a job, reserved from the public printer's contract by the letter of the law, to be done by your order. Who will you give it to? You have organized a committee in this House, and the coordinate branch of the legislative department of the Government has organized another committee. The Democratic party of the country are in the ascendancy here. You have organized those committees with Democratic majorities. You direct them, by a resolution, that they shall have this census printing done. You direct it. And I am inquired of, occasionally, by a timid friend, Why do you introduce this resolution here? Because you told me to. You demanded action. I have given you action. I submitted it to a committee composed of a majority of Democrats. Gales & Seaton, Gideon & Co., Rives, Hamilton, and Donelson & Armstrong, are printers in this city. When we come forward to act, the resolution says we shall have this printing done. I make a contract with Donelson & Armstrong upon such terms as may be considered proper and reasonable. I then put the question, Are you willing to trust the joint committee of the Senate and House to make a contract that will be fair and honorable? We are told that there will be fraud. Why, gentlemen must remember, that when they say that, they impugn the character and integrity of that committee. Sir, I should feel myself unworthy of a seat here if I could pander to my party predilections—as strong as they are—if I could so forget myself as to make a contract that would be unreasonable, or give a compensation to enrich my political friends at the sacrifice of justice or of the rights of my country. What would that committee do? That committee would call upon Blair & Rives, as one of the members of that committee has already done upon Mr. Rives, and inquire, What did you get for the printing of the census in 1842 and 1843? Answer, $137,000. We have had that to start upon. We would then call upon Gales & Seaton, Gideon & Co., and Mr. Rives and others, to learn what diminution of prices had occurred since that time.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GORMAN. With great pleasure.

Mr. STEPHENS. I understand the gentleman to state that he had called upon Mr. Rives to learn what he would do this job for, and to be governed by his price.

Mr. GORMAN. By all means. We would not certainly give the contract to Donelson & Armstrong without an understanding of the former prices.

Mr. STEPHENS. Then another question: Why does the gentleman come in here and ask the House in advance to say that we shall give it to Messrs. Donelson & Armstrong?

Mr. GORMAN. I was just coming to that point, which I hope to eliminate to the gentleman's entire satisfaction. I stated that we had consulted with printers in reference to the price of printing. This has been all talked over in the committee, and I am now but recapitulating. Why did we put Donelson & Armstrong's names in here? I will tell my friend: For the very same reason that if his party were in power, they would put the names of Gales & Seaton, or Gideon & Co., there.

Mr. STEPHENS. I have no party.

Mr. GORMAN. The gentleman says he has no party.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I desire simply to ask the gentleman from Indiana if it is not his recollection, and whether it is not the recollection of the House, that the preparatory printing of the forms necessary for the taking of the census was done at the "Republic office," and if, when we had that subject under consideration, it did not appear to this House that we could not alter the schedules in a single particular, because the Secretary of the Interior had caused this preliminary printing to be done before we had passed the bill? While we were engaged in passing that bill, I made repeated efforts, and other gentlemen made repeated efforts, to change those schedules; but we could not do it. We could not get a particular description of hemp growing in my State included in the schedule. We had been frustrated by the action of the Secretary of the Interior, who had given the job to the partisan editors of the "Republic."

Mr. GORMAN. The gentleman has fully explained that matter, and I need not repeat it. I will tell my honorable friend from Georgia that party has something to do with this matter. It would be dishonorable in me to disguise it. Were I in power I would give what patronage was to be given fairly and properly to my political friends instead of to my political enemies.

Mr. HEBARD. I want to make a simple inquiry. I understand the gentleman from Indiana to state that the resolution only authorizes the committee to make a contract with Donelson & Armstrong. In case they make no reasonable contract I would ask him what they then intend doing?

Mr. GORMAN. I will answer. The contract with Donelson & Armstrong for the printing of this matter is to be made upon such terms as the committee shall deem reasonable and proper, and not what Donelson & Armstrong shall deem reasonable. That is my answer.

Mr. HEBARD. That does not answer my question. After the committee shall have come to their conclusion of what price will be reasonable, and Messrs. Donelson & Armstrong will not accept the terms proposed, what do they then propose to do?

Mr. GORMAN. There is no other remedy then but to report the fact to the House.

Mr. HEBARD. I want to ask another question. Why not have this resolution in such shape that when the committee come to the conclusion that they cannot make a reasonable contract with Donelson & Armstrong, that they shall make it with some other printer without coming back to the House?

Mr. GORMAN. I apprehend that the gentleman's interrogation does not amount to anything. It results only in this, that if we cannot make a contract what are we then to do? The gentleman goes into a supposition that is not at all within the range of probability.

Mr. HEBARD. It is within the range of a business transaction.

Mr. GORMAN. I will not retort upon the gentleman, and say as to what he would do, because I will not enter into that sort of discussion. I shall confine myself to the facts; and, as gentlemen have been kind enough to listen to what I have said, I beg them to hear me further upon the facts of the matter. It has been said here that Donelson & Armstrong are partisan editors. True; they are. Here is a job that is to be given to some one, and I ask any gentleman upon that side of the House, if he had the power, would he not give it to his political friends who would do it for an equally reasonable price?

Mr. FLORENCE. May I ask a single question? Do I understand the chairman of the Committee on Printing to say the public printer, so called, is unable to perform this printing?

Mr. GORMAN. I have made no such declaration.

Mr. FLORENCE. That he is not entitled to it under his contract?

Mr. GORMAN. Under the law.

Mr. FLORENCE. I want to understand the difference between awarding patronage to a Democrat with a newspaper and a Democrat without a newspaper. I cannot understand why a constituent of mine—and I make that declaration here—who is a Democrat, and by whose vote, in part, I hold a seat in this House, should not be as well considered as a Democrat with a newspaper?

Several MEMBERS. That is the point.

Mr. GORMAN. He should, by all manner of means.

Mr. FLORENCE. I will beg the gentleman's permission to say another word.

Mr. GORMAN. I cannot yield further.

Mr. FLORENCE. I will go behind no man—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is not in order, as the gentleman from Indiana refuses to yield the floor.

Mr. GORMAN. My friend must excuse me, but I cannot yield.

Mr. FLORENCE. Only one word. [Laughter.]

Mr. GORMAN. The gentleman appeals so strongly that I cannot resist. I yield.

Mr. FLORENCE. I do not trouble the House much. I am a listener, a learner, a pupil here; but, sir, my whole political life will bear me out in the declaration that I go behind no man in awarding what patronage I can by my personal influence and vote to Democrats.

Mr. GORMAN. That is exactly right. [Laughter.] I am willing that that sentiment shall be embodied in my speech. I ask my friends upon the opposite side of the House to remember that at the extra session of Congress in 1842-'43 a resolution was introduced into one of the branches of the Government in these words:

Resolved, That Blair & Rives be dismissed as the public printer or printers of the Senate.

It was passed by a Whig party vote, and stands upon your records as a living witness coming up in judgment against you. That is admitted. This is not a parallel case to that at all. This I say to my Democratic friends is a simple question whether we shall give it to our friends or not. That is all there is in it. What more do we propose?

"The work to be executed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and to be paid for as it progresses by the head of the Census Bureau, with power to abate from the amount stipulated if the work, when executed, shall prove deficient or below the standard which may be agreed upon."

I ask my friends what more is there in this transaction? Donelson & Armstrong are to do it, and it is complained because their names are inserted here. I tell you, if that contract can be given them, so far as my influence and vote go, they shall have it. Why will I select them in preference to other Democrats? I will do so, I tell my friends, because they are the organs of the Democratic party. Is that plain enough? Is it understood? I beg my friend from North Carolina to let by-gones be by-gones. I will not raise Banquo's ghost here. I will not put the cup to his lips. I am willing to stand side by side with my honorable friend from North Carolina to do battle with him for the great Democratic principles of my country. I do not care whether he voted for the compromise or not. I am not going to put the test to his lips, if he sees proper now to march under the banner of the Democratic party as it shall be laid down by the Baltimore Convention. I ask him, a veteran in the cause of Democracy, when he comes before the country, not to tell the people that he is going to prescribe rules for the party, which, if not adopted, he will separate himself from them. I ask him to leave a little to the generous confidence of friends with whom he has been associated all his life—a little to the confidence of those friends who hold the country dear—who hold the perpetuation of our institutions above all price. He should act with them, and because of the declarations of an individual who has thought proper to be his antagonist upon a political principle, he certainly is not going to stifle his voice in the cause of his country.

Mr. VENABLE. I trust that no man here will suppose that I am deserting principles, which I have professed for more than thirty years, because of my dissatisfaction with any individual. My principles are independent of individuals. They are founded upon the convictions of my understanding, the approbation of my conscience, and the cordial acceptance of my heart. From my intercourse with my gallant friend, I shall be proud to act with him at all times; but I shall never act either with or without my friends, under circumstances by which I shall forfeit my self-respect.

Mr. GORMAN. I have no fears that my honorable friend will ever be called upon to act with any other organization than that great and glorious Democratic party, that has borne the banner of their country always. They are always for their country. I am proud to say to-day, before God and my country, that I am for that country right, but in the last resort, right or wrong. I hope that I may not find my honorable friend, who has differed with us upon certain questions, which have agitated the country from centre to circumference during the last Congress, going up to the Washington Union and saying, "I hold you responsible for your opinions—you shall not share in the patronage which I can bestow, because you differ with me upon these subjects." My friend, when he says that he will proscribe such opinions, could only expect to be proscribed in turn. I hope that no such necessity may occur.

Mr. VENABLE. Will the gentleman allow me to say, that I proposed to open this subject to free bidding everywhere. I said that they had no claims upon me individually. I do not proscribe them, but I open the bidding to the printers of the United States, so that we may have a fair and free competition.

Mr. GORMAN. This resolution proposes to leave this matter to the committee. It is not a question to be left to Donelson & Armstrong. It is a question which our friends are called upon to leave to the committee which you have constituted in this House. We call upon you to leave the reasonableness and propriety of that contract to the committee. Are you willing to do it? Have you confidence in their integrity and purpose of character to discharge that duty?

Mr. EVANS. I will ask the gentleman before he is done to tell this House why it is improper to let this printing by contract, and why it is the contract system is now to be abandoned? The instance the gentleman gave was in 1841, before the contract system was entered into. Now, I want the gentleman to state how much this printing will cost. I am informed that it will cost about million of dollars.

Mr. GORMAN. I am authorized to say, upon the authority of the very best printers, that it will not cost half of $500,000. These diversions upon this occasion have led me off from some of the facts in this case.

Mr. EVANS. Speak to the contract.

Mr. GORMAN. I was about to speak upon the question of the contract system. It is known to that gentleman, as he remarked yesterday upon the floor, that the contract system had led to difficulty, and frauds upon the country enormous in their character. The contract system lets in every individual to come in and bid as low as possible, and their ruling motive seems to have been, that after a while they were to go before Congress and ask that they might be released from an onerous bargain. Such is the experience—such is the language of my friend from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS.] He used that language then, and I presume he will use it again. I apprehend that this system of letting this work out by contract to the lowest bidder, is the ground-work of the most stupendous system of fraud ever perpetrated upon the people of this country.

Mr. EVANS. Not if you furnish them with paper.

Mr. GORMAN. If you furnish them with paper, type, and presses, it will not do. Every Committee on Printing have found at the bottom of this contract system all sorts of private understandings and bargains for the purpose of fleecing the Government. The Committee on Printing have found this in their experience now. Shall this matter be reconsidered? Why refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union? What do you want to discuss? Do my friends who differ with me upon the subject of this contract want to get up a war between us upon the compromise measures, whether they are proper and right? I do pray you, avert such an evil. I am frank to say, that such a calamity to the Democratic party should be avoided; and the man who undertakes to arraign any one here for the purpose of making an additional sore, which is now in a fair way of being healed, is stabbing the party that gives him power. I can say to my friends who voted against these measures, that I feel proud of their association. I feel that I went further upon these great Southern questions than any man north of Mason and Dixon's line. I feel I can say to gentlemen who are not with us upon the compromise measures, "Peace, be still!" Does that voice—does that warning come from a Democrat who has wavered? Does that voice come from a Democrat who has ever yet thrown a fire-brand into the midst of his Southern friends? Does that warning come from one who has ever turned to the right or left upon the great eternal principles of non-intervention? Then I say to them that the prolongation of this discussion will run my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE], my friend from Virginia, [Mr. BOCK], and my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. NABERS], into a dilemma. I hope if they love the union, harmony, and organization of that great party that brought them into power, that they will heed the voice of warning.

Mr. BOCK. I ask, what I do not often ask upon this floor, that the gentleman will yield me the floor for one moment. I ask this because of my very sincere respect and regard for the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN.] I do not often ask any gentleman who is speaking to allow me the privilege of introducing one word while he is speaking. While the gentleman from Indiana is proclaiming peace to the Democratic party upon one subject, I ask him if he does not know that there are other subjects upon which the Democratic party are divided? I ask if he does not feel in that loyal and honest heart of his, that there is as much need of harmony upon those other questions as in relation to the compromise? And I ask him, if he expects us here to say Peace, when his friends—I do not say him—proclaim peace only upon one subject, and give us war to the knife upon other vital subjects? I ask him if it will do to tell me that the friends of the Washington Union will give us peace upon the compromise, when they are giving us war, and war to the knife, upon the subject of State-rights?

Mr. GORMAN. I apprehend that more evidence has been given by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOCK], and that it is the very thing to be avoided. Where is the Democrat here who does not see a monster exhibiting itself here, a hydra-headed monster, which is stinging the very heart of the Democratic party? Where is there an individual who has witnessed the assault of my gallant friend from Virginia, [Mr. BOCK], who will not agree with me in saying, "Peace, be still." Supposing that one of our friends, who conducts a newspaper, does not agree with the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOCK]—supposing that upon the subject of State-rights he does not concur fully in some of the details, I say to the gentlemen that we intend to put no poison in their cups.

Mr. NABERS. The remark I intend to submit is not at all intended to interfere with the progress of this discussion, nor is it intended to indicate that I feel injured by not being permitted to address the House this morning. I wish simply to know if there is any new question before the House differing from the one upon which I had the floor this morning? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi call the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] to order?

Mr. NABERS. No—I only asked for information. [Laughter.]

Mr. GORMAN, (resuming.) I was simply saying that objections had been urged to Donelson & Armstrong. That subject was my text. Why? The honorable gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VENABLE] had asked, why? With regard to certain questions—certain political principles, I was giving as a reason why they ought not to have weight. I am in order, I believe; why? because I am directing my remarks to the point whether the names of Donelson & Armstrong should be put at the head of the resolution. But I am done upon the subject upon which I was speaking. I leave that to the magnanimity of men who have never failed to show it when they have been put to the test; I leave that to the magnanimity of men who are called upon on this occasion to regard the admonition which I have in an humble way suggested to them, "Peace, be still." Do I propose to Northern men to put any cup to their lips? Do I require them to say that every line, sentence, syllable, comma and semi-colon of the fugitive slave law is right? Do I require my honorable friend from North Carolina [Mr. VENABLE] to say that every line and syllable of the Texas boundary bill is right. I do not require any such thing. I do require acquiescence in these measures; I desire peaceable acquiescence in them.

I come back now to the question of this printing; and I appeal to the gentlemen upon the other side of the House to know whether, if they held the power and had this contract to give, and the choice was left to them, at the same fair and reasonable rates, they would not give it to their political friends?

Mr. BELL. No, not without competition.

Mr. GORMAN. Ah! then there is a gentleman sui generis. He belongs to a different race of men from any that I have ever yet seen. He must belong to some party that I have never yet heard of. [Laughter.] He would not prefer a political friend—one possessing all the elements of qualification—to a political opponent! God save me from such a political partisan as that! He is an Ishmaelite. [Laughter.] He must have his hand against everybody and everybody's hand, I apprehend, must be turned against him.

In conclusion, allow me to say to this House that I ask my friends to reconsider this question.

Mr. BELL. Will the gentleman allow me to make an explanation?

Mr. GORMAN. Why, yes, with pleasure, if it is not too long.

Mr. BELL. I will not make it long.

Mr. GORMAN. I want to know, first, if the gentleman is the one who answered me just now?

Mr. BELL. I am the man. [Laughter.]

Mr. GORMAN. I am glad to see you, sir. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. BELL. I understood the gentleman to make an appeal to the members on this side of the House, knowing, at the same time, that if he kept the floor under the permission of the other gentleman [Mr. SKELTON] who lets it out, they would have no opportunity to reply. I may have been out of order in saying "No, not without competition," but I wish it to be understood, that in saying that, I meant that I would not place in jeopardy the interests of my country to favor an individual of my own party, by giving an exorbitant price for the work. I would do as any prudent individual would.

Mr. GORMAN. I presume the gentleman would.

Mr. BELL. Now, I understand that by this resolution you tie your own hands.

Mr. GORMAN. Not at all. The gentleman wants to persuade us, that we tie our own hands by putting in those potent words, "Donelson & Armstrong;" that is the bugbear.

Mr. BELL. You ask the House to tie your hands for you.

Mr. GORMAN. I turned to the gentlemen on the other side of the House, and asked them if, in giving this job, they had to choose between a political friend and a political foe—occupying equal positions in society, of equal ability and integrity, and willing to take it at the same reasonable prices, they would not prefer to give it to their political friend? The gentleman answered no.

Mr. BELL. That was not the question.

Mr. GORMAN. I answered that the gentleman must certainly be sui generis. I did not mean anything personal.

Mr. BELL. Oh, I did not understand you so.

Mr. GORMAN. Well, then, allow me to proceed. This resolution—to come back to it again—has been ordered to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. When it gets there all these matters about the question of State rights and Free-Soil, and the Massachusetts coalition, will be brought up; the House will be kept in a furor for ten or fifteen days, and when this resolution gets out, I expect the millennium will come.

Mr. HALL, (interrupting.) I do not know that I perfectly understand the resolution which is under discussion. I do understand it to propose to make the action of the committee definite with regard to this printing. Now, I ask the gentleman from Indiana if he will accept the amendment which I hold in my hand, and which is in these words:

Provided, That no contract made by said committee shall be of any binding force or effect until the same is reported to and approved of by both Houses of Congress.

Mr. GORMAN. The Committee on Printing are to make a contract under the law of 1846. That law provides that it shall be a part of their duty to attend to this portion of the public business. When the committee have made a contract with Donelson & Armstrong, they will do just as they have done in the case of Mr. Hamilton, and in other cases. I have before me the contract with Trenholm & Belt; the committee reported it to this House, and it is marked "House of Representatives—Miscellaneous Documents, No. 10." The contract is laid before the House; everybody reads it; everybody knows what it is; and if that contract has upon its face an unreasonable rate of compensation, it is within the province of this House at any moment to arraign that contract and to know the causes—the why and the wherefore.

Mr. HALL. The gentleman does not understand me. I do not want to get into any difficulty with any contractors to do the printing of this House. I want the contract, when it is entered into, to bind both us and them. I do not want any afterclaps, any quarrels, any difficulties or misunderstandings; and I prefer, therefore, that the action of this committee shall come to us for approval. Let us have no more of these discussions, whether we shall set aside a contract after we have entered into it.

Mr. GORMAN. I do understand the gentleman's amendment, and I now say that if the Speaker decides that I have a right to accept that amendment, I will most cheerfully do it. I have not the slightest objection that our contract shall be reported to this House, and that the House shall confirm or reject it. My friend from Missouri must see, however, that the House will have to repeal the law of 1846, before we can do that. That law left it to the Committee on Printing. Still I have no kind of objection to the amendment. I will accept it—if it is in my power to do so—if it will reconcile the feelings of any individual. But, why ask me to accept it unless it will do that?

Mr. HALL. I will say to the gentleman, that it will reconcile me to the resolution.

Mr. HAVEN, (Mr. GORMAN yielding the floor.) I desire to make a suggestion or two, lest there should be a misapprehension as to the views that some portion, at least, of the Committee on Printing entertain upon the subject of the extent of the authority conferred upon that committee by the joint resolution of 1846.

I understand that it is the opinion of the Joint Committee on Printing, that the printing of these census returns does not come within the contract with the public printer. That being so, then, I submit to the House that that committee have no more power over this subject than they have over any other subject that may interest the members of the House. They are a committee to take care of that portion of the printing which is provided for under the joint resolution of 1846—of that printing, and that only. Now the gentleman from Indiana says—and I concur with him in that respect—that by the law under which this census was taken, provision was made—after providing for the printing of the preliminary blanks—that all the other printing was thereafter to be executed as Congress should direct. Now that Printing Committee, as I understand it, was raised for the purpose of seeing that such printing as came within the joint resolution of 1846, was executed according to the terms of that joint resolution, and when, therefore, it is decided that the printing of this census does not come within the terms of the resolution, I say it withdraws from the operation of the power of the committee the entire control of this business. These are the views which I entertain upon the subject; and while I have the floor I will say further, with the permission of the gentleman from Indiana, that it is a little difficult for me to understand precisely, by what right this resolution is here. It has never been referred to the Joint Committee on Printing by this House. It is true that the other branch of Congress did refer a similar resolution to the joint committee for consideration; and it is also true that the joint committee did act upon that resolution, and report it back to the other branch of Congress. But no such resolution, emanating from this House, has been referred to the committee. The resolution has originated there, without its having been committed to them by this House.

I make these remarks, not because I desire to discuss this question in its political bearings, in any way or shape, but because I desire the House to understand that when I have come to the conclusion, in my own mind, that this census printing does not come within the contract of the public printer, and is not, therefore, within the joint resolution of 1846, I hold that it is not, consequently, within the control of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. GORMAN. I spoke upon that subject before. I stated that a resolution precisely similar to this, to give the census printing to Donelson & Armstrong, provided they will contract for it on reasonable and proper terms, was submitted to the Joint Committee on Printing by one of the coordinate branches of the Government—the Senate. The members of that committee, on the part of the House, cooperated in recommending that that resolution should be reported back to the Senate, with a recommendation that it do pass. What next? The Senate postponed action on the subject for two weeks. I then proposed to the joint committee that we should take up the resolution and report it to the House, and if the House should pass it, it would expedite this printing.

Now, what shall we do in order to act in good faith with both parties? We have reported to this House the same resolution, which, with a slight variation, was reported to the Senate, and we ask you to pass it. Why? It is to stop the clamor—it is to stop the cry that the public printing is not going on. All we ask is, that you shall give into the hands of the committee the power to make a contract with Donelson & Armstrong, if it can be done. If it cannot be done, there is an end of it. We ask that, and that is all we ask. Will you give it? If you will, I see no necessity for speaking upon the subject of States-rights, secession, Free-Soilism, or anything else here upon this question. Gentlemen want to know why we propose to give the job to Donelson & Armstrong. It is because we believe they will be able to do it as well as any one else, and as low as anybody else, and we prefer to give it to them, because they are political friends. I presume I shall not be misunderstood in this. Now, I ask that you will sustain this committee, constituted by your order, in this resolution which they have reported to the House according to your order. It is before you, and I ask you to reconsider the vote by which it has been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where every gentleman who has had experience in this House knows that if it goes, you might as well consign it to the tomb of the Capulets at once. In obedience to what I consider to be a pledge to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. SKELTON,] I now move the previous question, though I will withdraw it if any gentleman desires to ask a question for information upon the subject.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GORMAN. Is it for information upon this subject? If it is, I will withdraw the call for the previous question for the gentleman.

Mr. STANTON. It is. I desire to ask the gentleman this question: If the House refuse to pass this resolution, I want to know when and where we may expect to have this printing done?

Mr. GORMAN. I will answer the gentleman. If the House refuse to pass this resolution, the committee will then be at sea without chart or compass.

Mr. CARTTER. I desire to inquire whether the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] has not yielded the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is entitled to the floor, and is on the floor.

Mr. GORMAN. If any gentleman desires to ask any question for information upon the subject of the public printing, I will yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. CARTTER. I desire to ask the gentleman if he will be kind enough to withdraw the previous question. The gentleman made a long speech, and closes up by moving the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has withdrawn his call for the previous question, but he is still entitled to the floor.

Mr. ORR. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Indiana whether, if the previous question be seconded, and the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SKELTON] to reconsider the vote by which this resolution has been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union prevails, if we do not go back then under the operation of the previous question? And I desire to inquire further, whether if, when we go back under the operation of the previous question, any amendment can be offered to the resolution?

Mr. GORMAN. I will say this, I call the previous question.

Mr. CARTTER. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Upon that motion I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the question being taken, there were—yeas 134, nays, 51; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, Allison, John Appleton, William Appleton, Aslie, Averett, Babcock, Barre, Bell, Bibb, Bissell, Bovee, Bowie, Rowne, Bragg, Briggs, Brooks, Geo. H. Brown, Burrows, E. IRISH EXILED PATRIOTS.

Mr. CASS. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a copy of the resolutions adopted at one of the most respectable meetings ever assembled at Detroit, and at which the Governor of the State presided, on the subject of the resolution pending before us, for the intercession of this Government with that of England, to obtain the release of Smith O'Brien and the other exiled Irish patriots, now suffering for political offences in a British penal colony, in the Southern ocean. I fully concur with the sentiments expressed in these resolutions, which I think have been prepared with good feeling and good judgment, and in the measure it is desired the Government should adopt. For my own part, I see no political objections, no indelicacy even in such a course, not of interference, in my view, but of merciful suggestion; a just tribute to the advancing opinions of the age.

How much nobler is the friendly expression of interest and hope like this, conceived and communicated in a proper spirit of deference and respect for another power, than the angry remonstrances which crowd the pages of diplomatic history in every age of this world! Such a proceeding is an intercourse of good offices honorable to the motives of the country adopting it, and to the country receiving it, if received, as I trust this would be, with the feelings of confidence and regard which dictate our conduct. Of course it imposes no obligations upon either of the parties, though certainly its favorable issue could not fail to strengthen the ties of amity between England and us. The Government of that country well knows that this is not a case where our application is uncalculated, or which originates in unworthy motives. It knows well, that a very considerable portion of our population is connected with Ireland, either by birth or descent, and that many of them are connected also by the ties of blood with these unfortunate exiles. They sympathize deeply, as do indeed the whole American people, with the hard fate of these banished patriots—a feeling, I have no doubt, which prevails to a considerable extent in England, and one which animates the English people, and which they never fail to display when such occurrences take place in other countries.

It is said, sir, that this proceeding will open the way for similar applications, and that it is an improper interference with another Government, and it has also been feared that we might be embarrassed hereafter by the very precedent, applied to ourselves, which it is now sought to establish.

Mr. President, a great change has taken place in the opinions of the world, on the subject of political offences. They nowhere carry with them reproach or shame. They violate indeed existing laws, but they generally originate in the most praiseworthy motives, and are pursued at the hazard of every earthly good, as Washington and a host of other illustrious men in ancient and in modern days pursued their patriotic enterprises.

Nothing more distinctly marks the improved condition of public feeling than the abolition in all constitutional governments of those atrocious and revolting punishments, once inexorably inflicted by power upon patriotism. To feel and express commiseration for such victims is now acknowledged to be consistent with every principle of the most rigid morality. They are recognized as being unfortunate, but not vicious. Indeed, they are often noble men, as are those whose case engages our attention, and who deserve the kind interest of the world, both from their motives and their character, and also from the position, once high, but now low, to which they have fallen, and in consequence of an effort made not for themselves, but for their country. It cannot be—there is not the slightest danger of it—that such a national application will ever be made in any case but in one like this, which is as far from moral guilt as innocence is from crime. Let no one fear that this example will ever be used or abused for the purpose of intermeddling with the ordinary criminal proceedings of other powers. The vicious will find no commiseration for their punishment, nor will any friendly hand be stretched forth to aid them. And even in this case, however much our interest might have been excited, it would have probably led to no action, had we not found a justification in the circumstances I have stated. There is, therefore, no ground to apprehend that nations might become embarrassed by such applications, or that they would lead to ill will or misunderstanding. As to improper interference, it appears to me an entire misconception of the term to apply it to a case like this. It is not interference at all; it is intercession. It is a simple request, made from the best motives in the best spirit, and presented in the most unexceptionable language, and it leaves the British Government free to act its own pleasure, without giving us the slightest offence, should the result be unsuccessful. How such a course can be construed into improper interference, it passes my powers of comprehension to perceive, as it did two years ago, to understand how the refusal to make an appropriation to maintain a Minister at the Court of Vienna could be an unjustifiable interference with the Austrian Government. And after puzzling myself upon the subject, time and again, I am just as much in the dark as ever. It is best to let a little common sense into our diplomatic questions, and not be too sensitive as to the expression of our sentiments under proper circumstances. Depend upon it, sir, we shall best preserve our own self-respect by such a course, and secure the respect of the world.

If this request is granted, it would be an act that would produce a most favorable effect upon the people of this country; and if refused, as I have said, there the matter would end, unless, indeed, the British Government should so far forget what is due to itself and to us, as to give a rude answer, not justified by the circumstances, nor the manner of the application. I have no belief, sir, that such a gratuitous folly would be committed; and even if it were, we should find some means of not being left in debt upon the occasion. National dignity is a good thing, but let us not be everlastingly afraid that ours is in danger.

As to the encouragement that this step would give to similar applications by other powers to us, it does not occasion me the slightest concern. When such a case occurs here, and a like interest is felt elsewhere, and from like circumstances, and an intercession is made for a similar object, and in unexceptionable language, I trust it will be received in the best feeling; aye, and granted, too, unless there are far stronger objections to the measure than there appears to me to be in the present instance. If there could be any fear, which I am satisfied there would not be, of the release of these banished sufferers, lest they might again become dangerous, let them be sent to this great asylum of the oppressed of all nations, where we shall be ready to receive them, and admit them to all the privileges of our political system as soon as the provisions of our Constitution will permit. If England hails their departure, we should welcome their arrival.

One word, sir, on the subject of precedents, whose appearance I anticipate on this occasion, as an old enemy, always upon the alert to enforce the stand-still policy. For once let us put a foot down without first peering carefully about to ascertain if a foot was ever placed in that precise spot before. Let us yield to the generous sympathy of our nature. Let us obey the inspirations of the age, and try, where the trial is proper, "to set the prisoner free." If the world must have precedents, let us make one; they have been made before us; and this will be a precedent for peace, and not for war; for mercy, and not for vengeance nor oppression; a precedent for intercession between Governments, in favor of suffering humanity. Let us set an example, if there never was one before.

There have been examples enough of folly and cruelty in national inter-communications. We shall lose, neither in position nor character, by endeavoring to furnish some of wisdom and mercy. If success follows the effort it would be a brighter page in our history, than is supplied by the bloodiest and most renowned of our battlefields. I shall vote for the original resolution, even if it is not modified, because, though the President has declined to enter into a diplomatic correspondence with the British Government upon this subject, on an application recently made to him, I do not understand that he would have any objections to such a measure, if Congress should take upon itself the responsibility of inviting his action; and I feel assured that the President would be gratified to see the accomplishment of the object, by means, that might appear to him proper, as he expressed upon that occasion, the sympathies, that an American citizen and an American Chief Magistrate ought to feel, under such circumstances. But, sir, there is a mode, in which this expression of national feeling may be obtained, and this difficulty and others too, that have been urged, avoided, and that is, by so modifying the resolution, that it shall not require a formal communication to the British Government, but shall be merely the expression of the deep interest the American people feel in the fate of these exiles, and our hope, that they will be speedily restored to the condition of freemen.

This course would require no formal diplomatic correspondence, though it would make part of our legislative history, testifying the feelings of the people, and would become known to the British Government, through their Minister or through our own, in an informal way, as is often the case, and also by the public journals of the day, and the moral effect would be as great as a more direct application. I cannot believe that the British Cabinet would hesitate to yield to a wish of this country so unexceptionably expressed.

Mr. President, is it surprising that the sympathy of the whole American people is so generally awakened by misfortunes, as deplorable as these cases present, and which appeal so powerfully to the best feelings of our nature, and in an especial manner to that large class of our fellow-citizens, who trace their origin to Ireland? Wherever there is political oppression in the world, the heart of an Irishman is with the oppressed, and his head and hands too, when the suffering is within his reach.

Ireland has furnished, and yet furnishes, a great portion of our emigrant population, whose worth and talent and industry have added largely to the power and resources of the country. The victim of harsh and hard laws at home, the emigrant from that unfortunate land, knows how to value liberty here; and I believe it would be a phenomenon to find an Irishman who was not ardently attached to the Constitution and union of these States.

And this attachment they have sealed with their blood, upon every battle-field from Quebec to Mexico; defending with unsurpassed valor the standard of our country, from Montgomery, who fell almost under the Arctic Circle, to my friend from Illinois, [Mr. SHIELDS,] who poured out his blood like water beneath the northern tropic, and gave me a proof of regard, rarely offered or received by man, by sending me the expression of his kind recollection, when he and the friends around him thought the hand of death was upon him, and from which condition his recovery was little less than miraculous. He who has no sympathy with such citizens, nor part in their sympathies, has few feelings in common with me.

As the resolution is already before us, I move that these proceedings lie upon the table and be printed.

Mr. BERRIEN. Let the resolutions be read.

The Secretary read them as follows:

Whereas, in the year 1846, when the people of Ireland felt deeply aggrieved for their political and social condition, and alleged that that condition was in a great measure owing to the administrative policy of the Government of England towards that country:

And whereas Messrs. O'Brien, Mitchell, Meagher, O'Donoghue, Martin, O'Dougherty, and others, deemed that a resort to revolutionary measures was the only remedy presented by which to redress the grievances complained of:

And whereas their error, if they did err, was one of opinion as to the best mode to be adopted to remedy the existing evils and relieve the sufferings of the people of Ireland—which sufferings and the necessity for relief were admitted by the Government of England:

And whereas the means adopted by these political offenders against the existing authorities of the British Empire resulted in their condemnation and banishment to a penal colony:

And whereas we deeply deplore their present sufferings, and anxiously desire their release and restoration to their families and to society:

And whereas a resolution is now pending before the Congress of the United States in the following words, to wit:

"Be it resolved, &c., That in consideration of the general sympathy felt by the people of the United States for Smith O'Brien, Thomas F. Meagher, and their immediate associates, (exiled Irish patriots,) and the warm sympathies felt by the countrymen of these distinguished sufferers, who have become citizens of the United States, the President of the United States be requested to authorize a correspondence to be opened with the Government of her Majesty, the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, appealing to the magnanimity of the British Government and people in their behalf, and respectfully requesting the liberation of these personages from their present confinement, with an offer to receive them upon the hospitable shores of the United States."

Resolved, That we deeply sympathize with Messrs. O'Brien, Mitchell, Meagher, and their associates in exile, and heartily respond to the sentiments contained in, and the objects contemplated by, the foregoing resolution, and respectfully recommend to our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States, that they each give to the same an earnest, cordial, and efficient support.

Resolved, That we do not assume for our Government the right to dictate to, or in any wise interfere with, the action of any foreign power, in relation to its domestic policy, but as a member of the great family of nations, desirous of cultivating in the hearts of governments a care for the happiness of individuals, a solicitude for their improvement, and a sympathy for their sufferings, we wish to express in this form our painful sense of the condition of the individuals in question, and ask such respect for our application as may comport with the dignity and policy of Great Britain, and the humane and liberal sentiment of the age, believing that the advancement of civilization and christian morality has induced an international sympathy which we feel fully justifies such a procedure on our part.

Resolved, That the strength of the British Empire and the present tranquillity of Ireland, forbid the idea that these political offenders cannot be set at liberty with safety to the Government, and that when the public security or the reformation of the sufferer is not the purpose or the apparent tendency of punishment, but the reflection of terror and the gratification of resentment, it only tends to exasperate its victims, corrupt its authors, and deaden the moral sense of the community which it affects.

Resolved, That the exercise of this act of clemency and mercy on the part of the British Government, in obedience to the request of America, would tend to efface the asperity which became interwoven with the early history of the Republic, and establish more plainly the relations of amity and peace, which now so happily exist between the two Governments.

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions be forwarded by the president of this meeting to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, and each of our Senators in that body, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and each of our Representatives in that body.

Mr. HALE. I do not propose to detain the Senate but a moment; but I rise to express my cordial approbation and assent to every word which has so eloquently fallen from the lips of the honorable Senator from Michigan. It is rarely that I allow myself to throw a consideration personal to myself upon this body, or upon any body which I have the honor to address; but upon this occasion I hope the Senate will indulge me for a moment, if I suggest a single fact that may excuse somewhat the warmth which I feel on this subject.

Sir, my mother, many years dead, was the only child of an Irish exile. His name was O'Brien. And I should feel, if in this place, or in any place, whenever and wherever a word of sympathy is to be expressed for an Irish exile and an O'Brien, that I should be false to every pulsation of my heart, to every drop of blood that flows in these veins, and to that which no man can be false to, the memory of a deceased mother, if I did not express it. No, sir; let whatever consequences, personal or political, stand in the way, so long as the blood of my mother flows in my veins, and so long as I remember who I am, and what I am, whatever words of sympathy, of counsel, or of encouragement, an Irish exile can have, that he shall have from me.

These are the reasons and the motives which impel me, and they are powerful beyond and over everything else. I confess that if I have an impulse and a passion, which is reckless and uncalculating as to consequences, it is when an appeal is made to my heart for an Irish exile, more particularly and emphatically when that exile is an O'Brien. Sir, I go with the honorable Senator from Michigan—I go for this movement with all my heart; and I yield to the truth of another declaration of the honorable Senator and that is, that the heart of the Irishman is with the oppressed. I do not want to give that a technical, local, or fanatical meaning. It is true there is an old maxim of the common law, that "corporations have no souls;" and hence it is inferred, that having no souls they have no sympathies, no affections, and no hearts. It may have been true; but I trust that this great corporation of States and communities may come forward and demonstrate to-day that that exploded idea of the common law is not true as relates to this great corporation of municipalities and States; and that we shall demonstrate that we have souls and hearts that can feel.

If, from motives of State policy, the President of the United States shall decline to interfere, it will be none the less true that the resolution of the American Senate has been spoken, and that it has spoken and echoed and reechoed the sentiments of the great American people, and that will carry with it all the moral force that it is entitled to. So far as that is concerned—the moral force that is to be attached to the declaration of the sentiments of the American Senate—with all respect to the President of the United States, I tell him it is of very little consequence whether his name is affixed to it or not. The resolution will have been entertained, the Senate will have spoken, and whether the British Government shall lend a responsive ear to the interposition which we propose to make or not, it will have its moral effect, and it will reach and cheer the hearts of these victims of oppression in their lonely and desolate place of exile. Sir, it will do that if it does nothing else; and it will teach another lesson—it will teach the oppressed the world over that the nations of the earth have exploded and are exploding the notions that corporations, great and small, have no souls, and that they have learned that the men of which they are composed have souls, and have hearts, and that they do not forget the promptings which spring from those hearts; that they assume the responsibilities which belong to them as Senators. Having said thus much I leave the subject, with the earnest hope that the Senate will consent to act favorably in relation to it.

Mr. BUTLER. I would like to say a single word in connection with this subject.

The PRESIDENT. There is no question before the Senate, but by unanimous consent the Senator can proceed.

Mr. BUTLER. There are many reasons which would induce me to take an active part for the release and pardon of these patriots who have been made so much the subject of eloquent eulogy. Permit me to say, however, that if the object of gentlemen be to procure the release and pardon of John Mitchell and Wm. Smith O'Brien, I believe they are taking the very worst course that could be suggested to accomplish the object. If a proper application were to be made to the British Queen, by an appeal to the British Minister, or in some other mode that would be likely to be acceptable, as an appeal to her clemency, perhaps the object might be attained. But if in applying for the pardon of these patriots, you use the language of reproach to the British Government, you might as well expect to release a victim with his hand in the wolf's mouth, by irritating the wolf. If you expect to attain the object contemplated—and I am sincerely disposed to take every reasonable measure to effect it—it is not to be done by reproaching the British Government.

There are many considerations which would induce me to take a special interest in the fate of these gentlemen, particularly in the fate of one of them. I allude to Mr. Mitchell. I have thought that something might be done, but not in this way—not by making it a subject of political discussion—(by that course we might cheer the Irish and rouse them, and obtain their applause and support, for ought I know, but we shall not subvert the end contemplated of procuring the pardon and release of these prisoners)—for, by that course, we shall defeat the very object in view. Why, do you suppose that you can approach the British Government and tell them that this is our opinion, and that it must yield to the demonstrations of public feeling in America, upon the subject of their government? I will answer for it, that John Bull has resentment enough to hurl back upon you any such attempt to influence his policy by a legislative demonstration of this kind. No, sir; it is a false step—permit me so to say. I am willing to vote for any resolution in favor of these patriots, who have been banished from their country because they loved it; and who were willing to run the hazard of measures of redress for wrongs, which they supposed, at least, they were suffering under. Surely something must be pardoned to the spirit of liberty, under which they acted. My sympathies are with them. But to make my views effective, I am not going to take a step of this kind, which I know must result in failure. If we are to do things of this kind, whenever we may think it convenient, in relation to foreign Governments, we may involve ourselves in the predicament of making a demonstration when we cannot back it by any legislative act whatever. I am not willing to see the American Senate or the American Government place itself in the situation which it cannot maintain. If you intend to take this position for the purpose of procuring the pardon of these exiles, you are not to do it by menaces and reproaches; you are not to do it by mere vain declarations, that the institutions of Great Britain are rotten, and that we intend to correct them by our interference, and rescue Ireland. The object will not be attained by declarations of this kind.

I would to God I could take some step for the release of John Mitchell and Smith O'Brien. I will not state all that I have done in relation to this matter; but I have been perfectly willing to join with others to approach the British Government in such a way as to procure their pardon. I believe it might have been done, or that something might have been done towards it; but I cannot countenance a proceeding of this kind, which I think must result in utter failure.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not mean to speak on this subject at present; but I do wish to say to my friend from South Carolina that I feel there is great force in the remarks he has made this morning. I feel that the object cannot be accomplished by an attack upon the British Government. My object in rising at this time was to ask the Senate to take up the resolution which is now on the table, in regard to this subject, in order that some future day may be assigned for its consideration. I leave that day at the discretion of the Senate; but I wish the resolution to be taken up at as early a day as possible. When it shall be taken up I wish to say a few words on this subject. I would state that I wish the resolution to be taken up for the purpose of offering an amendment so as to avoid making it a diplomatic measure. My object is so to modify the resolution as to avoid the possibility of a repulse on the part of the English Government. I should be very sorry to see this Government make an application, officially, to the British Government, which that Government would be authorized to treat with contempt. As a citizen of this country, I should be one of the last to seek to place this Government in that condition. My object, therefore, is to put the resolution into such a form as that, while, indirectly, it will accomplish the object, as I trust it will, we shall at the same time preserve the dignity of this Government under all circumstances, and give no earthly or reasonable cause of offence whatever to the British Government. When the resolution shall be called up at some future day, I hope to be able to put it into that shape; or if I should not be able to accomplish it, I hope the honorable Senator from Michigan, who has already made the suggestion, and other Senators more experienced than I am, will aid me in the accomplishment of that end.

Mr. CASS. I would suggest to the Senator that he had better lay his amendment on the table, and let it be printed.

Mr. SHIELDS. I would like to have as early a day as possible fixed for the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. BADGER. Why not to-morrow? Mr. SHIELDS, (after consultation with several Senators.) I will say Monday, as I believe there is no special business before the Senate for that day. In accordance with a suggestion of the Senator from Michigan, I will not call up the resolution until to-morrow; and I will prepare my amendment in the mean time.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that, inasmuch as there is no question before the Senate, and as the resolution to which the Senator from Illinois refers is on the table, this discussion is altogether out of order. It has only been tolerated by unanimous consent.

Mr. BADGER. I merely wish to remind the Chair that there is as much a subject of discussion now before the Senate as there was when the Senator from Michigan made his speech.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is aware of that; but he did not know, until the resolutions were handed up by the Senator from Michigan, what that Senator was about to bring before the Senate.

Mr. CASS. I held the resolutions in my hand while I was speaking.

Mr. BADGER. I believe that, under the rules, no Senator can make a speech unless there is some subject before the Senate. There must either be a motion pending, or he must make a motion before he can make a speech.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair did not know, until he saw the resolutions presented by the Senator from Michigan, whether there was any subject properly before the Senate.

The resolutions were laid upon the table.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. McRAE gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill entitled "An act to repeal the proviso in the act of Congress entitled 'An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1852, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1851, relating to the payment

SAN DIEGO RIVER.

Mr. GWIN submitted the following resolution for consideration; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating such sum of money as may be necessary to divert the river of San Diego into False Bay; which river now empties into the bay of San Diego, and by its deposit is gradually filling up said bay, thereby creating a formidable obstruction to its navigation.

DEBATES OF THE SENATE.

On motion by Mr. NORRIS, and by unanimous consent, the vote ordering the resolution for settling the accounts for reporting the debates and proceedings of the Senate to be engrossed and read a third time, was reconsidered.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the said resolution; and having been amended on the motion of Mr. NORRIS, reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to audit, and from time to time to settle the account of John C. Rives, for the reports of the Senate proceedings and debates published in the "Daily Globe," at $7 50 per column: Provided, however, That in auditing and settling such accounts nothing shall be allowed for the publication of revised speeches, a report of which has once been published, nor for messages and reports from the executive officers of the Government, nor for reports from committees of the Senate.

Ordered, That the resolution be engrossed and read a third time.

THE COMPROMISE MEASURES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi, and amended on the motion of Mr. BADGER as follows:

A Resolution declaring the Measures of Adjustment to be a definitive settlement of the questions growing out of domestic slavery.

Be it resolved, That the series of measures embraced in the acts entitled "An act proposing to the State of Texas the establishment of her Northern and Western boundaries, the relinquishment, by the said State, of all territory claimed by her exterior to said boundaries, and of all her claims upon the United States, and to establish a territorial government for New Mexico," approved September 9, 1850; "An act for the admission of the State of California into the Union," approved September 9, 1850; "An act to establish a territorial government for Utah," approved September 9, 1850; "An act to amend and supplementary to an act entitled 'An act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters,' approved February 12, 1793," approved September 18, 1850; and "An act to suppress the slave trade in the District of Columbia," approved September 20, 1850, commonly known as the "Compromise Acts," are, in the judgment of this body, a settlement in principle and substance—a final settlement of the dangerous and exciting subjects which they embrace, and ought to be adhered to by Congress until time and experience shall demonstrate the necessity of further legislation to guard against evasion or abuse.

Mr. DAVIS addressed the Senate at some length, in opposition to the resolution. His speech will be found in the Appendix.

Mr. MANGUM. The Senator from Mississippi has intimated a desire to address the Senate on this subject.

Mr. McRAE. That was my intention.

Mr. MANGUM. I will very cheerfully give way to the gentleman for that purpose. If I can get the floor when he shall have concluded his remarks, I will endeavor to get rid, if such be the sense of the Senate, of the further consideration of this resolution. I think the debate on it has been wholly unprofitable; and if it produces the slightest effect on the public mind, it will be that which is pernicious and deeply injurious. However, out of courtesy to the Senator from Mississippi, who is here for the first session, I feel it to be my duty to give way to him; but I hope I shall be able to obtain the floor after him.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. President, I thank the honorable Senator from North Carolina for the courtesy which he has extended to me; but there will not be time enough to-day for me to make the remarks which I desired to make on this resolution, and the questions embraced in it. I therefore ask the Senate to adjourn now, so as to enable me to speak to-morrow.

Mr. MANGUM. I hope the honorable Senator will withdraw that motion, as it is important that we should go into executive session.

Mr. McRAE. I withdraw the motion to adjourn, and move to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until to-morrow, at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On the motion of Mr. MANGUM, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and, on motion, The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 28, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Mr. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. HOUSTON moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. If the motion to go into Committee of the Whole do not prevail, I ask what will be the first business then before the House?

The SPEAKER. It will be the call of committees for reports.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope it will be the pleasure of the House to allow the morning hour to be appropriated to the regular order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the House will go into Committee of the Whole, and finish the Mexican indemnity bill. It is very necessary that the House should come to some final action upon that subject as soon as possible. There is a special order for to-morrow, and gentlemen must see the importance of disposing of the indemnity bill to-day.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to withdraw the motion to go into Committee of the Whole, in order to allow me to make a report from the Committee on the Judiciary. It is a report which I am confident the House is anxious to receive; and I submit to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] whether it will not better facilitate the business of the House by allowing this report now to be made?

Mr. HOUSTON. If the House have no objection to receive the report of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McLANAHAN] desires to present—as it is a report which will have an important bearing on one of the appropriation bills—I shall not object; but I must decline to withdraw my motion to go into committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania can present his report only by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMART. I object, unless the other committees be allowed to present reports.

Mr. HOUSTON. I now beg to press my motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and upon that motion I ask the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I desire to ask if the bounty land bill, which is made the special order for to-morrow, will not then take precedence of the Mexican indemnity bill?

The SPEAKER. It will take precedence.

Mr. HOUSTON. At the request of gentlemen around me, I ask the consent of the House to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays. I do not wish unnecessarily to take up the time of the House.

There was no objection, and the call for the yeas and nays was withdrawn.

Mr. HOUSTON asked for tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. HOUSTON and FOWLER were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 101, noes 29.

So the motion prevailed.

MEXICAN INDEMNITY BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN stated the first business in order to be the annual message of the President of the United States, and the resolution of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] to refer it to the several standing committees.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to take up House bill No. 46, to provide for carrying into effect, in further part, the twelfth article of the treaty with Mexico, concluded at Guadalupe Hidalgo.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. That the sum of $3,180,000 be, and the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of the installment and interest, which will fall due on the 30th of May, 1852, under the twelfth article of the treaty between the United States and Mexico, made and concluded at Guadalupe Hidalgo, on the 2d of February, 1848.

The CHAIRMAN stated the question pending to be upon the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. MARSHALL] to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON.]

The amendment of Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, was read as follows:

"And that said sum be paid over to the proper authorities of Mexico by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States under the supervision of the President."

The amendment of Mr. MARSHALL, of California, to the amendment was read as follows:

"Provided, That the President may cause the payment to be made at such time and in such manner as will be most acceptable to the Government of Mexico."

Mr. MEADE demanded tellers upon the question, but they were not ordered.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was rejected.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JOHNSON,] and being taken, it was decided in the negative.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLINGMAN. If there is no amendment pending, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House.

Mr. DISNEY. I desire to offer the following amendment:

"To be paid in a manner conformably to the request of the Mexican Government."

Mr. Chairman, I am by no means prepared to say what I should like to say, but I feel I could not permit the opportunity to pass without stating distinctly to the House and to the country my views with regard to this matter; and my present purpose is, upon some future occasion, when I shall have time and opportunity, to elaborate the matter. I desire now simply to state, in the time allotted to me, that the correspondence submitted to the House, under the resolution of the House, has substantiated the charges before this committee. And I now, standing in my place as one of the representatives of the American people, distinctly and specifically arraign the present Administration, at the bar of the public opinion of this interests intrusted to their care. I arraign it for wronging the Treasury of the Republic out of a large sum of money which might have been saved to it by agreeing to the proposition of the Mexican Government for the payment at some place in the United States of the money due to her. I arraign them for disregarding that comity, which should exist among all the nations of the earth, but particularly between our Government and the Government of the Republic of Mexico at this peculiar time, and by the disregard of which this Administration has not only injured the monetary interests of this country, but they have given a blow to its political interests in the future. The correspondence submitted to this House shows that with Mexico this has been a most important matter. The Mexican Minister was instructed to press it to the very verge, but to abstain from actually giving offence. To Mexico it was indeed important. Mr. Webster admits that the request was made, and he admits, too, that he promptly refused to listen to it,—a refusal which, in view of the anxiety of the Mexican Government, must hereafter be deleterious to the political interests of this country, not only in relation to the general interests which may arise between the two Republics, but particularly in reference to a right of way, and the establishment of convenient communications between our fellow-citizens upon this shore and those upon the Pacific shore. For already we see the fact announced in the public prints that a proposition is pending upon the part of the Mexican Government to grant a right of way to the direction, care, and management of England. I therefore say that I arraign this Administration for willfully and without justification, permitting the best interests of the country to be sacrificed by subjecting the Government of Mexico to the cupidity of British bankers, and to the political influence of our rival, England. And what is the justification? Why, the wretched, miserable plea, that the terms of the treaty having fixed the time, mode, and place of payment, it was not competent for the Executive to alter it,—a plea utterly untenable. And here permit me to say, that no man on earth would saucily flout the receipt of acquittance in the face of a foreign Minister who should come forward with a claim for money paid under such circumstances.

But, independent of the argument which I think will be found to be perfectly irresistible, a single fact shows the insufficiency of the plea put forward by the Secretary of State. We had it authoritatively announced a few days since, by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that a part of the very first payment was made by the Government, not in gold and silver, as the terms of the treaty required, but in ordinance. Again, in the case of the man Forstall, who, upon one occasion, advanced some hundred thousand dollars—

[Here the Speaker's hammer fell.]

Mr. HOUSTON. I would say a word to correct an erroneous impression in the mind of the gentleman from Ohio. I intended to say on a former occasion—but I do not remember the precise language I used—but the idea I intended to convey was, that the arms were disposed of and the proceeds were applied to the payment, in part, of the installment; and the records will so appear. I say the amendment of the gentleman ought not to be adopted.

Mr. DISNEY. I care nothing about the amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman says he cares nothing about the amendment, and therefore I do not wish to consume any time in discussing it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I propose to amend the amendment as follows:

Provided it impose no additional expense upon the United States.

Mr. J. said: It seems the conclusion is foregone, and that this House, with the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means at its head, is determined to indorse the course pursued by the Secretary of State.

Mr. HOUSTON. Not at all.

Mr. JOHNSON. One thing that we have been complaining of, and considered to be wrong, is, that the Secretary of State should go on, in advance of an appropriation being made by Congress, and make a contract with a set of bankers for the payment of money, that he did not know whether the Congress of the United States would appropriate a dollar to meet or not. This we assume to be wrong, and as going beyond the legitimate duties of the Secretary. But it seems to be the intention of this House, with the chairman of the Ways and Means at its head, that Mr. Webster's course is to be indorsed. We are told, furthermore, in this discussion, and that, too, by the chairman of the former Committee of Ways and Means, that the Secretary of State authorized him to say, that this proposition would not have been accepted, in connection with Mr. Green, had the Mexican Government agreed to pay twenty per cent. Such a remark is contained in his printed speech; and he was authorized to state it to this House and this country, that if this Government could have realized twenty per cent. by this operation, that this Secretary would not have accepted it. What is the conclusion to be drawn from this declaration, which the chairman of the committee was authorized to announce to this country? Is not the conclusion clear and irresistible in regard to the Secretary of State, that "I have made an arrangement with my friends, by which I can be benefited, or by which my friends can be benefited, and which cannot be departed from, notwithstanding some persons may come forward and offer twenty per cent. for the privilege of transacting this business?" I say these facts ought to be known to the country. With all these facts before us—the making of this contract in advance of any law making an appropriation, and without even knowing whether this House would take upon itself the high responsibility of refusing to make the appropriation—we are called upon to indorse these high-handed measures. I say for one—and I speak irrespective of party—I intend to give my vote against such proceeding, emanating from what quarter it may.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I had not designed to say anything more about this matter, and am very reluctant to do it now. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JOHNSON] says that I had been authorized to inform this House that if this offer of Duff Green had proposed to have given us twenty per cent., it would not have been accepted. So I was. But the gentleman undertakes to infer from that, that it establishes that Mr. Webster, having made a contract with his friends, would not have varied that contract even though the Government would be greatly benefited thereby. Did not I inform this House, at the same time, that it was Mr. Webster's opinion that he had no legal authority to accept these terms? That was Mr. Webster's opinion. It is my opinion, and I venture to say would be the opinion of nineteen twentieths of the Congress of the United States, who would look at the subject. Is the Secretary of State, the President, or the Secretary of the Treasury authorized to accept these drafts? Have they any other authority than the authority conferred upon them by the Constitution and the law? I ask, where is the law upon the statute-book authorizing the Secretary of State, or the Secretary of the Treasury, or anybody else, to accept these drafts from the Mexican Government? Why, sir, a transaction more void of authority it is impossible to conceive of than the idea that the Secretary of State is to accept drafts upon our Treasury, in absence of law specifically to authorize it. There is no authority authorizing him to do it. Is he an independent power? Has he any right without authority of law to bind our Treasury or commit our Government in a moneyed transaction? Why, sir, it is nothing but the respect I feel for some gentlemen who have entertained such an idea, that prevents me from speaking of it as one of the most monstrous propositions I ever heard propounded in the American Congress.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, proposed the following amendment:

Provided, That it shall not be inconsistent with the terms of the treaty made between the two existing Governments.

Mr. JOHNSON. The gentleman from Virginia, in the conclusion of his remarks, informed the House that it was merely out of respect to some members that he did not speak of this proposition in stronger terms. I do not know what those terms would have been, other than what he has generally given. In other words, he treats the idea as being supremely ridiculous. Well, sir, at this stage of the proceedings, I consider it ridiculous and in violation of the law, of the spirit and genius of the Constitution and the treaty itself, for Mr. Webster to have made the arrangement, and for him to come forward and indorse it in advance of the appropriation by law of the money. I assert that it is in violation of law, and that Mr. Webster, nor anybody else had the right to accept drafts upon the Treasury when the money had not been appropriated. But is not it as just, as legal, and would it not be as much in conformity with the treaty, to make the arrangement through General Green, or the Mexican Minister, with the Mexican Government, as through the Barings & Brothers, in advance of the appropriation of the money? Most unquestionably it would. And how do the facts stand? There was an attempt to make an arrangement with Mr. Clayton, when he was the Secretary of State, for the payment of this money; and what did he say upon the subject? He said that in advance of an appropriation by Congress, he did not feel authorized to make any arrangement. Thus far the position is true. But if we could make an arrangement with one class of individuals in anticipation of the appropriation, could we not make an arrangement with another class? It is a mere matter of discretion—of the exercise of the judgment of the parties authorized to make the payment. How does this matter stand? Here is a negotiation going on, and suppose the money was appropriated, as it was proposed to be, some twelve months ago, could not the Treasurer of the United States accept a draft drawn by the proper authorities of Mexico, and pay money upon that draft as well as upon a draft drawn by anybody else? Oh! but the gentleman seems to think otherwise.

There are some gentlemen who may attempt to make themselves masters of the law, and assume to know everything. A proposition upon the part of one Government to another, is a mere question of agreement not to infringe the spirit of the treaty. The question will come up afterwards, whether the treaty had been complied with or not in the payment of the money. If the Mexican Government drew a draft upon this Government after the money was appropriated by law, let me ask, however ridiculous it may be conceived by some, if it would be in violation of the treaty for this Government to accept that draft—merely to accede to the proposition in the payment of the money? Does it smack in the slightest degree of violation of law, of infringement of the treaty? Not at all. But this arrangement would have saved, I am authorized to believe, an immense sum to the Government, had the money been appropriated. How does the present proposition stand? They come forward and say that they will give us security and vouchers to the Government at the proper time. What are they? They will put in pledge Government stocks bearing an interest of six per cent., and propose to pay the Government of the United States three and a half per cent. for the money that is to be appropriated fourteen months in advance. Do not these stocks bear as much interest by being pledged to the Government as they did before? And what then is the operation? We, in effect, pay them two and a half per cent. for this operation. This is the whole of the matter. It is for the percentage, the shaving that is to fall into the pockets of those concerned, that they have consented to the whole thing.

Mr. MEADE. My colleague [Mr. BAYLY] has in a measure expressed an opinion adverse to the one I expressed on a former occasion, and in doing so he took occasion to say that nineteen twentieths of the lawyers of the country would be also of an opinion different to it; and I think it somewhat incumbent upon me to make a short reply.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must here state, without calling the gentleman to order, that under the rule five minutes is allowed for the explanation of, and five minutes for opposition to, the amendment, and not for a general discussion upon the merits of the original proposition.

Mr. MEADE. I am opposing the amendment, and I suppose I will be allowed the same latitude as has been extended to other gentlemen who have spoken upon this subject. Now, this was paid by drafts substantially, although not in a commercial point of view, not technically, to the Barings & Brothers, through their agent Forstall. Drafts were sent here by Forstall to be paid; and why could not drafts in the same shape be sent by the Mexican Government, by her agent, to be paid? They were, instead of being commercial drafts in the usual form, certificates sent to the Secretary of State, to the effect that Forstall had advanced so much money to the Mexican Government, and that that advancement was to be taken out of the indemnity due her. When we speak of drafts, we mean drafts in that form and substantially to that effect. It was a certificate upon the part of the Mexican Government, that Forstall should receive $650,000 of the indemnity which was due to Mexico upon the 30th day of May, and that is the form in which the drafts could have been presented in favor of Mexico or the agent of Mexico. We are speaking about the substance, not the shadow, of things. It is true, as my colleague says, that a commercial draft, drawn in the way he supposes, could not be accepted by the Secretary of State; but any notification, like that in favor of Forstall, could have been given in favor of Marks, or any other agent of the Mexican Government, and the amount thus certified to, as having been advanced to the Mexican Government, could be deducted out of the indemnity which was due on the 30th of May. If you go into the details of the whole of that payment, you will find that not one cent of the money was paid in any other way. In point of fact, the whole three millions of dollars thus paid by the Barings & Brothers to that Government, was drawn for by them here. I will venture that without knowing the fact, because it was the easiest way by which it could be done. The draft in favor of Forstall proves not only that the draft was paid here, but that it was paid months before the indemnity was due; and so the arrangement could have been made in favor of Mexico. Why could it not have been made as much in favor of Mexico as the Barings?

Mr. FREEMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish—
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot submit any remarks upon this amendment, nor can he offer any amendment, as there is now an amendment pending to the amendment.

The question was then taken, and the amendment of Mr. JOHNSON was rejected.

Mr. BAYLY moved, pro forma, to strike out the words "Mexican Government."

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, "to be paid in conformity to the request of the Mexican Government." The gentleman from Virginia proposes to strike out the words "Mexican Government." It will then read "to be paid in conformity to the request?"

Mr. BAYLY. If the amendment prevails I shall then move to fill the blank. Mr. Chairman, my colleague has certainly not examined this matter with his usual care. If he had he certainly would not have misconceived the subject as much as he does. He asks the question, why we could not accept drafts of the Mexican Government as well as those of the Barings? The Barings never drew any drafts in form or substance upon our Government. By their contract, on the day of payment, they were to make the payment in gold and silver to the Mexican Government, and to take their receipts for it. I presume they provided themselves with the money to make the payment by drafts drawn in Mexico upon London and New York. But they drew no drafts upon our Government; and I undertake to say, if my colleague will think of it for a moment, that he will say that drafts drawn by Mexico upon this Government and accepted by our Secretary of State, without express authority of law for him to do so, would not be worth the paper they were written upon. To assume that they would be, is to assume powers in the officers of this Government independent of law. It is to assume that they have independent and distinct powers inherent in them, and not conferred by law. Now, I say that Forstall's certificate, to which the gentleman refers, was nothing but a ratification by the Mexican Government to our Government that they had hypothesized to the extent of his advances, or in other words, that they had given him a lien to the extent of his advances upon this indemnity, to be satisfied when it should be paid. They could have given that lien to any other bankers; and the fact that the Barings were our agents did not give them any advantage over other bankers, as I have before explained. But I am done with this subject. Everybody understands it whoever will understand it. I shall not say one word more in reference to it, no matter what turn the debate may take.

Mr. MEADE. My colleague says he is done with this subject. I am not quite done with it yet. I will just read to my colleague a few lines of a letter which was addressed to the Secretary by the Barings:

"It will be perceived from the foregoing, that the contractors made all their payments to Mexico out of their own funds, and were afterwards reimbursed in the United States, at a date averaging the 15th of May, and the last and largest payment by the United States to the contractors of two millions of dollars was not made until the 27th of June, nearly one month after they had paid the full installment to Mexico."

Now here is an admission on the part of the bankers themselves that we had paid them previous to the 30th day of May, when this money became due under the treaty. How? Everybody familiar with such transactions knows how. Those drafts were drawn by the Barings—this certificate was sent by the Mexican Government to our Secretary here, notifying him that Forstall, for instance, had advanced so much money, and was entitled to that amount of money out of the indemnity which was due. Will my colleague tell me how did these bankers draw out of the Treasury previous to the 15th day of May any portion of this indemnity, if it was not for the purpose of paying the Mexican indemnity, either by transferring it there or by drawing drafts upon it here? This letter is an admission of the fact, and my colleague cannot get over that admission.

Mr. BOCOCK. I move to amend the amendment—

The CHAIRMAN. It is not now in order.

There is an amendment to the amendment pending. The question is upon the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY.]

The question was then taken and it was not agreed to.

Mr. CARTTER. I move to reinsert the words, if in order, "the Government of Mexico."

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment would not be in order.

Mr. CARTTER. I move to strike out the word "request," and insert the words "pursuant to."

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of that amendment, because I think it raises substantially the issue that has been made in the discussion upon this subject, and brings up the conflict that has been waged between the Secretary of State and the authorities of Mexico. I am in favor of it as a substantial amendment—an amendment promoting the right and rebuking the wrong. The question raised in that amendment is, whether this Government, in its treatment of a kindred Republic upon our own continent, shall consult the desires of that Government, or shall sacrifice its interests to its creditor, and pass that Government through the hands of successive monetary speculators, before the fund, which we honestly owe her, is honestly paid to her? A technical exception has been taken by the honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY,] who presided over the Committee of Ways and Means during the last Congress. It was a technical exception only. He has been compelled, in the specious defence he has made—

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. CARTTER. I hope it will not be taken out of my time.

Mr. BROOKS. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTTER] is to strike out. My point of order is this: that his argument should be confined to the reasons why the words "pursuant to the" should be inserted, and confined strictly to that. If the gentleman will permit me to say, I have no objection to this debate going on to any extent, if it will be permitted on both sides of the House. If we are going to pass the bill, let us stop the debate.

Mr. CARTTER. My argument was addressed to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is not debatable. The question of order, in the opinion of the Chair, is well taken. Under the rules, after debate has been terminated, five minutes are allowed for explanations of amendments, and five minutes to oppose such amendments as may be offered. The good sense of the House, or the members, must, to a very great extent, control them in that matter; because it will be impossible for the Chair to say how gentlemen intend to apply their arguments; and if they violate the rules of order, it will, perhaps, be impossible for the Chair to enforce them. It is very clear, that under the rules of the House, the original proposition, or the merits of the bill, are not now under consideration.

Mr. CARTTER. Does the Chair apprehend the force of that amendment, permit me to inquire? My amendment is in form "pursuant to the request of the Mexican Government."

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman, I believe, is to insert the words "pursuant to the" before the word "request." It will then read "to be paid in conformity and pursuant to the request."

Mr. CARTTER. I move to strike out the word "conformity."

The CHAIRMAN. That will be a double amendment. Both cannot be entertained.

Mr. CARTTER. I wish to ascertain, if a verbal amendment is introduced by a member, and it enters into and forms a part of the sense of the amendment, whether he is confined to a definition of the word thus introduced?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated the amendment as the gentleman proposed it, and decided that he could not make another motion to amend when one was pending. His motion was, to insert a word in one part of the amendment, and he cannot move to strike out a word in another part.

Mr. CARTTER. That is a part of the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not hear the gentleman move to strike out anything.

Mr. CARTTER. If my amendment was misunderstood, I will accommodate the gentleman from New York in a few minutes. I will withdraw it, as in that connection it makes no sense at all, and as it was misunderstood by the Chair.

The question was then taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CARTTER. I now propose to amend the amendment, if it is in order, so that it will read, "in pursuance of the request of the Mexican Government."

Mr. BROOKS. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman—

Mr. CARTTER. If this does not allow discussion, I do not want to discuss it. I wish to ascertain the fact, whether it brings up my right to discuss the merits of the amendment itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that, under the rules, the gentleman from Ohio will be confined to the explanation of his amendment—the words "in pursuance of the request of the Mexican Government"—that is, as to the propriety of inserting his amendment into that of his colleague; but, in the opinion of the Chair, it does not open the merits of the whole question on the original bill, because the resolution terminating debate says, the debate upon the bill shall terminate.

Mr. DISNEY. I would inquire respectfully of the Chair, what are the merits of the main question pending?—if there is anything else involved, but simply to make this appropriation of three millions of dollars?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would answer the gentleman, that the question of propriety of paying this money is, perhaps, not now before the committee for discussion; upon that the House have ordered the termination of debate. Now, it is to the amendment pending, offered by the gentleman himself, and to the amendment of his colleague, that the rule requires he should confine himself to an explanation of.

Mr. CARTTER. In explanation of the sense of the expression, "in pursuance of the request of the Mexican Government," I was proceeding to remark—and I shall confine myself to that point, for I do not wish to discuss anything else—that it raised before this House the simple issue, whether we would consult the will of Mexico in this payment, or whether we would consult the directions given by the Secretary of State. Now, unless there was some sinister reason—unless there was some selfish consideration entering into and forming the quo animo, with which the Secretary of State seeks to defeat the will of the Mexican Government in the receipt of this money, I hold that he would consult that will. The very fact that he turns his back upon it—the very fact that he disregards the expressed will of that Government, brings to light the inevitable suspicion—

Mr. BROOKS, (interrupting.) I rise to a point of order. I have no objection to this discussion going on—

Mr. CARTTER. Go ahead and state your point of order.

Mr. BROOKS. My point of order is this. There is an amendment submitted by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DISNEY,] that the money shall be paid "conformably with the wishes of the Mexican Government." The amendment submitted by the other gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTTER] is, to strike out "conformably with," and insert "pursuant to." My point of order is, that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTTER] should show the reason for striking out "conformably with," and inserting "pursuant to," and that his whole argument should be directed to that object, and to that only.

Mr. CARTTER. That means that my argument must be strictly technical.

The CHAIRMAN. The 34th rule provides:

"No member shall occupy more than one hour in debate on any question in the House, or in committee; but a member reporting the measure under consideration from a committee may open and close the debate: Provided, That where debate is closed by order of the House, any member shall be allowed, in committee, five minutes to explain any amendment he may offer, after which any member who shall first obtain the floor shall be allowed to speak five minutes in opposition to it, and there shall be no further debate on the amendment; but the same privilege of debate shall be allowed in favor of and against any amendment that may be offered to the amendment."

The Chair thinks, as he before stated, that under the rule the gentleman must confine himself to an explanation of his amendment.

Mr. CARTTER. Will the Chair be good enough to give me the limitation within which I must confine my remarks? I do not exactly comprehend it. The question raised in my own mind is, whether I am confined to a literal explanation of the words, or whether I may discuss the sense of my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the gentleman's explanation, to be within the rule, must be to show to the committee the difference between the words "in pursuance of," and "conformably with," and to give reasons why the words he moves to insert should be adopted in place of those used in the amendment of his colleague.

Mr. CARTTER. I appeal from that decision.

Mr. DISNEY. I desire to say one word.

The CHAIRMAN. The appeal is not debatable.

Mr. DISNEY. I am not going to debate it at all. But as there seems to be a question about words, I desire that my amendment shall be read in my own English. I never used such English as has been read from the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has certainly not altered a word of the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. DISNEY. I wrote it "in a manner conforming to."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I would inquire of the Chair, whether the construction which he puts on the 34th rule has ever been practically put upon it?

Mr. CARTTER. Never in the world.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been the uniform practice since the adoption of the rule; but, as the Chair before said, it must depend to a very great extent upon the regard paid to that rule by the members themselves.

Mr. CARTTER demanded tellers on the appeal; but they were not ordered.

And the question being taken, the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The question was then taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The question recurring on Mr. DISNEY's amendment, it was put, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CARTTER. I now move the amendment just offered by my colleague, [Mr. DISNEY,] with this change, that I have inserted the words "in pursuance of" in lieu of "in conformity with."

Mr. HIBBARD. That amendment is substantially the same as the one just voted down, and I submit that it is therefore out of order.

The CHAIRMAN ruled the amendment out of order, on the ground that the committee had substantially rejected the amendment, having first voted down the amendment to the amendment and then the amendment.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is there any amendment now pending?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. ROBBINS. Then I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 46, to provide for carrying into execution, in further part, the twelfth article of the treaty with Mexico concluded at Guadalupe Hidalgo, and had instructed him to report the same to the House without amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The position which I have occupied during the discussion upon this bill has precluded me from taking any part in it, or from making any explanation in justification of the course which I have heretofore, and which I shall upon this occasion feel it my duty to pursue. At the same time, my relation to this question at the last Congress and at the present Congress requires of me, I think, a few words in justification, or, at least, in explanation of my course; particularly when I reflect that there are those upon this floor who take a different view of this question to what I do, to differ from some of whom always creates in my mind a distrust of the correctness of my own opinions. But, sir, being thoroughly convinced, and as thoroughly satisfied of the correctness of the course which I have usually pursued in regard to this measure, I desire to state, in a very brief manner, why it is that I now take that course.

It will be recollected that at the last session of Congress I was a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, from which a bill was reported to and passed by this House, to pay the third installment of the Mexican indemnity. I was also upon that committee when it reported to this House a bill to provide for the payment of this last installment. Both of these bills met my approbation, and they were reported here with my assent and approval. And this bill has been again reported at the present session with my consent and approbation. During this discussion, however, the course which the Committee of Ways and Means felt itself called upon to pursue has been called in question. Now, I want to know when the message of the President of the United States was referred to our committee, asking this House to appropriate the money necessary to pay this last installment, what was the duty of that committee? Why, it was our duty to inquire, in the first place, whether the money asked for by the President was required in order to carry into effect the stipulations of the treaty with the Government of Mexico. In the performance of that duty, therefore, we looked to the twelfth article of that treaty, and we found that this Government had bound itself by that treaty to pay the Government of Mexico $15,000,000—$3,000,000 to be paid down at the time of the ratification of the treaty, and $3,000,000 at the end of each twelve months thereafter, with interest on the whole amount then due until the whole $15,000,000 should have been paid.

[A message was here received from the President of the United States, by the hands of M. P. Fillmore, his Private Secretary, announcing that he had signed sundry bills.]

Mr. J. continued. In February, 1849, a bill was passed by the Congress of the United States, appropriating $3,720,000, being the first installment, with the interest due up to the 30th of May, 1849. The same bill also appropriated the amount necessary for the payment of the second installment, which would be due on the 30th of May, 1850, and which, with the interest, amounted to $3,540,000. That bill, which appropriated $7,260,000 for the payment of the two first installments of this indemnity, was in precisely the same terms as the one now under consideration, except so far as regards the amount and date. It simply made an appropriation of the money, without giving any direction to the Executive in relation to the mode of payment. And it passed this House by a vote of 187 to 8. In 1850—at the first session of the last Congress—a bill, in precisely the same terms, making an appropriation of $3,360,000, passed this House with only thirty-five or thirty-six votes against it. Now, when the President's message, asking for this appropriation this session, was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, we looked into the treaty, and found that all the money which this Government had stipulated to pay, with the exception of the last installment, amounting, with the interest, to $3,180,000, had been paid; which installment will be due on the 30th of May next. The committee report the bill making appropriation for the payment of this money exactly as all the other bills have been reported; but when it is brought in here, the question is raised, that we must direct the manner and mode in which the payment is to be made. That is a question with which I shall have no concern whatever. I come not here to defend the Secretary of State. I come not here to defend the Secretary of the Treasury. If the payment had heretofore been made by the Secretary of the Treasury, I would not interfere to direct it to be paid by any other officer. If the President of the United States should even direct the assistant Treasurer at the city of New York, or the assistant Treasurer at the city of New Orleans, or any other individual who might be selected as the medium through which this payment was to be made, I should not be willing to interfere by giving a different direction, and by that interference to release the Executive from all responsibility in the matter, and to take that responsibility upon ourselves, when this is clearly and exclusively a duty which belongs to the Executive of the country.

I can very well imagine why the Mexican Government should come here and ask that the Secretary of the Treasury should pay this money. The Secretary of the Treasury, it will be recollected, during the late war with Mexico, evinced, in the opinion of the Democratic party, a much stronger partiality for the cause of Mexico than he entertained for the cause of the United States. But suppose we should direct the Secretary of the Treasury to make this payment, what do we do? What does it amount to? Why, it is saying that we have more confidence in Thomas Corwin, than we have in Daniel Webster. Now, I ask my friends upon this floor, if there is one here who is willing to say, by his vote, that he has greater confidence in Thomas Corwin, the Secretary of the Treasury, than he has in Daniel Webster, the Secretary of State?

Mr. DISNEY. I have greater confidence in him.

Mr. JONES. My friend from Ohio says he has greater confidence in him. I beg to say—

Mr. CARTER. I take pleasure in saying that, as far as I am concerned, I have no confidence in either of them.

Mr. JONES. Well, I do not intend by my vote to say that I have greater confidence in the present Secretary of the Treasury than I have in the Secretary of State. The Constitution of the United States provides that the Constitution and all the laws made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land. It says that the President shall be the Executive officer of the Government, and that it shall be his duty to execute the laws. Now, I hold that the treaty made with Mexico, and ratified by both Governments, is declared by the Constitution of the United States to be the supreme law of the Government, and the President is required to execute it. But the President cannot execute this provision of that treaty until Congress has placed at his disposal the amount of money necessary to enable him to make the payment, and to fulfill the obligations of the treaty which we have contracted and bound ourselves to comply with. Then I hold that it is the duty of Congress to appropriate the money necessary, and leave it to the President of the United States to direct the mode and manner in which it shall be paid.

But suppose we should adopt the amendment and provide that it shall be paid in the manner which the Mexican Government desires. Does any man suppose that the Mexican Government would take less than the amount which would be required to pay the installment in Mexico? Does any man suppose she would accept of less than one hundred cents upon the dollar if paid in the city of New York? The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MEADE] says she would take four and a half per cent. less. Mr. Speaker, if there is any such evidence before this Congress or before the country, I confess that I have not seen it. I have not, perhaps, read this correspondence of the Mexican Minister, Mr. De la Rosa, with as much care as some other gentlemen. But in that correspondence, if I have read it aright, Mr. De la Rosa informs this Government, that the Mexican Government had received advances in money from Mr. Forstall. I do not see that he has any authority to ask this Government to pay Mr. Forstall in America, the money. It appears from this correspondence that the Mexican Government had received at one time $400,000, and at another, $250,000; but that Government is not bound to reimburse that money. Again, it is said that it could be paid on better terms through drafts on Mr. Marks. Now, I want to know, if it appears anywhere in this correspondence that the Mexican Minister was ever authorized to receive the money at all, or any part of it? I ask if there is a lawyer upon this floor—for I do not make any pretensions to one—who will say that a Minister Plenipotentiary and Envoy Extraordinary of Mexico can receive the money due from this Government to Mexico? According to my information, he cannot. I have seen no authority from that Government to Mr. De la Rosa to receive any part of this installment. But suppose our Government had accepted and paid the draft of Mr. Marks: had the Mexican Government ever engaged to accept those drafts? Not so far as we are informed. Mr. De la Rosa asks that this Government should accept them, but he did it without any authority from his Government, so far as I have seen, to make that request.

Now, sir, it seems to me that in this whole question it has not been a fight in regard to the manner in which this installment shall be paid, because the Government of the United States has lost anything which rightfully belonged to it, but because the Government has not had enough of the Shylock infused into it in this transaction—because we have not saved as much or made as much by the payment of this installment as we might have done. Now, let us see how these installments have been paid. The first installment of three millions, paid in cash, was, I understand, paid through General Butler, then commanding our forces, or a portion of them, in Mexico, at the time of the ratification of this treaty. He paid those three millions of dollars, and saved upon it, in the way of exchange, $41,000. The second installment was paid in 1849, under an appropriation made in February of that year, and approved by Mr. Polk, when he was President. As I understand that question, Mr. Walker, the then Secretary of the Treasury, made a contract for the payment of the second installment before the law appropriating the money was passed. It was paid in Mexico, being the installment of $3,000,000, and $720,000 the interest upon the twelve millions unpaid from the ratification of the treaty to the time of the first payment, one year. That amount was paid, saving a premium of four and a half per cent. The $3,720,000 paid in 1849, under the direction of Mr. Polk's administration, was paid with $3,552,600, being a saving to the Government of $167,400.

The second payment made under the appropriation act of 1849, and approved by Mr. Polk, but paid under General Taylor's administration, being $3,540,000, was paid, less a premium of about four and one third per cent., being $3,386,616 26, making a saving to the Government, upon that installment, of $153,383 74.

The third installment of $3,360,000 was paid with $3,242,400, a saving of about three and a half per cent. premium, being a saving, in the aggregate, upon the third installment of $117,600.

The present installment of $3,180,000, if it shall be paid at a premium of three and a half per cent., will be paid with $3,068,700—being a saving of $111,300.

Then we find that the saving is as follows:
Upon the cash payment at the ratification of the treaty $41,000 00
Upon the first installment..... 167,400 00
“ “ second installment..... 153,383 74
“ “ third installment..... 117,600 00
“ “ fourth installment..... 111,300 00
$590,683 74

Making an aggregate of not quite $600,000 saved, in the way of premium, upon the whole transaction with Mexico; and so much less than by the face of the treaty we were required to pay her. Now how is this done? If you directed the Secretary of the Treasury to pay this money, he certainly would not send to Mexico an agent, and there draw drafts upon this country, in order to raise the amount of money there to pay it, because he would have no authority to do such a thing. Then you use these agents—as this and all other governments have done, and, I presume, will do—in the performance of this sort of duties. These men go to Mexico and draw bills upon this country, upon England, upon France, perhaps upon Amsterdam, and other places, where the commerce of the country may require. They sell those drafts there, and when they have accumulated the money, they pay it to that Government and take a receipt therefor, and bring them here and receive the money from this Government.

Now I think the Committee of Ways and Means, at each time when it reported a bill in connection with that treaty, has discharged strictly and faithfully its duty to the country. I think that this bill should be passed as it comes from that committee, making the appropriation and giving no direction about it. If any gentleman here will come and ask for an investigation of this matter, to know when, where, how and in what manner there has been corruption or favoritism, by which high officers of the Government have improperly received money, or have improperly put money into the pockets of their friends, I will go with them, and give them every facility in my power, for a strict and scrutinizing investigation into the whole question, that it may be developed to Congress, and be exposed to the country.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the previous question.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I ask the gentleman from Alabama to withdraw his motion for a single moment. I wish to offer a single amendment; I intended to have offered in the committee; and I will move the previous question myself, if the gentleman desires it. It is as follows.

Provided, The President of the United States shall feel bound to accept of any propositions for the payment of said installment, that may be offered by the proper Mexican authorities, if not deemed inconsistent with the interests of the United States.

Mr. HOUSTON. If I withdraw for one, there is no telling where we shall stop. I feel it my duty to move it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then I hope the House will vote under the previous question.

Mr. J. demanded tellers on the previous question; which were ordered, and Messrs. HOUSTON and CHANDLER were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 111; noes not counted.

So the previous question received a second, and the main question was ordered to be put. The main question being: Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was put and carried in the affirmative.

Mr. DUNHAM moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

The bill was then read the third time, and the question now being, Shall the bill pass?—

Mr. HOUSTON called for the previous question.

The previous question received a second, and the main question was ordered to be put, which main question was, Shall the bill pass?

The question was then taken, and under the operation of the previous question, it was finally passed.

Mr. DUNHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, which latter motion was agreed to.

THE CUBAN PRISONERS.

Mr. BAYLY. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. My object is to take up the bill for the relief of the Cuban prisoners.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I hope the House will go to the regular order of the day.

The SPEAKER. The motion is a privileged one.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. BAYLY, and it was agreed to.

So the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated that the first business in order was the annual message of the President of the United States.

Mr. BAYLY. I move to lay that aside in order to take up the bill I referred to just now.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I have no objection to the motion of the gentleman, but I want to know what is the decision of the Chair upon this question. I understand it is regarded as in order for the chairman, or any other member of the Committee on Printing, to call up the question relating to the printing contract with Donelson & Armstrong at any time. I have no disposition to call it up. I want to know if the Chair holds that to be a privileged question which can be gotten rid of only by unanimous consent, or that any member may call it up?

The CHAIRMAN. The opinion of the Chair is, the business before the committee should be taken up regularly in its order, and that a motion must be made to dispense with each case as it is called.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am satisfied with that decision, if it is acquiesced in by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. If it is the unanimous consent of the committee, the regular order of business will be dispensed with, and bill 63, "For the relief of American citizens lately imprisoned and pardoned by the Queen of Spain," will be taken up.

There was no objection.

The CLERK read the bill as follows:

An act for the relief of American citizens lately imprisoned and pardoned by the Queen of Spain.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be, and hereby is, appropriated the sum of — dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the relief of American citizens lately imprisoned and pardoned by the Queen of Spain, and who are out of the limits of the United States, the same to be expended under the direction of the President of the United States.

Mr. BAYLY. I made a call upon the Administration for an estimate of the sum which will be necessary for the relief of these prisoners. The estimate sent in is in these words:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, }
WASHINGTON, January 8, 1852. }
To the Hon. THOMAS H. BAYLY,
Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 6th instant, requesting, on behalf of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, an estimate of the sum which may be necessary to carry into effect the President's recommendation in respect to the members of the Lopez expedition recently set free in Spain. In reply, I have the honor to acquaint you that, according to the best information in possession of this Department, the number of those persons is from one hundred and sixty to one hundred and seventy. Some expenses will probably have been incurred on their account prior to their release, and many of them will have required necessary clothing. This, including the cost of their passage home, may fairly be estimated at thirty-five dollars each. An appropriation of six thousand dollars would, therefore, probably be sufficient for all these purposes.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
DANIEL WEBSTER.

I move, therefore, that the blank in the bill be filled with "six thousand." If members will look at the bill they will see that it is carefully drawn. It provides for the appropriation of — dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of the money in the public Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the relief of American citizens lately imprisoned and pardoned by the Queen of Spain, and who are out of the limits of the United States, the same to be expended under the direction of the President of the United States. I shall not detain the committee with any remarks in advocacy of the bill. I think it vindicates itself.

The question was taken upon the amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. BAYLY. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

Mr. GIDDINGS then obtained the floor, and said he would avail himself of the opportunity to speak upon the subject of the foreign relations of the country, although not perhaps directly affecting the bill before the committee. He delivered a general speech on the doctrine of national intervention, which will be found in the Appendix.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I do not propose at this time to debate the subject of intervention. A proper opportunity will occur for that when we go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the President's message; after that another opportunity will occur upon a report which will come from the Committee on Foreign Affairs; but what I propose now to do is, to ask the committee to rise and stop this debate, that we may pass this bill appropriating six thousand dollars for the relief of some poor and deluded citizens of our own country, who have practically tested the expediency of intervention in the affairs of a foreign country. [Laughter.] I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I wish to say to the gentleman from Virginia that I desire this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House, to enable me to take up a bill to which I wish to propose an amendment. It is a bill which will not provoke any discussion, and is very much needed to be passed now.

Mr. BAYLY. The gentleman from New York will perceive my object is to stop debate upon this bill, and to bring the House to action upon it at once. I cannot consent to have this bill laid aside. If it is to pass at all it should be passed at once. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. CARTTER. I have an amendment I wish to offer. It is this:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed into an approbation of any interference in the domestic affairs of Cuba by any of the citizens of the United States.

Mr. BAYLY. I rise to a question of order. It is this: Pending a motion to rise an amendment is not in order.

Mr. CARTTER. I have the floor, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that he understood the gentleman from Virginia [Mr.

BAYLY] to make the motion that the committee rise and report the bill to the House. Upon which understanding the Chair had assigned the floor to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTTER] to make a motion.

Mr. BAYLY. On the contrary, as soon as he stated that he desired to make an amendment I modified my resolution so as to make it a simple motion to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Virginia to move that the committee rise and report the bill.

Mr. BAYLY. But when the gentleman from Ohio gave notice that he had an amendment, I saw at once I could not do that, and I modified my motion so as to make it simply that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. I understand it, and will put that question first.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. BAYLY, and it was agreed to.

So the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee (Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia) reported that the Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union had had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 63, being a bill for the relief of American citizens lately imprisoned and pardoned by the Queen of Spain, and had directed him to report that they had come to no conclusion thereon, and asked to be allowed to sit again.

Mr. BAYLY. I move the usual resolution to stop debate upon this bill in five minutes after the committee shall have resumed its consideration.

The question was then put and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BAYLY. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CARTTER. Is it in order to move an adjournment? Three o'clock has arrived.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. CARTTER. Then I move that this House do now adjourn.

[Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. SKELTON called the yeas and nays upon adjournment; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion to adjourn, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I suggest to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY] that we can in this House discharge the committee from the further consideration of this bill, and there is no necessity for the proceeding the gentleman asks for.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Only by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. BAYLY, and it was agreed to on a division of the House—yeas 99, noes not counted. So the House again resolved itself in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill No. 63.

Mr. CARTTER. I offer the following amendment:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed into an approbation of any interference in the domestic affairs of Cuba by any of the citizens of the United States.

Mr. CARTTER. I submit that amendment in good faith.

Mr. BAYLY. I rise to a question of order. My question is, that the amendment is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks, under the circumstances, that it is germane. Where individuals convicted, according to the bill, of a violation of the laws of Cuba, it is certainly germane to declare that, in the passage of this bill, we express no approbation of their conduct. The amendment is in order.

Mr. CARTTER. The appropriation of six thousand dollars contemplated by this bill, is designed for the purpose of bringing home certain men who have violated the neutrality laws of this country and the national sovereignty of a foreign Power. Our own laws are either at fault, or this appropriation ought to be made, under the circumstances, to promote the efficiency of those laws. If the proposition were to expend money to deliver your penitentiaries, all would vote against it. The reason why we vote this amount is because it is regarded as a sort of political offence, and those who have violated the neutrality laws are entitled to considerations that relate to political offences alone. I consider it important to the integrity of your own laws, important to the national integrity of this Government, that while we extend this relief from the dictates of humanity, we should throw around these laws a significance which will preserve their force. But a few years since and we had this filibusterian expedition upon our northern frontier, and citizens of the United States were led to the scaffold and into the prisons of the provinces of Canada, or were transported to Van Diemen's Land, to drag out their imprisonment there. When they were released by the clemency of the British Government, you heard nothing about expending money from the public Treasury to bring them back to the United States. They were compelled to drag themselves back here with the assistance of benevolent foreigners.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN stated the hour fixed by the House for the termination of debate had arrived.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I desire—

Mr. BAYLY. I have the right, after the debate has closed—having reported the bill—to be heard one hour under the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chairman recognized the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS]—not knowing what motion he had to submit.

Mr. EVANS. I rise for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is in order under the rules.

Mr. SWEETSER. I had supposed that the gentleman was entitled to his hour after all amendments had been considered in the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. He is entitled to his hour after the time fixed for the termination of the debate.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. Gentlemen need not suppose I am going to occupy an hour. I shall not occupy more than five minutes. I hope the bill may pass. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTTER] seems to think that our making provision to bring these prisoners home, is an approbation of their conduct. Now, let me give the gentleman a simple illustration, which will, I am sure, refute his argument at once. It is the law of Virginia, and I presume the law of Ohio, that when the courts send a man to the penitentiary, and incarcerate him there until the expiration of his term of punishment, or until he is pardoned, there shall be paid to him money sufficient to get him other clothes than those worn in the penitentiary, and to carry him home. This is the law, I presume, in all of the States. It is a matter of sheer humanity, and I take it for granted that it is the same in all of the States. After we have punished a man—after he has expiated his offence—is it a crime to afford him money to get back home? The simple statement is a refutation of the proposition. But the gentleman from Ohio says further, that if we have power to appropriate these $6,000 to bring home these Cuban prisoners from Spain, we have authority to appropriate money to carry home the convicts from State penitentiaries that may be turned out. Now, we would have no authority under the Constitution to appropriate this money were these men in our own territory. It is because they are in foreign countries, because it is a matter pertaining to our foreign relations that we have the power to appropriate this money. It is the distinction that Mr. Madison took. It is the distinction that Mr. Calhoun took in voting for the bill for the relief of the sufferers at Caracas.

As to that Caracas affair, I always doubted the constitutionality of it, because it was for the relief of foreigners and not American citizens. When our citizens are within the limits of any of the States, the General Government has nothing to do with them. They are under the jurisdiction of the separate States, and it is for the States to take care of them; but when they are beyond the limits of the United States, they are under the protection of our Government, and it is our duty to take care of them. It is for that reason we have appropriated annually from the foundation of the Government to this time a sum of money to relieve disabled and sick seamen in foreign countries; but no one will maintain we have a right to make an appropriation to relieve—

Mr. CARTTER. I wish to inquire, in all seriousness, if the gentleman puts disabled seamen as a tender against the neutrality laws of the United States and against—

Mr. BAYLY. I am now speaking of our power. The gentleman denied our authority to make the appropriation.

Mr. CARTTER. No; I did not. I am willing to vote for your bill, if you will save your laws.

Mr. BAYLY. If I had understood the gentleman was not denying our authority, I should not have spoken upon that point. I say that it is precisely because these people are beyond the limits of the United States; that they are not under the protection of any State government—they are by our Constitution emphatically under the protection of the National Government. We have the authority to grant them that relief which, were they in the States, the State governments would have to extend. That is the distinction.

Mr. MEADE. I ask my colleague to give me information upon this point: Are these prisoners still in Spain, or on their way to the United States, and at whose expense?

Mr. BAYLY. We have no information upon that point. They probably are still in Spain. They are certainly there unless some charitable ship-master is bringing them here, or unless the Queen of Spain is sending them home. If the Queen of Spain was sending them home, it would be butly decent and proper in us, before we have that information, to make an appropriation for their relief. We only appropriate so much as may be necessary for their relief, and we hold the President accountable for the manner in which he expends the money. I shall not detain the House further. I hope the bill may pass.

Mr. POLK submitted the following amendment to the amendment:

Nor in any way imply a disposition on the part of this House, to violate the principle embodied in the Farewell Address of President Washington, by encouraging the opinion that our Government will interfere in the affairs of European powers.

The question was then taken, and the amendment rejected.

Mr. CARTTER demanded tellers upon his amendment; which were ordered, and Messrs. MEACHAM and CARTER were appointed.

The question was then taken upon the amendment to the bill, and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 79, noes 58.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I propose to amend; and have only a word to say, and for the purpose of getting an opportunity to say it, I move to add to the bill an appropriation of $500 to the widow and children of Lieutenant Crittenden, who was shot down at Havana.

Mr. ORR. I rise to a question of order. The proposition of the gentleman from Ohio is not germane to the bill under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so decides.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I then move to strike out "$6,000" and insert "$100."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment is not in order, inasmuch as "$6,000" was put in by the committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will add "$500," making it "$6,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the amount cannot be changed. The committee have filled the blank.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will make this motion: "that the Secretary of State be authorized to make the disbursement of the fund."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests that the gentleman had better strike out "under the direction of the President of the United States," and insert "under an agent to be appointed by the President of the United States."

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have no copy of the bill before me, but will make a motion thus to amend it. I desire simply to say that I am opposed to this bill, and shall so vote when the question is taken on its passage. I was in favor of the amendment of my colleague excluding the inference that we indorsed the Cuban enterprise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls the gentleman to order. He must confine his remarks to the amendment he offered.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If the rules are to be enforced more strictly than they ever have been before, why, of course, I will submit. I am a law-abiding man, and desire to conform to the rules. I may be permitted to say, that such an application of the rule has never been made.

[Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"]

I should have been done before this if I had been allowed to go on.

Mr. ORR. The rule has been enforced with equal strictness upon other gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman in his remarks must confine himself to the amendment he offered. Such was the decision of the committee to-day.

Mr. CAMPBELL. After having this decision of the Chair, I will prove my disposition to obey the law and shall not insist upon debating the amendment. Besides, I confess that for the faithful disbursement of the fund if appropriated, I have as much confidence in the officer (the President) selected already by the bill, as in the Secretary of State. I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I would inquire whether it would be in order to move to strike out all after the enacting clause?

The CHAIRMAN. It will be, if the gentleman offers to insert something.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I make the motion, then, to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert an appropriation of $500 to the widow and children of Lieutenant Crittenden.

Mr. POLK. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio if Lieutenant Crittenden was married?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I don't know whether he was or not, and I don't care much, as my chief purpose is to raise my voice against this bill in a five minutes' speech—this being the last chance. If he was never married there will be no money to be paid under my amendment, if it prevails. I will add on that point, that I regard it as a great loss if a man of such indomitable bravery and courage as Lieutenant Crittenden, in his dying hour, showed he possessed, whatever might have been his follies, was not married. He ought to have left some children. I am opposed to this bill, because it provides an appropriation of a large amount of money out of the public Treasury, to bring back to the United States those who are admitted by the chairman who reports the bill, to have been criminals—to bring back those who are acknowledged to have violated our laws, and to have put in jeopardy the peace of friendly nations. I am not in favor of making an application of the funds of the public Treasury to any such purpose. There are very many excellent citizens of the West who, in pursuing an honest business—in carrying on lawful trade—in going to New Orleans with produce, for instance, have met with misfortunes upon our western waters, resulting from the snags in the Mississippi and other rivers, which the strict constructionists of this House could not consent to have taken out. They were left there far away from their homes and friends, without the means of returning to them.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I would ask the gentleman why Ohio did not provide for them?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Because our people never ask or expect to be relieved from such inconveniences by their Government. They rely upon the labor of their hard hands and the impulses of their bold hearts for relief. These very men who through misfortune were deprived of the means of returning to their families, never dreamed of calling on the national Government for help. They "worked their passages" homeward, as deck hands and firemen on steamboats; and if we compel honest people, who are loyal citizens, to do this, I ask, what power have we—what right have we—what reason have we, to take the very money which they have earned in part, and placed in your Treasury, and over which we are their chosen guardians, and appropriate it to the benefit of those who are acknowledged to be criminals before the whole world? It seems to me that is carrying the matter a little too far; and for one, though I may stand solitary and alone, I go against this whole system, which glorifies and pays for violations of law, at the expense of industrious, innocent poverty. These men are there—let them get back upon their own resources. It was a voluntary act of their own when they went to Cuba. They went there with a full knowledge of the dangers to which they subjected themselves and their country, and in direct violation of the laws of the land—in the face, too, of the solemn and friendly warning which the President of the United States had given them by his proclamation. And yet, forsooth, we propose, after they have had a ride over the salt water, to heroize and lionize them, to pay their wine bill, &c., and that they should travel back at the public expense.

Mr. PENN. How does the gentleman propose to get them back?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have no particular desire about their coming back until they earn enough to pay their expenses, and are thoroughly reformed. Let them work their passage, as honest people do, who are away from home without money. Let them act as firemen upon your steamers—let them black the boots of the passengers, if they please, as better men have often done before.

Mr. PENN. How will you clothe them?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I understand the Queen of Spain has already clothed them; if not, let them do it in the same honest way, by the labor of their hands and sweat of their brows.

Mr. PENN. They have no clothes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. They will have to come naked, then, because we have no power to clothe the poor and distressed out of the national Treasury—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STUART. I am greatly surprised at the position of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL.] I am not less surprised at the course of his remarks than to learn the source from which he ever drew his doctrine. Is any such doctrine taught upon the face of the earth? I ask the gentleman, beginning with the time when the Saviour came to this world, and coming down to the present time, to tell me, whether he has ever read of doctrines such as he has uttered here to-day? I am aware that the Government of the United States, through its Executive branch, went too far—greatly too far—when it proclaimed in advance that these men were outlaws and pirates, and thus furnished the Cuban and Spanish powers with grounds for treating them as pirates—to be considered as beyond and outside of our treaty obligations, and hence not entitled to the privileges of American citizens.

But, sir, has it come to this, that we rise here in our places and say, that fellow-citizens who have been thus unfortunate are to be brought back to their homes, to their firesides, to their friends, to their parents, hungry, naked, outside of humanity, outside of the protection even of God himself! If that doctrine is to be carried out—

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me a word of explanation?

Mr. STUART. Certainly.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman must not understand me as having, as an individual, no feeling of sympathy with these unfortunate men, who, having been misguided, may have been placed in a situation of this character. So far as I might aid a fellow man in that situation—in misery and want—I would doubtless, as an individual, be willing to go just as far as the gentleman from Michigan to relieve him by my individual means; but when the proposition is, to vote out of the national Treasury a fund for such a purpose, I say that we have no power to appropriate the money of the people to alleviate even the distresses of those who, in honest and lawful pursuits, are reduced to nakedness and want, much less to pay such a reward for a violation of the established law of the land.

Mr. STUART. The gentleman did not come to this question of power before. He did not argue his amendment before the committee upon the question of power. He never alluded to it, and I only rose—as I am averse at all times to detain the House—to repel such positions as he assumed in his remarks.

Mr. CAMPBELL then withdrew his amendment.

Mr. EVANS moved to amend the bill by adding thereto the following:

Provided, That the President of the United States shall send no ship of war for the purpose of bringing back these prisoners.

Mr. E. said: I take it that if a ship of war was sent to Spain to bring back these prisoners, it would be deemed an act of intervention on the part of this Government. Gentlemen see that I know how to get up an anti-intervention amendment. [Laughter.] It would be a decided act of intervention, and I am opposed to intervention by the Government of the United States with foreign powers. I voted against the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARTER,] because I thought it improper and out of place, but not because I am in favor of intervention. Sir, this is not a case of intervention at all. If these persons did intervene in the affairs of Spain by going to Cuba, the crime is at an end in consequence of the pardon of the Queen of Spain, and we do not intervene in the affairs of foreign nations by voting money to bring them home again. But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTER] argued that these men were punishable under our own laws. Take it for granted that they were—

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

NEW SERIES.... No. 27.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman, that he must confine his remarks to his own amendment.

Mr. EVANS. Take it for granted, that these persons are punishable by our own laws, so you cannot get at them to punish them, until they are brought back to this country. That is the only way in which you can enforce the laws. The voting of this money is not an act of intervention in the affairs of Spain at all, and for that reason I was opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CARTER] which has been adopted.

But, sir, these are miserable misguided men; they are generally young men; they are inexperienced.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls the gentleman to order. The general merits of the bill are not now before the committee.

Mr. EVANS. I am showing why the President should not send a ship-of-war after these persons. I say that these are very young and misguided men; many of them—most of them have not arrived at years of discretion, and they are not, therefore, to be judged by too rigid rules, and certainly, every dictate of humanity, and every impulse that can properly prompt the human heart, would lead us to vote this appropriation to bring them back to their families and friends.

Mr. SAVAGE. I wish to speak in opposition to the amendment. I think that a ship-of-war ought to be sent after these unfortunate men. I think so, not only from my understanding of the principles of humanity, which should control all Governments, but I think it ought to be done in accordance with a precedent which has been established by this Government, and which I had the honor of opposing—if it be an honor. We sent a ship-of-war to a foreign country to bring over a man and his associates, who were engaged in a cause which I cannot distinguish from the one in which these persons were engaged. I allude to the ship-of-war which was sent for the Hungarian exiles, who have had the honor of being transported to this country from an imprisonment not so degrading, or so confining, or so necessary as the one which has overwhelmed these unfortunate citizens of ours.

I think, too, that this Government is to a great extent responsible for the unfortunate predicament in which these men are now placed. This Government chose to interfere originally in this scheme, and I believe that if it had remained quiet and had not given its countenance against these men who were endeavoring to uproot the tyranny which was oppressing Cuba, they would to-day, instead of being condemned as pirates and imprisoned by a foreign power, have been the liberators of a State and the founders of a Republic.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ORR. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] how he voted upon the resolution to bring Kossuth to this country?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will answer the question with great pleasure.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds the inquiry to be out of order.

Mr. ORR. I have the record here, and the gentleman voted in the affirmative.

Mr. CAMPBELL, (in his seat.) That vote required no appropriation of money.

Mr. EVANS asked leave to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE objected.

And the question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BAYLY moved that the committee rise, and report the bill to the House as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 63, "for the relief of certain American citizens lately imprisoned and pardoned by the Queen of Spain," and had directed him to report the same to the House with two amendments, in which he asked the concurrence of the House.

Mr. BAYLY, I desire to say something against one of the amendments, but I will not do it now, as I am anxious for the bill to pass in any form. The second amendment, reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, is, however, entirely unnecessary, and I hope the House will not agree to it. I now call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER stated the first question to be on concurring in the amendment of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to fill the blank with the words "six thousand."

The question was then put, and it was agreed to. So the House concurred in the amendment.

The SPEAKER stated the next question to be on concurring in the amendment of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to add to the bill the following:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed into an appropriation of any interference in the domestic affairs of Cuba, by any of the citizens of the United States.

Mr. STANLY called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. STANLY. There are some sick members—sick upon the subject of intervention, whom I want to hear, and I therefore move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and the House accordingly adjourned until twelve o'clock to-morrow.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of David Osburn, reported a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of C. H. Blood, reported "that the prayer of the petition ought not to be granted."

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill making an appropriation, in part, for the erection of the light-house on Sand Key, Florida; which was read and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. H. I ask the attention of the Senate for one moment in relation to this bill. It will be noticed that it makes an appropriation of $5,000 for the completion of the light-house on Sand Key, in Florida. It is not a sum sufficient to complete that light-house; but there is now a cargo of iron lying in a vessel at that place, and there is no money under the control of the Department to pay for freight and charges upon it. The Government is consequently liable to a certain daily sum as demurrage; and I hope, therefore, that this bill may be passed at this time.

By unanimous consent the bill was read a second time, considered as in Committee of the Whole, reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. McRAE, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill entitled "An act to repeal the proviso in the act of Congress entitled 'An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1852, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1851, relating to the salaries of the officers of the Territories of the United States;" which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BRADBURY, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to alter and amend the judicial system of the United States; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BRADBURY said: As the subject is one of great interest, I will state some of the most important provisions of the bill at this time.

It proposes to confer on the several district courts of the United States the powers and jurisdiction now exercised by the circuit courts in their respective circuits.

It proposes to create a court of appeals, consisting of the justice of the Supreme Court of the United States assigned to the circuit where the court is held, and the judges of the several district courts in such circuit.

It proposes to give to these courts of appeal the jurisdiction of cases brought from the district courts, in the same manner they are now brought therefrom to the Supreme Court.

It proposes to authorize appeals and writs of error from the decisions of the courts of appeal, to the Supreme Court, in cases where the matter in controversy exceeds $5,000, and when is drawn in question the constitutionality of a law of Congress or of any State. It also makes provision for California and Oregon.

Mr. FISH, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of William Bedient, late a sergeant in the fourth regiment of artillery; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

MEXICAN INDEMNITY.

A message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. FORNEY, its Clerk:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The House of Representatives have passed a bill providing for carrying into execution in further part the twelfth article of the treaty with Mexico, concluded at Guadalupe Hidalgo; in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill was read a first and second time by its title, and was referred to the Committee on Finance.

PAY OF OFFICERS IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. FISH submitted the following resolution for consideration; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the propriety of granting increased compensation to the officers of the army stationed in New Mexico.

THE EXILED IRISH PATRIOTS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the resolution expressive of the sympathy of Congress for the exiled Irish patriots, Smith O'Brien, Thomas F. Meagher, and their associates.

An amendment was offered by Mr. SHIELDS, which was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

"That while we disclaim all intention of interfering in any way in the internal affairs of the Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, we deem it our duty to express, in a respectful manner, our firm conviction that it would be highly gratifying to the people of the United States, many of whom are natives of Ireland, and connected by blood with the inhabitants of that country, to see Smith O'Brien and his associates restored to liberty, and permitted, if so disposed, to emigrate to this country. We would regard this act of clemency as a new proof of the friendly disposition of the British Government towards our Republic, and as calculated to strengthen the bonds of affection now happily existing between the people of the United States and of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."

On motion by Mr. SHIELDS, it was Ordered, That the further consideration of the resolution be postponed to, and be the special order of the day for Thursday, the 5th of February next.

REPORTS OF SENATE DEBATES.

The engrossed resolution for settling the accounts for reporting the debates and proceedings of Congress was read a third time and passed.

SALLY T. FLOYD,

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the question upon the reconsideration of the bill for the relief of Mrs. Sally T. Floyd. I would remark to the Senate, that if the reconsideration takes place now, the bill can go among the orders of the day, and come up for consideration to-morrow. My object is to restore the bill to its place on the Calendar, so that it can be taken up to-morrow, which is private bill day.

The PRESIDENT. The motion, which lies on the table, is to reconsider the vote on the final passage of the bill. The Senator from Kentucky moves to take up that motion for consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

The question then recurred on reconsidering the vote on the passage of the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that perhaps the best plan to adopt would be to let the bill be reconsidered and go upon the Calendar. In this way we shall defer whatever remarks any Senator may think proper to make until to-morrow. I hope that course will be adopted.

The PRESIDENT. That cannot be. If the motion to reconsider be agreed to, the bill will come up upon its third reading.

Mr. BADGER. Let the vote on the passage of the bill be reconsidered, and then the bill can be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I adopt the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina, and hope that the bill will be reconsidered and then postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not see any good reason why we should reconsider this bill. It was introduced by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and reported by myself from the Committee on Pensions. I thought then, and the Committee on Pensions thought, and the Senate seemed to think, that it was a meritorious bill. We carried it through all its stages. It was passed. But it was arrested by a motion to reconsider. I suppose that on a motion to reconsider, it is in order for me to say a few words as to the merits of the bill.

The husband of Mrs. Floyd was a gallant and distinguished officer in the Army; he served his country long and faithfully. Owing to extraordinary hardships and exposures, during a long and gallant service, he became diseased. His services were highly valued by the Army and by the War Department. In order to enable him to recover his health, if possible, and yet remain in the service, he was sent from post to post, as his medical advisers thought proper, in order to afford him an opportunity to recover, so that the Army might not lose the advantage of his services. This course was tried for a considerable time, until he found that his health could not be restored so that he could render efficient service; and although he could have remained in the Army and continued to receive his pay, he preferred, on account of his ill-health, to leave the Army and retire to private life. He did so: and, shortly afterwards, he died—leaving a poor and helpless family. The proposition involved in this bill is to treat his widow as if he had died in the service, and in consequence of diseases acquired while in the performance of his duties. That is its foundation, and the committee have considered it a meritorious claim. We have passed bills on this ground several times; and I see no reason why, if the Senate has already passed bills upon that principle, we should reconsider this vote and arrest the progress of the bill, which, if passed now, might go to the House of Representatives in time to be passed there at an early day.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BRIGHT,] who made the motion to reconsider, is not now in his seat, and that was the reason which induced me to suggest the postponement of this motion, and suffer it to lie over till to-morrow. If the Senate think proper to pursue that course, I have no objection. But I wish to make a remark upon this bill, which I will take occasion to make now, and then I shall have washed my hands of it. I believe that the gentleman who made the motion to reconsider, although I was not in the Chamber at the time, seemed to intimate that this was a strange bill to come from me; for I asked leave originally at this session to introduce the bill. The history of the matter is simply this: My friend from Arkansas [Mr. BORLAND] told me that a constituent of mine, (Mrs. Floyd,) had a bill, granting her a pension, passed at the last session of Congress, but which failed in the House of Representatives. He said that, as a member of the Committee on Pensions, he would introduce the bill, but as I was the representative of Kentucky, it might be better for me to introduce it. Believing that everything was right, and wishing to serve a constituent, I asked leave to introduce this bill, which had passed this body at the last session of Congress. It was introduced, referred to the Committee on Pensions, reported back, and passed.

My position in regard to all these pension claims is well known. I endeavored, during the last Congress, to bring back the action of this and the other House, as far as I could, to the revolutionary rule. In a speech which I made then—to empty benches for aught I know, though I believe some eight or ten listened to me—I took up the pension laws, from the foundation of the Government, and gave a history of them, statute by statute, and showed the changes which had taken place; and I endeavored to get the Senate back to the original rule established by our revolutionary fathers, and to get clear of the latitudinous legislation, by which almost everybody who appeals to our sympathy is put upon the Treasury for a support. I found it to be a useless task. I have labored for that object until I am tired. But I can say, without reference to this principle, that the case of Mrs. Floyd is more meritorious, in my estimation, than the cases of soldiers who die of cholera—a disease which carries off everybody—when their widows are put upon the pension rolls.

It may be a technical objection to this bill that Colonel Floyd did not die in the service. But it was honorable to him that he resigned when he was unable to render service; whereas he might have remained in the service, and secured his pay till the day of his death, and a pension to his family, if he had not resigned. I look upon this claim as a much more meritorious one than many which we have established by precedent; and, therefore, while Congress is disposed to act and legislate upon the latitudinous positions which they have assumed in reference to pensions, I am for treating all alike. While you have set such an example as you did in the case of the children of a soldier the other day, to whom you granted a pension; while you had repealed the very law by which their ancestor would have been entitled to receive a pension, and when you grant pensions to widows whose husbands die of cholera, surely you ought to grant this pension.

Mr. CLARKE. I have no objection to the passage of this bill. I have never, since I have had the honor of a seat on this floor, voted against an act of clemency or charity or mercy. But the Senate will recollect that some week or ten days since, there was a case before them which, in my humble opinion, appealed as strongly as any case, and as strongly as the case recommended by my honorable friend from Kentucky. I recollect very well that he then objected to it, because it involved a principle which did not come within the provision of the general law. I wish to say now, that I have no disposition to return discourtesy. I hope that this bill will pass. I voted the other day for the bill, to which the Senator has alluded, granting a pension to the children of Captain Capron, and I shall be very glad to give this bill my support. But I hope that, if the bill to which I have alluded, and in which I feel an interest, should come before us again on a motion to reconsider, the Senator from Kentucky will reciprocate my courtesy, and vote with me in favor of the bill, as an act of mercy and of justice to those who are deprived of the means of subsistence and support in consequence of the death of those on whom they depended, in the service of their country.

Mr. BORLAND. I do hope that this bill will not be reconsidered; and I wish to say to the Senator from Kentucky, that I am glad to hear him say he is opposed to latitudinous legislation. I will go with him most heartily to arrest the principle of latitudinous legislation; but I hope he will not begin his system upon the widow and orphans of a gallant soldier who lost his life by reason of his devotion to his country's service.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have already said that I consider this case as more meritorious than many others.

Mr. WHITCOMB. My colleague, [Mr. BRIGHT,] I believe, made this motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT. He did.

Mr. WHITCOMB. He is now absent on account of indisposition, and I hope the Senate will suffer this motion to lie over until he appears. I know not what his views are in relation to the bill, but I ask this as a matter of courtesy and justice to him. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. BELL. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to make a remark?

Mr. WHITCOMB. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. BELL. I believe that I introduced originally the memorial upon which this bill is founded. I have not thought proper to interpose any remarks of my own in relation to this subject; but I wish to say a word, as I think the Senate is disposed to lay this motion on the table, to await the attendance of the honorable Senator who moved the reconsideration on Friday last. I moved to take this motion from the table. I suggested that, in my opinion, it came up in proper order among the private bills. I considered that it was the very first question on the docket of private bills. The President decided otherwise. I think, with great respect, that he was in error. It was a bill which had passed its third reading, and was finally passed, and a motion was then made to reconsider. I therefore think it was properly on the Private Calendar.

The PRESIDENT. It was laid on the table.

Mr. BELL. Now that this bill is up for consideration, I would suggest that it be placed on the Calendar for to-morrow, so that it may then come up in proper order. I propose that it be laid over until to-morrow, and then I shall have no objection to the motion to reconsider being adopted, and the bill being considered over again; and then, if there is further debate, I shall beg leave to offer a few remarks.

I think that there is a principle involved in this bill—a principle on which we have acted in many ways heretofore. I am prepared to go with the Senate, however, if they shall see fit to curtail the latitude with which many of these claims have been allowed. But if the Senate should not so decide, I shall as strenuously contend that this is as meritorious a case as many others they have passed on full consideration. I trust that the course which I have suggested will be taken. I hope the bill will lie over until to-morrow. As I understand, it was not strictly in order to move to take up this motion this morning.

The PRESIDENT. Certainly it was.

Mr. BELL. I beg pardon of the Chair. If it was in order this morning, then it will be in order any other morning; and I will move, with the consent of the Senator from Indiana, that the bill be postponed until to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT. That motion cannot be received. The Senator from Tennessee does not seem to understand the position of the bill. It was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and actually passed; then a motion was made to reconsider the vote on the final passage of the bill; and that motion was laid on the table. It was not on the Calendar, but it lies on the table; and the motion to take up the motion to reconsider was made this morning. That motion must first be made before anything else will be in order.

Mr. BELL. With great deference to the Chair, I think that if it is laid on the table, it requires a motion to take it up.

The PRESIDENT. Certainly it does.

Mr. BELL. I now understand that it has been taken up, and I therefore move to postpone it till to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT. The proper motion would be to postpone the further consideration of the motion to reconsider till to-morrow.

Mr. BELL. That is my motion, sir.

Mr. MANGUM. I hope the motion will not prevail; and I hope the question will be taken at once. I trust that the Senate will refuse to reconsider the vote on the passage of this bill. From the statements that have been made in relation to it, I am satisfied that it is altogether proper.

The motion to postpone was not agreed to. So the bill is passed.

THE COMPROMISE MEASURES.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the resolution, submitted by Mr. FOOTE, of Mississippi, declaring the compromise measures to be a definitive settlement of the questions growing out of the system of American slavery.

Mr. McRAE addressed the Senate at some length upon this question, and in opposition to the resolution. Without concluding, he gave way to a motion that the Senate adjourn,

And the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 29, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BOTLER, Chaplain to the Senate.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I have a very important bill which I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report to the House. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present that report now, in order that it may be printed. I will state that it is a bill to regulate fees in the circuit and district courts of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill for the relief of the Cuban prisoners.

Mr. OLDS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I ask that committees may be called for reports.

The SPEAKER. That will be the first business in order after the unfinished business of yesterday is disposed of.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I desire to inquire of the Chair if there is not a special order for to-day, which will preclude the call for reports of committees?

The SPEAKER. There is a special order, but that is for the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McLANAHAN] will present his report if there is no objection.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I object.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask that the House do now proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I move that the committees be called for reports. The call will occupy but a short time, and it will much advance the business of the House.

CUBAN PRISONERS.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order until the unfinished business is disposed of. The unfinished business is the following bill, viz:

The question immediately pending is upon concurring with the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union in the following amendment, upon which question the yeas and nays have been ordered, viz:

Seymour, Skelton, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Stone, St. Martin, Stratton, Stuart, Sweetser, George W. Thompson, Walsh, Ward, Wilcox, and Wildrick—71.

So the House concurred in the amendment.

The bill as amended was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and having been engrossed it was read a third time; and the question now being "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. BAYLY called for the previous question; which was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. HALL demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

The question was then taken and there were—yeas 147, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Willis Allen, John Appleton, William Appleton, Babcock, Thomas H. Bayly, Barrere, Bartlett, Beale, Bell, Bibbhaus, Boeck, Bowie, Bowne, Bragg, Breckenridge, Brenton, Briggs, Brooks, Albert G. Brown, G. H. Brown, Buell, Burrows, Busby, E. C. So the bill was passed.

Pending the announcement of the vote, Mr. HOLLADAY, who was without the bar when his name was called, asked permission to record his vote in the negative.

Objection was made, and consent was not granted.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Reports are in order from the Committee of Elections.

INTERVENTION.

Mr. BRAGG. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present certain resolutions of the Legislature of Alabama upon the subject of intervention upon the part of this Government in the affairs of foreign nations.

[Cries of "I object!" "I object!"]

Mr. BRAGG. I move, then, to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to move a suspension of the rules for such purpose except on Mondays.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. DANIEL, from the Committee of Claims, reported the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time by their titles, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered, together with the reports thereon, to be printed, viz:

A bill for the relief of Charles S. Matthews, Charles Wood, and James Hall; and

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of General James C. Watson, late of the State of Georgia.

Mr. SACKETT. I rise for the purpose of giving notice that the report made by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. DANIEL,] in the case of the late General Watson, was not an unanimous one, and that I intend to present a minority report.

On motion by Mr. DANIEL, it was Ordered, That the Committee of Claims, to which was referred Senate bill No. 43, for the relief of Charles McIlrose, and Senate bill No. 50, for the relief of Sidney S. Alcott, be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that they be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PORTER, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Osborn Cross, of the United States Army; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the report accompanying, ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York, from the Committee on Commerce, reported the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time by their titles, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the reports accompanying, ordered to be printed:

A bill to remit the duties upon certain goods destroyed by fire in the city of New York, in 1845; and

A bill to authorize the issuing of a register to the brig America.

Mr. SEYMOUR, from the same committee, reported back without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass, Senate bill No. 67, entitled "An act for the relief of John A. McGraw, of New York;" which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York, it was Ordered, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of sundry citizens of North Carolina, praying Congress to pass an act to appropriate the dividends upon the stock of the United States in the Dismal Swamp Canal to the extension of said canal, and that it be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

On motion by Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of John H. Parker, and other citizens of Pennsylvania, praying Congress to pass a law to prohibit the banishment and deportation of emigrants from foreign countries to the United States, and of all convicts, felons, and paupers, recognized as such in their own country, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SEYMOUR, from the Committee on Commerce, asked that the said committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of sundry citizens of Ontario county, New York, praying for the passage of a law to reimburse them for the expenses incurred for individual contributions to the industrial exhibition in London, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. SWEETSER. I move to lay the memorial upon the table.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I wish to say but a single word in reference to that motion. Very many petitions of this character are being presented, and I think they should go to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. SWEETSER called for tellers; which were ordered.

Mr. JONES of Tennessee. I do not think this question is at all understood, and I ask that this memorial may be read, that we may vote understandingly.

The SPEAKER. If gentlemen will come to order the memorial will be read.

The memorial was then read by its title, and the Clerk was proceeding to read the body thereof, when

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, said: I doubt if the reading of this memorial can be called for; for this memorial, under the rules, was referred to the Committee on Commerce; and that committee has not acted upon it at all. It is now virtually presented to us anew, the same as if it had been presented to the House by an individual. The committee to which it was originally referred, think it proper that it should be referred to the Committee on Manufactures. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SWEETSER,] that, as the memorial has not been acted upon by any committee, to lay it upon the table would be virtually rejecting it by us, without giving it any consideration. I hope he will withdraw his motion, and let the memorial be referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I wish further to suggest to the gentleman from Ohio, that a very large number of these memorials have been presented from all quarters of the country, and they deserve a respectful consideration from some committee of the House.

Mr. SWEETSER. I made the motion on the supposition that the subject had received consideration by the committee. In view of the suggestions made, I withdraw my motion to lay upon the table.

The question was then taken upon referring the memorial to the Committee on Manufactures, and it was so referred.

Mr. ROBBINS, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill for the relief of Wm. S. Payne; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. St. MARTIN, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of J. Chickering, and others, of Massachusetts, and the petition of M. A. Boiquet, praying for the passage of a law to reimburse them for the expenses incurred in making contributions on individual account to the industrial exhibition at London, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Commerce, reported "A bill for the benefit of the Carmelite Nunnery of Baltimore;" which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. WALSH. I hope this bill may be now put upon its passage. It is for the remission of duties upon goods imported for Church purposes. There is a number of precedents in the action of Congress for this proceeding.

Mr. ORR. I move that it be referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. WALSH. Well, if that is the desire of the House I acquiesce.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Oh no, let us pass it now.

Mr. WALSH. Very well. Let the bill be read. There has been a dozen acts of Congress within the last five or six years for remitting duties upon such goods.

The bill having been read through, Mr. ORR. I withdraw my motion to commit. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER. When shall it have its third reading?

Several Voices. Now.

The bill having been engrossed, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. WALSH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH, from the same committee, reported "A bill to authorize the issuing of a register to the ship Kossuth;" which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the report accompanying, ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Commerce, reported "A bill to regulate and fix the annual salary of the American Consul at the city of Amsterdam," which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. S. I move that the bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and that the bill and report be printed.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. That subject is now before the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I move its reference to that committee.

Mr. STEPHENS. I will change my motion, and move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union, and be printed.

The question was then put upon the latter motion, and it was agreed to.

Mr. HALL, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the following joint resolution of the House, viz:

Joint Resolution authorizing the location of military bounty land warrants on the public lands now subject and hereafter to be subject to entry at private sale under existing laws.

Resolved, &c., That any land bounty for military services granted by the act of the twenty-eighth day of September, A. D. 1850, entitled "An act granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have engaged in the military service of the United States," (or by virtue of any other act of Congress heretofore passed granting land bounty for military services,) may be satisfied out of any public land now subject and hereafter to become subject to entry at private sale, at the minimum price, under existing laws—

Reported the same back with an amendment in the form of a substitute, which was read as follows, viz:

*A Bill in relation to Military Bounty Land Warrants. Be it enacted, &c., That land warrants issued under the act entitled "An act granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have engaged in the military service of the United States," approved September 28, 1850, may be located on any public land subject to private entry at the date of the proposed location: Provided, That when any such warrants shall be located on public lands subject to private entry at a greater minimum than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, the locator of said warrant or warrants shall pay to the United States, in cash, the difference between the value of said warrant or warrants, estimated at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, and the minimum price of the tract located on.*

Mr. HALL. I move that the bill and substitute therefore be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. I hope that the bill may be put upon its passage. I would inquire of the Chair if it be in order at this time to offer an amendment to the substitute?

The SPEAKER. If the motion to refer be voted down it will be in order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his motion to commit, to enable me to offer an amendment.

Mr. HALL. I withdraw it for that purpose.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask for the reading of the resolution and substitute reported by the Committee.

The Clerk having read the resolution and substitute,

Mr. CAMPBELL moved to amend the substitute by inserting after the word "cash," the following words, viz: "Or warrants at $1 25 per acre, at the option of the locator."

Mr. C. I will simply state my object in offering that amendment. I offered the joint resolution for which the committee have reported this bill as a substitute. The object of the joint resolution was, in the first place, to take off the restriction which the act of the last Congress imposed upon the location of warrants. I am not, however, satisfied with the other provisions of the bill. And as the bill reported by the committee fully embraces the object intended to be effected by my joint resolution, so far as releasing the warrants from the restriction which was imposed upon them by that law is concerned, I feel satisfied that the bill should take the place of the resolution, of which it is the substitute.

The committee, in reporting the substitute, provided in those cases where the minimum price of lands was $2 50 per acre that the locator in locating the warrant should pay the balance after the $1 25 in cash. My object in offering this amendment is to permit the locator to enter all that description of lands, the minimum price of which is $2 50 per acre, with warrants, if he desires to do so; or if he desires to enter $1 25 with warrants, he can enter the balance in cash, if it is convenient for him, or if he desires to make an entry in that way. I desire now that this bill should be put upon its passage. I do not see the necessity of any delay with regard to this question. I do not see that it is in any way connected with the matter which is contained in another bill already before the House, which is, I believe, made the order for to-day in Committee of the Whole. I am opposed to tacking so many measures together; but as this stands upon its own merits, and is not connected with any other question, and as it is necessary that this restriction should be taken off the location of warrants, I hope that the amendment I have offered will meet with the approbation of the House, and that it will be adopted. If there are no objections to the law upon its merits, I trust that it will not meet with opposition from any quarter.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Suppose, for instance, that the amount of land he proposes to enter would not consume the warrant, for instance sixty acres—

Mr. CAMPBELL. My proposition does not intend that the rule which governs the location of warrants shall be changed or altered in any way; it only permits land, the minimum price of which is $2 50 per acre, to be entered with warrants. For instance, an eighty acre lot can be entered with a one hundred and sixty acre warrant. As the bill now stands, only one half of the tract of land can be entered with a warrant, the other half must be paid in cash. The object of my amendment is to permit the entire tract to be entered with warrants or cash, as the locator may prefer. The number of acres entered must, of course, correspond with the number of acres contained in the warrants proposed to be located. In grants which have been made to States—the minimum price of public lands, or of alternate sections, retained by the Government out of these grants, has been raised to $2 50 per acre—those lands, for instance, which have been reserved from public sale, and which are not susceptible of being entered. When that limitation or that reservation is taken from those lands, I desire that they may be entered with warrants, for the purpose of enabling the purchaser of those lands, or the locator of lands, to enter them with warrants, if they desire to do so. I have offered this amendment that they may be enabled to enter an eighty acre lot of land with a one hundred and sixty acre warrant. That will make the eighty acre lot worth $2 50 per acre; and if they desire to enter them with warrants merely covering the amount of land which they are enabled to enter under the warrant, they can then pay the balance in cash, if they wish. I think this amendment perfectly secures this object. And unless there are some serious objections to the merits of the bill—unless there are some serious objections to relieving the location of land warrants from the limitations and restrictions which the law of the last Congress imposed upon them, I do trust that it will meet with the approbation of this House to allow the amendment I have offered, and then to permit the bill at the present time to pass to its third reading.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I move to refer the bill and amendments to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. There are two propositions before that committee already, upon the same subject, made the special order for to-day; and I trust the House will refer this proposition to the same committee, so that they can have before them all the different propositions that have been made upon this subject. I trust the House will act upon it without further debate, in order that we may proceed with the call upon the committees for reports. I will not move the previous question.

Mr. FOWLER. I supposed it was understood, that we were to offer reports which should not give rise to debate. Perhaps debate is in order, though I doubt it.

The SPEAKER. The call for reports was the business in order during the morning hour.

Mr. FOWLER. Is it in order to debate a proposition?

The SPEAKER. Upon a proposition to refer, it is.

Mr. FOWLER. Then I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, which was upon referring the propositions to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was then taken, and the propositions were so referred.

On motion by Mr. HALL, the propositions were ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENN, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back, with sundry amendments, House bill No. 14, for the correction of errors in the location of military bounty land warrants, and the entry of lands; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and with the amendments ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENN also, from the same committee, reported back House bill No. 124, "to revive and continue in force for a limited time the provisions of an act relating to suspended entries of public lands," with sundry amendments thereto; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. OLDS, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes," passed March 3, 1851.

Also, a bill from the same committee, to provide for the security of mail locks, mail keys, and other property of the Post Office Department.

Which bills were severally read a first and second time by their titles, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. OLDS, from the same committee, reported a joint resolution for the relief of Elizabeth Pruett, the widow and executrix of Robert Pruett, deceased.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time by its title, and then, after a brief explanation by Mr. OLDS, was, by unanimous consent, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and subsequently being engrossed, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. OLDS moved to reconsider the vote on the passage of the resolution, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. OLDS, from the same committee, reported back Senate bill No. 88, for the relief of Rufus Dwinel, without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass; which bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

On motion by Mr. OLDS, it was Ordered, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of John Lowry and sixty-eight other legal voters of Carver and Plymouth, in the State of Massachusetts, praying for an appropriation for the expenses of transportation of the mails, and that the memorialists be allowed to withdraw the papers from the files of the House.

Mr. OLDS, from the same committee, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be authorized to employ a clerk, at the usual rate of compensation.

Mr. O. said: I will say to gentlemen that if they wish their business with regard to post offices attended to, they must allow us this clerk, for that business is accumulating so rapidly that it is absolutely necessary we should have this assistance. I believe that it would expedite the business of the House and be a saving of money to the country if these important committees were allowed to employ clerks. I move the previous question on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. DUNHAM moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I appeal to both the gentlemen to allow me to offer an amendment to that resolution, which I believe would be in order. The Committee on Naval Affairs have instructed me to report a similar resolution, and I should like it to share the same fate as this.

[Cries of "No, no!"]

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I wish to say, in behalf of the Committee on Commerce, that they very much need a clerk to expedite their business, and that some time since they instructed me to report a resolution similar to this.

Mr. FICKLIN called for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the resolution on the table; and they were ordered.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, inquired of the Chair whether the morning hour had expired?

The SPEAKER replied that the morning hour had not yet expired.

Mr. HARRIS moved that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. McNAIR. I have been waiting very patiently for this matter to get through, to report a resolution from the Committee on Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must be aware that discussion is not in order during the pendency of a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. McNAIR. I expected that the call of the committees would have been gone through with.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his motion for one moment, so as to allow me to present a report.

Mr. HARRIS. If the gentleman could effect his object, I would certainly do it.

Mr. CARTTER. He cannot do it until after the other committees have been called.

Mr. HARRIS withdrew his motion.

Mr. McLANAHAN asked the unanimous consent of the House to make a report.

Mr. OLDS objected.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay the resolution on the table, and the result was—yeas 77, nays 73; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Charles Allen, John Appleton, Barre, Biscoe, Breckinridge, Carter, Chastain, Churchwell, Conger, Dawson, Dockery, Dunham, Eastman, Faulkner, Ficklin, Goodenow, Gorman, Hall, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Hascall, Haven, Hebard, Hendricks, Hibbard, Hillyer, Holladay, Houston, John W. Howe, Thomas Y. How, Hunter, Jenkins, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, John Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, George G. King, Preston King, Knus, Letcher, Lockhart, Mann, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, McLanahan, Meade, Miller, Millson, Miner, Molony, Henry D. Moore, Murphy, Nabers, Orr, Outlaw, Samuel W. Parker, Phelps, Smith, Benjamin Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stevens, Alexander H. Stephens, Stuart, Sweetser, Benjamin Thompson, George W. Thompson, Venable, Walbridge, Wallace, Watkins, Addison White, Wilcox, Wildrick, and Woodward—77.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, William Appleton, Babcock, Thomas B. Bayly, Beale, Bell, Bibbhaus, Bowie, Brenton, Briggs, Busby, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Thompson Campbell, Caskie, Chandler, Clark, Cobb, Curtis, George T. Davis, Dean, Doty, Edgerton, Edmundson, Fitch, Florence, Fowler, Freeman, Henry M. Fuller, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Gaylord, Gilmore, Green, Grey, Grow, Hart, Henn, Robert W. Johnson, Martin, McDonald, McNair, Morrison, Murray, Newton, Olds, Peaslee, Polk, Powell, Price, Riddle, Robbins, Robinson, Savage, Schoolcraft, Schoonmaker, Scudder, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Frederick P. Stanton, St. Martin, Stratton, Strout, Taylor, Thurston, Townsend, Tuck, Walsh, Ward, Welch, Alexander White, and Yates—73.

So the resolution was laid upon the table.

Mr. STANLEY moved to reconsider the vote just taken, and to lay that motion on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DUNHAM. I desire to inquire of the Chair if the morning hour has not expired?

The SPEAKER. It has expired.

Mr. DUNHAM. Then I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and upon that motion I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. WATKINS and MASON were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—yeas 50, noes not counted.

So the House refused to go into committee.

Mr. FICKLIN, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia, while prosecuting their inquiry, under the order of the House, into the practice of issuing small notes as a currency, and not redeemable in cash, by irresponsible persons or corporations, within the District of Columbia, be and they are hereby authorized to send for persons and papers, and to examine witnesses under oath.

The question was taken, and the resolution adopted.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Virginia, asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill, of which previous notice had been given, upon the same subject as the resolution just adopted.

Objection was made.

Mr. McLANAHAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to regulate the fees and costs to be allowed clerks, marshals, and attorneys, in the circuit and district courts of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. McL. said: I am unanimously instructed by the Judiciary Committee to move that the bill and report be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that 2,000 copies of the same be printed for the use of the House.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman moves to print extra copies of his bill and report, according to the rule it must go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I move, then, that the usual number of copies of the bill and report be printed.

The bill and report were then referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I now move that the bill just referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be made the special order of the day for the 25th of February next, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of.

Mr. CARTTER objected.

Mr. MEADE. I desire to inquire if the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. McLANAHAN,] did not make a motion to print an extra number of copies of this report?

The SPEAKER. He did, but the motion was not at the time entertained. The Chair, however, upon reflection, is of the opinion that if the motion is made as a report from the Committee on the Judiciary, that it is competent for him to do so without having it referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to move that 5,000 copies of the report be printed.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania say that he is instructed to move to print 5,000 copies?

Mr. McLANAHAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES. I understood the gentleman a moment ago to ask for 2,000.

Mr. McLANAHAN. Mr. Speaker, it is proper, and perhaps necessary, that I should briefly state to the House some of the reasons that induced the Committee on the Judiciary, through me, to present the resolution which I have just made.

The extraordinary increase in the expenses of the judiciary, since the organization of that department of the Government, led the committee into an investigation of the causes that operated to produce this result. This investigation was necessarily one of details, and all of the causes may not have been satisfactorily ascertained; yet it is believed that sufficient will be made known by the report just submitted to show the necessity of prompt legislative action on the subject.

In the year 1800, the expenses of the judiciary establishment of the United States, inclusive of the salaries of the judges, appear to have been $42,214; in 1820, $117,187; in 1830, $204,432; in 1840, $373,695; in 1849, $469,223; in 1850, $564,845. During this period of fifty years the population of the United States increased at a ratio of about three hundred and thirty-three per cent., whilst the expenses of maintaining the judiciary increased at the rate of about twelve hundred and thirty-seven per cent. Now, sir, it is not pretended that increase of population is an exact rule by which to estimate the increase in the expenses of our courts of justice; but it is a mode generally adopted for forming an estimate of the wealth, the business, and prosperity of our country at large. And it is therefore, on the whole, perhaps as good a method as can be selected for forming correct conclusions as to what would be a fair and proper increase in the expenses of the judiciary. The facts before stated cannot fail to show the undue and improper augmentation of expense, incident at this time to the administration of justice in the circuit and district courts of the United States.

In the northern district of the State of New York the expenses of the General Government in sustaining the United States courts, exclusive of the salaries of the judge, marshal, and district attorney, in the year 1830 amounted to $3,500, in the year 1850 to $43,975; more than twelve times as large as in the year 1830. In the State of Massachusetts, in the year 1830, the amount paid by the General Government, exclusive of the salaries of the judge, marshal, and district attorney, was $9,586 13; and in the year 1850 $92,728; about ten times as large as it was in 1830. The causes which have led to this extraordinary increase in judicial expenses are numerous and various. Many of them are set forth in the report which I have just presented; and many more will probably be made manifest by the answers—which will soon be furnished by the Department of the Interior—to a series of interrogatories which were addressed to the Secretary of that Department, under a resolution of inquiry from this House. But, sir, sufficient, as I before stated, will be made manifest by the report, which is now submitted, to show the necessity of immediate legislative action on the subject.

The regulation of the fees to be received by the ministerial officers of the courts is a task of more than ordinary difficulty and complexity. The printing of the bill and report for the use of the House is absolutely necessary. And the subject is one of such grave and serious import that extra numbers of the report should be printed, so that the whole country may understand both the known abuses and the proposed reform. The report and the bill should find a wide circulation over the land. We ask, therefore, that a number of copies, corresponding to the exigencies of the case, may be printed, in order that all who desire to investigate the matter may have every facility which it is in the power of the committee to furnish. Sir, there is no subject in which the people are more interested than the one which is now brought to the consideration of the House; and while it demands the prompt and energetic action of Congress, it is one which cannot be properly disposed of without close investigation and calm reflection.

The motion to print 5,000 copies extra of the report was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MEADE. I am requested by the Committee on Commerce to make a favorable report in the case of a railroad company in Georgia, and ask that the bill reported by the committee on this subject be put upon its passage. There are particular reasons why this should be done. I will state simply to the House the merits of the case. The Monroe Railroad Company, under acts of 1832 and 1840, imported railroad iron, and gave their bonds for it in 1841, with security. Those bonds were to be canceled if the iron was laid by the 3d day of March, 1843. The iron was not laid by the specified time, but it was laid during the year 1843. After this iron was laid upon the road, the Monroe Railroad Company was dissolved, and became insolvent, and the road passed into other hands. The securities were sued upon those bonds, and such suit is either now in progress, or judgment has been recovered against the securities. They ask to be relieved from that bond, upon the ground that the equitable construction of the act of 1842 entitles them as much to relief as if their iron had been laid upon the track previous to the first of March, 1843. This subject was before the last Congress, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, which made a favorable report thereon, with a bill for relief; but for some cause or other the bill was not acted upon during the last session of Congress.

The Solicitor of the Treasury has given his consent, in an informal way, that execution shall not be sued out against these parties, and that the case shall not be prosecuted to final termination, until they shall have had an opportunity to apply to Congress for relief. I will state further to the House, that a similar application has been made by one or two other railroad companies, upon the same grounds, and relief has been afforded to them. I consider that this company is entitled to relief upon an equitable construction of the three statutes which relate to the subject, one of which was passed in 1832, one in 1840, and the third in 1842. If the House wish to be more minutely informed in the case, they can have the report read. It is a short one. I ask the House to permit this bill to be put upon its passage, that relief may be immediately afforded to the securities. It is a very meritorious case, and was so considered by all of the members of the committee.

The bill, being a bill for the relief of the Monroe Railroad Company and their securities, was then read a first and second time by its title.

The question was taken, and the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. EDGERTON, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of the heirs of Daniel Landon, asking remuneration for losses sustained in the last war, made an adverse report, and moved that the report be laid upon the table.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the motion.

Mr. EDGERTON. I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I rise to ask of the House to refer that memorial to the Committee on Military Affairs. I will make a statement that cannot fail, I think, to induce the House to make that reference.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman is making a report from a committee, and of course cannot withdraw the motion that is made by order of the committee.

Mr. EDGERTON. I was making a report from the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has made an adverse report. It is moved by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON,] to refer the memorial and report to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. STANTON. This is a claim presented by the heirs of Daniel Landon for property destroyed at Fort Wayne, in 1812. He went out there at the special instance of the commander of the Fort, in 1802, cultivated land, raised crops, and built a mill. It is claimed that he had a special promise of protection from the commandant of that Fort. He took his means there to the extent of $4,000, and in 1812 his entire property was destroyed by the Indians. I thought, in the first instance, that the proper reference of the claim was to the Committee on Military Affairs. I move that it be referred to the Military Committee, and the argument of the Committee of Claims may go along with it, so that there need not be any fear of injustice being done.

Mr. EDGERTON. Claims under the law of 1816 have been allowed for the destruction of property occupied for military purposes, but the law never has permitted payment for personal property, or for the destruction of buildings not occupied as a military post, or of such a description that the action of the Government had not imparted to them a military character. In this case the loss was sustained by the Indians driving off personal property, and the destruction of buildings not claimed to be occupied by the United States troops.

Mr. SWEETSER. I desire to call the attention of my colleague to the fact, set forth in these papers, that Fort Mayre was a frontier post, and that the property taken here by the claimants was absolutely necessary at that time, in order to furnish the means of subsistence to the men at that station. He went there under the protection of the commanding officer, and carried along with him his property. In the then condition of the country, the troops of the United States were unable to protect the property. I understand the interpretation given to the law of 1816 has been, that wherever the United States, or the officers of the Army, have held out inducements to individuals to make investments, and they made those investments for the purpose of affording the men at a station subsistence, they are regarded as under the protection of the United States, and if sufficient protection has not been afforded to them, the Government is to make good the losses they sustained. That is my understanding.

Mr. DUNHAM. These claims have invariably gone to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. EDGERTON. I make this statement as regards this case: This man Landon, in 1802, went to Fort Wayne and purchased a home there on the lands of the United States. He was an army contractor, or the agent of army contractors. The produce raised upon his land was sold by him to those stationed at Fort Wayne. In 1812, the Indians made a descent upon the place, drove off his stock, and burned his building. He was then acting as agent for an army contractor, or issuing commissary; and for this property there destroyed, he claims that the Government shall pay him. The committee came to the conclusion that there was no law authorizing its payment, and that the action of the Government had been in opposition to the payment of claims of this character.

Mr. SMART. I am in favor of the report of the gentleman from Ohio, and will call the attention of the House to the 91st rule; which reads as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the Committee on Military Affairs to take into consideration all subjects relating to the military establishment and public defence which may be referred to them by the House, and to report their opinion thereupon; and also to report, from time to time, such measures as may contribute to economy and accountability in said establishment."

I shall now make but one remark in relation to this subject. From the little experience I have had upon the Military Committee, I am satisfied that it is becoming a mere claims committee and that there is a wrong use made of it. I, for one, am opposed to the reference of these claims to that committee. I do not think the rule so intended. I think, as we have a Committee of Claims, (and a very efficient one it is,) that such claims should be referred there. This reference has been properly made to that committee, and I really hope this report will be adopted. I move to lay the report upon the table. Pending which,

On motion by Mr. FULLER, of Maine, The House adjourned.

Mr. SOULE intimated that he desired to examine some documents relating to the subject-matter of this bill, before he proceeded to its discussion.

Mr. BRODHEAD, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the petition of the Orange and Alexandria Railroad Company, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

PASSENGERS BY STEAMBOATS TO CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BRADBURY. I have been requested in behalf of a number of highly-respectable constituents to call the attention of the Senate to abuses alleged to exist in the conveyance of passengers by steamboats from the Atlantic ports to California.

The abuses complained of are:

1. That these boats, in violation of their public engagements, take ordinarily a much larger number of passengers than they can properly accommodate, or is consistent with health and safety.

2. That the supply of food is often deficient in quantity, and of the poorest and most unwholesome quality.

3. That the treatment of passengers, the sick even, by officers and crews of the boats, is sometimes cruel in the extreme.

It is represented that from these abuses large numbers of our fellow-citizens emigrating to California lose their lives or their health by disease engendered on board these boats.

The petitioners say they believe that a thorough investigation by a committee of Congress, with power to send for persons and papers, would disclose scenes occurring on board some of these boats that could find a parallel only in the horrors of the middle passage in the African slave trade.

Not professing to have a personal knowledge how far these representations are well founded, I believe the subject is worthy of the most thorough investigation, and trust it will receive the attention of the Committee on Commerce. With that view I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire whether any legislation is necessary to prevent abuses in the conveyance of passengers by steamboats from the Atlantic ports to those of California.

Mr. GWIN. I have only to say that I thank the Senator from Maine for bringing this subject to the attention of the Senate. I have heard great complaints of these abuses, and I hope the committee will give to the subject its early attention; and if there are such abuses that they will recommend to the Senate the passage of a bill imposing the severest penalties on the owners of the steamships. I have no doubt that many lives have been lost in consequence of the abuses which exist on board those steamers.

The resolution was adopted.

DISCIPLINE IN THE NAVY.

Mr. BADGER. I have been directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to offer some amendments to the bill heretofore reported from that committee to enforce discipline and promote good conduct in the naval service of the United States. As I desire to have that bill taken up and considered at some early day, I hope that by the unanimous consent of the Senate these amendments may be laid on the table and printed.

The amendments were received informally, and ordered to be printed.

CUBAN PRISONERS IN SPAIN.

The bill for the relief of American citizens lately imprisoned and pardoned by the Queen of Spain, was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Previtt, deceased; also, a bill entitled "An act for the benefit of the Carmelite Nunnery in Baltimore; in which resolution and bill they request the concurrence of the Senate.

They were read a first and second time by their titles, and referred, the first to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and the latter to the Committee on Finance.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN DELAWARE.

Mr. BRADBURY. I desire to call up the bill concerning sessions of the courts of the United States in the district of Delaware. I do this at the instance of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] The bill provides for a change of the sessions of the United States courts in that district, which are to be held very soon. I hope the Senate will allow the bill to be taken up, so that it may be passed at this time. I move to postpone the prior orders, with a view to taking up that bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that the Courts of the United States in and for the district of Delaware, shall hereafter be held at New Castle, in the said district; that there shall be two regular terms of the circuit court of the United States in said district, which shall commence on the third Tuesday of June, and third Tuesday of October, in each and every year hereafter; and that there shall be four regular terms of the district court of the United States for the said district, which shall commence on the second Tuesday of April, June, September, and January. The bill also provides, that the office of the clerk of the circuit court for said district, and the records of the said court, shall be kept, either at Wilmington or New Castle, as may be directed by an order of the judges of said court, made either in term or during vacation, and entered on the records thereof; and that the office of the clerk of the said district court, and the records thereof, shall be kept at either of the said places, as may be directed by the judge of the said district court, by an order made in term or during vacation, and entered on the records thereof.

It further provides that no process issued or proceedings begun in either of the said courts shall be voided by this change of the place and time of holding the said courts, and that all process, bail bonds, or recognizances, returnable at the next term of said courts, shall be returnable and returned at the terms of said courts, respectively, next occurring after the passage of this act, in the same manner as if they had been made so returnable on the face thereof, and shall have full effect and force, and that all continuances shall be made to conform to the provisions of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

NAVAL APPOINTMENTS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, submitted on the 27th instant by Mr. HALE, in relation to the tenure of appointments in the naval service; and the resolution was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law that appointments in the naval service of the United States shall hereafter be for a limited time, which shall be expressed in the commissions.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the adverse reports on the President's desk, which had been made from committees on memorials referred to them. The question in each case was on concurring in the report of the committee, and the Senate decided affirmatively on the following:

The petition of Leonard J. Thomas;
The petition of Charles H. Blood;
The petition of Joseph Hill and Sons;
The petition of José Baya;
The petition of Phæbe Glover;
The petition of John H. Patterson;
The petition of Samuel M. Bootes;
The memorial of Robert Piatt;
The petition of George E. Paine and Polly Teal, the children of Brinton Paine, deceased;
The petition of Samuel Crapin;
The petition of Hugh W. Dobbin;
The petition of Samuel Prisleau;
The petition of Thomas Flanagan;
The petition of Sarah Bennett; and
The petition of A. J. Williamson.

The Senate proceeded to consider the adverse report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of William A. Duer, administrator of William Duer, deceased; and,

On motion by Mr. BADGER, it was ordered to lie on the table.

MARY W. THOMPSON.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of Mary W. Thompson; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

DAVID C. CASH AND GILES U. ELLIS.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of David C. Cash and Giles U. Ellis.

The bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and directed to pay to David C. Cash, late lieutenant, and Giles U. Ellis, late a private in the Seminole war in Florida, whatever may be due to them on the monthly rolls for military service in said war. On this bill the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate reported adversely.

Mr. HUNTER called for the reading of the report.

The Secretary read the report of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives, from which it appears that David C. Cash and Giles U. Ellis served in the war with the Seminole Indians, Cash as a lieutenant, and Ellis as a private. They were engaged by Richard R. Crum of the Commissary Department, to disburse supplies to the troops, and they well and truly discharged that duty. At the expiration of their term of service, they accounted, as in duty bound, to R. R. Crum, quartermaster, delivering to him all invoices and goods in their possession. Although they were employed by Crum as his assistants, the Government has endeavored to hold them responsible as its agents, because they signed the vouchers as Assistant Quartermasters; but there was no contract between them and the Government. They were not commissioned by the Government in that character, but they acted under Crum, a regularly-qualified commissioned officer of the Government. They received a great deal of property as Crum's agents, and they accounted for it all; but Crum being in default to the Government, they were held accountable. The affidavit of Cash and Ellis is sustained by the affidavit of Crum, who says that they acted as his agents, and as such were authorized to receive large supplies. He says he held them responsible to him, and that he demanded and received of them all their papers, vouchers, invoices, and receipts. They fully accounted for and properly applied all the stores received by them. The Government did not give them their regular pay, but withheld it from them, and the committee thought that Crum, the quartermaster, and not Giles and Ellis, should be held liable to the Government for any deficiencies or arrearages in his department as quartermaster or commissary.

Mr. HUNTER. That seems to be a bill which requires the Government to pay agents who were employed by this Mr. Crum. I think this ought not to be done. I hope the bill will be passed by informally.

Mr. BADGER. As the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, who reported this bill, is not in his place, I move to postpone its further consideration until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN T. SULLIVAN.

The bill for the relief of John T. Sullivan was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the Postmaster General be authorized and required to pay to John T. Sullivan $1,670, out of the funds of the Post Office Department, for folding, cutting, and quarto binding 17,500 copies of laws and instructions to postmasters, under a contract made with him by the Postmaster General on the 27th of April, 1839; and also for folding, stitching, and binding other laws and regulations subsequent to said contract, and for the storage of said laws.

The bill was reported to the Senate and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

JOSEPH GIDEON.

The bill for the relief of Joseph Gideon was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the proper accounting officer of the Treasury be authorized and directed to settle and adjust the accounts of Joseph Gideon, as acting purser of the United States store-ship Fredonia, from December 18, 1847, to May 16, 1848, and from June 8, 1848, to January 18, 1851, and to pay him the difference between the compensation of a captain's clerk and an active purser for that time.

Mr. FELCH called for the reading of the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The Secretary read it accordingly. It sets forth that Joseph Gideon was duly appointed by the commander of the store-ship Fredonia an acting purser on board, and that he faithfully executed the duties of purser in the Gulf of Mexico and on the Pacific coast, for the period mentioned in the bill. He also, at the same time, discharged the duties of captain's clerk, for which he received compensation; but the committee deem him entitled to the additional amount now proposed to be given to him.

The bill was reported to the Senate and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

JOHN O. MEANS.

The bill for the relief of John O. Means was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the proper accounting officer of the Treasury Department be authorized to settle and adjust the account of John O. Means, an acting purser on board the United States brig Dolphin, under the appointment of the commander of the squadron on the coast of Africa, and to allow him the pay of a purser while in the discharge of the duties of that appointment.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIM.

The bill to confirm the claim of John Ervin to a certain tract of land in the Bastrop Claim, was read a second time, and the Senate proceeded to consider it as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that John Ervin shall be confirmed in his title to the land on which he resides, in the State of Louisiana, to the extent of six hundred and forty acres, to be taken by legal subdivisions so as to include his improvements; and that a patent be issued to him for a legal survey of the same, under the direction of the Surveyor General for said State; provided that this act shall amount only to a relinquishment of title on the part of the United States.

Mr. FELCH asked for the reading of the report.

It was read accordingly. It appears from it that twenty-three years since Mr. Ervin settled on and improved a tract of land in the Bastrop Claim, in the State of Louisiana, on which he has ever since resided. Previous to his settlement the land had been sold by the grantee to a Mr. Ballanger, who, after having made some improvements, abandoned it and left the country, and has not been heard of since, nor has any agent or heir appeared for him. In consequence of this, the claimant has not been enabled, as he intended to do, to purchase the title of Ballanger to the tract. But he has held peaceable and uninterrupted possession long enough to give him, under the laws of Louisiana, a title by prescription against all claimants except the United States. An act of Congress was passed on the 3d of March, 1851, which intended to give a donation to settlers of twenty years standing and upwards. It provided that the title of the United States should be relinquished against such persons. This claimant would have been entitled to the benefit of this act but for the fact that he did not hold his lands of the original grantee. This being a mere technical point, the claimant, of course, is within the spirit and intention of the act of 3d March, 1851. The committee state, also, that the claimant is a very old man, and that it would be a very important thing for him, in his old age, to have his title settled.

Mr. FELCH. The chairman of the committee, [Mr. DOWNS], who reported this bill, is not in his seat. I would like to know what has been our legislation on this subject heretofore.

Mr. HALE. This was a subject of consideration in the Committee on Private Land Claims, and the committee unanimously agreed that this case required the attention of Congress. It is a case in which an individual has occupied his land for more than twenty years; but the land was so situated that, for some reason or other, it was not open to entry. This individual has occupied the land for more than twenty years. Nobody has disturbed him; nobody but the United States can disturb him. The committee deemed it proper that the claim of the United States to the land which he has occupied for more than twenty years should be relinquished. I hope the bill will pass. This claimant is a very old man, and this is but a trifling matter.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. HUNTER. I prefer that the bill should lie over until the Senator who reported it shall be in his seat, and we can hear some further explanation of it. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SOULE. I hope this bill will pass. I am sorry there should be any opposition to it. If there is any opposition, I hope it will lie on the table until my colleague, who reported it, shall be in his place.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senate did not listen to the reading of the report. If the Senate will give their attention to its reading, I think there will be no necessity for a speech; for the report states the case very plainly. I ask that the report be again read.

The report was again read.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to hear the act of the 3d of March, 1851, referred to in the report, read.

Mr. GWIN. I have no doubt as to the justice of this claim. I hope the Senate will pass it. The Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. DOWNS,] who reported this bill, is not in his seat; and if there is any objection to the bill, I hope it will be passed over until he shall be here. For myself, I know of no objection to the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is this objection to it, in my mind: I believe that this Bastrop Claim has recently been determined by the Supreme Court of the United States to be an invalid claim, and good for nothing. It seems that a recent act has been passed extending preemption rights to the settlers on that claim. Hence, I suppose, this gentleman is entitled to a preemption right in common with other settlers. But he sets up a claim from a man by the name of Ballanger, who, he says, purchased from Bastrop, the original grantee. The fact is evident, and he alleges it himself in his petition, that he intended to purchase from Ballanger; but he never did acquire any right or title whatever. It is, therefore, a case of a donation of land, as much so as any donation that has ever been presented to the consideration of Congress. I therefore called for the reading of the act of the 3d of March, 1851, referred to in the report, for the purpose of seeing whether Congress had established the principle of making donations to settlers on this claim for twenty years' settlement. If that be the case, I see no objection to placing this individual on the same footing with others; although I might have objected to such legislation originally. In regard to all these matters, which I have condemned for so many years here, I have gone upon the principle, that when you establish a certain rule, all persons should fare alike under it. Let all enjoy the same benefits whose claims are alike. I called for the reading of the act with that view. Until we can look into the matter, I think no injury can be sustained by letting this bill lie over.

Mr. HALE. If there be any objection to this bill after I shall state a single fact, I will not interpose any objection to its being laid over. It will be seen that the last clause of the bill is in these words:

"Provided, That this act shall amount only to a relinquishment of title on the part of the United States."

That is all it will do. I understand the Bastrop Claim as matter of a disputed title, and that the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that the grant was void. Congress, in 1851, at the last session, passed an act for the relief of the settlers on the claim, by which it was provided, that the title of the United States should be relinquished against all settlers who had been there over twenty years. This gentleman has been there for twenty-three years, not on land of the United States, but on land granted by Bastrop to a Mr. Ballanger, who has never appeared to claim it. Hence he has a good title by prescription, as against Ballanger, or anybody else but the United States. It has been decided that his case does not come within the purview of the act; but the United States does not own the claim. All he asks is, that the United States shall relinquish what claim it has, if any, and leave him to contend with Ballanger and his heirs, if they ever should come. You may postpone the bill for twenty years, but you can never get the facts any plainer than they are. These are the facts of the case. Now, if the Senate wish it to lie over after this statement, I shall interpose no objection.

Mr. DAWSON. Let it lie over.

The Secretary, in pursuance of the request of Mr. UNDERWOOD, then read the following act:

An Act for the settlement of certain classes of private land claims within the limits of the Baron de Bastrop Grant, and for allowing preemption to certain actual settlers, in the event of the final adjudication of the title of the said De Bastrop, in favor of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in the event of a final adjudication by the court in favor of the United States, on the "Baron de Bastrop" claim in Louisiana, under the act of Congress approved on the 17th June, 1844, entitled "An act to provide for the adjustment of land claims within the States of Missouri, Arkansas, and Louisiana, and in those parts of the States of Mississippi and Alabama, south of the thirty-first degree of north latitude, and between the Mississippi and Perdido rivers," the register and receiver for the Ouachita land district, Louisiana, shall give public notice of the fact, in some newspaper circulating in the vicinity of the land, and within twelve months from and after the date of the first publication of such notice, it shall and may be lawful for any original claimants of the classes hereinafter mentioned in this section of the present act, their heirs or legal representatives, to file with the aforesaid register and receiver notices descriptive of their claims, and specifying their precise localities and area, with the testimony in support of the same:

First: All bona fide claimants by purchase from De-

Bastrop, or those holding under him, where the land has been occupied and cultivated for twenty years.

Second: All bona fide claimants of "head rights," for not exceeding six hundred and forty acres, their heirs or legal representatives, where the original claimant came over and settled the land under the contract between the Spanish Government and De Bastrop, even though the land was not actually sold or conveyed to such original claimants by the said De Bastrop.

Third: All bona fide claimants for not exceeding six hundred and forty acres, as actual settlers prior to the twentieth December, eighteen hundred and three, where they have held such continued possession as to show that they identified themselves with the ownership of the land.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That after the expiration of the twelve months aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the register and receiver, pursuant to such instructions as may be given by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, to make a report with the notices, and all the testimony, to the General Land Office, specifying all such cases as in their opinion come within the principles recognized under the several heads mentioned in the foregoing section, and which according to those principles ought to be confirmed, and such as in their opinion ought to be rejected.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to lay the report aforesaid before Congress for final action thereon; and all claims recommended for confirmation shall be reserved from sale until the final action of Congress on the report aforesaid, and all claims reported as rejected shall be treated as other public lands.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the claims numbered forty, forty-four, forty-five, forty-six, forty-seven, forty-eight, and fifty-one, favorably reported on by Daniel J. Sutton, as register for the district north of Red river, Louisiana, and entered in the first class of his report, dated first of January, eighteen hundred and twenty-one, but on account of being within the limits of the Bastrop Grant, have been excluded from the confirmatory provisions of the second section of the act of Congress approved February twenty-eight, eighteen hundred and twenty-three, entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts for the adjustment of land claims in the State of Louisiana," be and the same shall be held confirmed, in the event of the final adjudication of the Bastrop claim in favor of the United States as aforesaid: Provided, That this confirmation shall only operate as a relinquishment of title on the part of the United States, and shall in no way prejudice or affect any sale, or other right existing at the time when the survey shall be executed, of the claims hereby conditionally confirmed; and in the event of the final adjudication of the Bastrop Grants aforesaid, and upon the return of approved plats of survey for the claims specified in this section, relinquishment patents shall be issued as in other cases.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That in the event of a final adjudication, in favor of the United States, of the Bastrop Claim, as contemplated by the first section of this act, every bona fide settler, on any part of said land, at the time of the extension of the public surveys over the same, who is a man of family, widow, or single man over twenty-one years of age, and an actual housekeeper thereon, and who, but for the reservation heretofore made of said land for the claim of the said Bastrop, would have been entitled to a right of preemption under some one of the preemption laws, be, and he is hereby authorized to enter the quarter section so resided on, or by adjoining legal subdivisions, so as to include his residence and land cultivated or improved, any number of acres not to exceed one hundred and sixty acres, upon making proof of such settlement, housekeeping, &c., to the satisfaction of the register and receiver, as in ordinary cases, at any time within a year after the public surveys are so extended over said land.

Approved March 3d, 1851.

Mr. SOULE. The Senate will perceive, from the act which has just been read, that very few cases are plainer than the one now presented to our consideration. I myself am not willing, nor, indeed, am I ready now, to express any opinion as to the rights the claimant may hold under the laws of Louisiana, considering him as holding adversely to those who may claim under Ballanger. I do not wish, therefore, to intimate what my opinion may be on that question. But certainly the Senate will not insist upon acting on this case in the absence of the Senator who has presented it, and who is familiar with its merits, and who could explain any difficulty which any Senator might perceive in the way. I will, therefore, make a call upon the generosity and good feeling of the Senate to let the matter lie over, until my colleague shall be able to attend.

Several Senators. Certainly.

Mr. BADGER. The honorable Senator from Louisiana misunderstands entirely the purpose of those of us who desire that this matter shall not be laid over. We consider this a plain case. We want to pass the bill. The reading of the report of the committee, and the reading of the act of Congress, passed March 3, 1851, shows conclusively that Congress intended to provide for a class of cases precisely like the one now presented to our consideration. It is only by a technical difficulty that this person is precluded from the benefits of the act. And why should we not at once pass the bill, and release to him the title of the United States, if it has any?

Mr. SOULE. If that be the intention of the Senate I shall interpose no objection. On the contrary, I shall be quite willing to pass the bill now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If it be the will of the Senate to act on the bill now, I wish to state a few objections to it.

Mr. BADGER. Let it lie over, then.

Mr. SOULE. Then I will move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

GEORGE POINDEXTER.

A bill for the relief of George Poindexter, reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, was then taken up and read a second time, and considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Is there a report accompanying that bill? If there is, I would like to hear it read.

The PRESIDENT. There is a report which was made some years past, but no report has been made this session. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania wish that report to be read?

Mr. DAWSON. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will allow me, I will state, that this bill has been reported upon year after year, and the Department has recommended the payment of the claim. The only difference that arose between the claimant and the Department is, that he wanted certain words employed to which the Department would not consent.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I am satisfied, and withdraw the objection.

The bill was then reported to the Senate without amendment, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

WILLIAM MILLER.

The Senate next proceeded to consider a bill for the relief of William Miller.

This was a bill reported from the Committee on Pensions, and provided that the Secretary of the Interior be directed to place the name of William Miller, of the State of Maine, on the roll of invalid pensioners for life at $8 per month, commencing on the 1st of January, 1852.

The bill having been read a second time, was considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. There being no amendment, it was reported back to the Senate, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

EZRA WILLIAMS.

A bill for the relief of Ezra Williams was read a second time, and considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The bill provided that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to pay to said Ezra Williams the sum of $500, in full for his services in preparing an alphabetical index, under the direction of Richard M. Young, Commissioner of the Land Office.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

IRA DAY—INTEREST ON CLAIMS.

The bill for the relief of Ira Day, of Vermont, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the Postmaster General be authorized and required to pay to Ira Day, of Vermont, $1,008 90, together with the interest thereon from the 1st of July, 1837, out of the funds of the Post Office Department, in full for the balance due to him for transporting the mail from Royalton to Burlington, in the aforesaid State, from January, 1833, to July, 1837.

Mr. HUNTER. I perceive, Mr. President, that there is an allowance for interest provided for in that bill. This is altogether unusual, and I move to amend the bill by striking out the words "together with the interest thereon from the 1st day of July, 1837."

Mr. UPHAM. I hope the Senator from Virginia will hear the report read before he makes that motion. If he will attend to the report, he will see the ground on which this interest is recommended to be paid.

Mr. HUNTER. I am quite willing to hear the report read.

The Secretary read the report, from which it appeared that two bills had heretofore been reported for the relief of the petitioner—one in 1839 and the other in 1840—and that the facts of the case were set forth in a report to the Senate during the third session of the twenty-fifth Congress. From that report it appeared that James Barker and others were contractors for transporting a daily mail for four years, from Boston (Mass.) to Royalton, Montpelier, and Burlington, for the sum of $12,250 per annum, commencing on the 1st of January, 1833, and ending in January, 1837. In the month of October, 1834, the Postmaster General ordered the mail to be discontinued one day in a week on that part of the route between Royalton and Burlington, which part of the route was assigned by the contractors to the petitioner. Under this order of the Postmaster General, the mail from Boston arrived at Royalton on Saturday evening, and remained over until the Monday morning following. That the inconvenience to the public in consequence of this order was such that the postmasters on the route, and other citizens, solicited and urged the petitioner to continue the transportation of the mail daily, notwithstanding the said order of the Postmaster General. The petitioner did so, and thus the line was unbroken, and the mail was transported regularly from Boston to the capital of Vermont, and thence to Burlington, and vice versa, every day in the week. The petitioner, therefore, claimed this sum of $1,008 90, being the sum withheld from him by the Postmaster General on account of the order already mentioned.

The committee further reported, that if this order had been carried out, it would have occasioned great inconvenience to the public; that it would have delayed the mail thirty-six hours in one of the most important and productive routes in that section of the country; that the order, though temporary on its face, was doubtless signed as a means of affording temporary relief to the Department, which was then in an embarrassed condition; and that the service having been thus rendered at the request of the postmasters and other citizens upon the route, and having contributed greatly to the convenience of the public, the petitioner should in justice and equity be paid for it.

It further appeared that the mail was carried by the petitioner at the request of the Postmaster General, after the contract had expired, namely: from the 1st of January, 1837, to the 1st of July, in the same year; and that the same rate of deduction (one seventh) was retained by the Postmaster General, and was included in the amount claimed.

The committee further reported, that they had not been able to find any power vested in the Postmaster General, authorizing him to make such an order, and that the only clause in the contract authorizing the Postmaster General in any way to interfere with it was one which provided, that if the route, or any part of the route, therein mentioned, should be discontinued by act of Congress, or should, in the opinion of the Postmaster General, become useless, or if a line of stages or steamboats should be established on the whole or any part of it, where the mail was not so carried under the contract, then the contract itself, or such part of it, should cease to be binding on the Postmaster General, by giving notice of such event to the party contracting, and making allowance of one month's extra pay. Under this clause the committee were of opinion that the Postmaster General had no power to discontinue the mail one day in the week.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. UPHAM] desired that I would wait for the reading of the report before I pressed my amendment. Well, sir, I have heard it read, and upon hearing it I am not convinced that the principal is due, much less the interest. It seems that this contractor insisted on discharging this service, although the Postmaster General had expressly desired that it should be discontinued. Now, sir, by the report read, in which there is furnished a clause of the contract, it appears that the Postmaster General had a right to discontinue the contract for the whole route, and for the whole time, if he thought proper; and certainly if he had a right to discontinue it for the whole, he had a right to discontinue it for a part; and if this did not meet the views of the contractor he might have thrown his contract up. He only continued, in despite of the order of the Postmaster General, to discharge such services as he thought would be advantageous to those on the route. Now, if this is to be allowed and sustained by Congress in this case, others will do the same. Instead, therefore, of paying the principal and interest, I think that this claimant is not entitled to either. Besides, sir, I do not see why we should pay interest in this case, when we uniformly refuse to pay it in all others. We had a case here a very short time ago of a similar kind, it seems to me, in which the Senate refused to pay interest, although they did pay the principal. I see, therefore, no reason why the interest should be paid here.

Mr. UPHAM. I understand the Senator from Virginia to say that he doubts the equity of this claim on its merits, or in other words, that he would not pay either principal or interest, because the claimant continued the service, notwithstanding the order of the Postmaster General discontinuing it. This claim came before us at the last session of Congress, as we have seen by the report referred to. At that time I had not looked into the contract to see what powers were vested in the Postmaster General, or in other words, I had not looked into the terms or the form of the contract. Since that time, however, I have examined this matter, and I find that the Postmaster General expressly reserves to himself the right to alter the contract and reduce the pay for services to be performed on a route under certain circumstances. I then went back to the year 1833, when this particular contract was made, and I find no such clause in regard to it, nor any such power reserved as is now reserved. The only clause in the contract under which the Postmaster General claims to exercise this power, is in the following words:

"It is mutually understood by the contracting parties, that if the route, or any part of the route herein mentioned shall be discontinued by act of Congress, or, in the opinion of the Postmaster General, becomes useless; or if a line of stages or steamboats shall be established on the whole or any part of it, where the mail is not so carried under this contract, then this contract, or such part of it, shall cease to be binding on the Postmaster General, he giving notice of such event, and making allowance of one month's extra pay."

Now, under this clause it appears that the power of the Postmaster General is derived altogether from the contract itself. What, then, had the Postmaster General a right to do under this contract? In the first place, let me remark that the mail route is one thing, and that the contract is another. This contract provides that if any portion of the mail route shall be discontinued by Congress, or if, in the opinion of the Postmaster General, such route, or any part of it, may become useless, he may discontinue the whole or a part, as the case may be, by giving notice thereof, and by making an allowance of one month's extra pay. But, sir, there is no clause in this contract authorizing the Postmaster General to reduce the service to be performed on a route. If he has contracted for too much service, that is his misfortune; but he certainly has no right to curtail, or reduce it, so long as the route over which he contracted to transport the mail continues to be a mail route. If it should cease to be a mail route in consequence of the provisions of any act of Congress, or if he himself should discontinue it as a mail route, on the ground that it has become useless, then the contract, so far as it relates to that portion of the mail route which has been discontinued, shall not be binding on the Postmaster General. All that he could do under this contract is to put an end to it, if Congress should repeal the law making it a mail route, or if, by reason of other circumstances, it should become useless as a mail route. What, then, is a mail route? I understand it to be a road or way. Congress makes a road a mail route by special act. The Postmaster General contracts for the services to be performed on that route, and under the old form of contract, he could not reduce the service from a daily mail to a semi-weekly, or tri-weekly, or weekly mail; but under the new form of contracts entered into, there is a clause authorizing him to alter the schedule; and if, in his opinion, the service contracted to be performed is not required, he may curtail, or reduce, or terminate that service. Now, if under the old form of contract the Postmaster General had such authority, why afterwards strike out that old clause, and substitute a new one? It is clear to my mind, and the committee were unanimous in their opinion, that under this form of contract entered into in the year 1833, the Postmaster General could not reduce a daily mail to a tri-weekly, or semi-weekly mail; or, in other words, he could not strike out one trip, or two trips, or three trips. This was illustrated here the other day in the case of Dwinell, of Maine. The Senate passed an act to give him $13,000. He contracted to run a daily mail on a certain route in Maine. Now, although this was a profitable route in the summer, it was found to be unprofitable in winter, in consequence of obstructions on the route. What did the Postmaster General do in this case? Did he reduce the service? No; he applied to the contractor and induced him to consent to diminish his number of trips to three in the week, with a promise to pay him a sufficient compensation. In this case we passed a bill the other day giving $13,000, without interest, for the damage he sustained. That bill was passed by striking out the interest. But if the committee are correct in the legal view they have taken of this question, there is no doubt about the interest. If, at the end of the contract, the Postmaster General retained one seventh of the money then due, and refused to pay it over, that party is as much entitled to interest as the State of New Hampshire was on money advanced to carry on the Indian Stream war. We have passed a bill this session to pay interest in this New Hampshire case, and we have also passed a similar bill in the case of Georgia. Now, here is a bill to pay money belonging to the petitioner, which is retained in the hands of the Postmaster General; and I call on Senators to show me the authority of the Postmaster General to reduce the amount of the service contracted to be performed on this mail route. It has never been discontinued as a mail route. It is still a great thoroughfare from Boston, by way of Royalton, Montpelier, and Burlington, to Montreal, and therefore it never can be discontinued. The report shows that it is still a mail route; and the principle contended for is, that while it was a mail route, and was not discontinued by the Postmaster General, he could not interfere with the amount of service which he contracted to have performed on that route. That is the legal view of the case. But at the last session of Congress, upon the equitable view of the case, that he had expended this money and had furnished carriages, horses and harness, and drivers, to run this great mail every day in the week, it was thought right that this money should be paid. This order was regarded as a temporary measure only during the embarrassed condition of the Post Office Department. And the Department being relieved, and being now able to pay, the Senate, at the last Congress, passed a bill on principles of equity and justice. But taking the other view of the subject, about which there is no doubt, I do not believe that there is a legal man in the Senate who will say that the Postmaster General had any right to reduce the service.

Mr. MALLORY. From the report made by the committee, it can hardly be doubted by the Senate that the principal is justly due, and has been unjustly denied, and the objection is to the interest only. And now, when an opportunity is thus offered, I would like to hear Senators set forth some good and sufficient reason why, if Government pays its just debts, it should not also pay damages, and be just and equal with all individuals. This refusal to pay interest upon the just debts of the Government, after having been refused to claimants for twenty or thirty years, has grown up by what? Not by any act of Congress, but simply by the construction of the clerks in the Departments. It is a simple rule of the Department, originating in the fear that if interest were allowed the Treasury would be exhausted. Now, whether it would or would not, has nothing to do with this question. The only question is, What does justice require of us? That is the only question which would be demanded by a court and jury. But Government has frequently gone behind this precedent of refusing interest, and has paid interest. I could refer to some fifty cases in which it has been done, thus setting aside the decisions of the Departments. I feel an interest in this question of interest on claims, and should like to hear those who say that this Government is not bound to pay interest show some good reason why. The philosophy of the objection is this: that the Government is always presumed to be ready to pay its debts. But this is a fiction of the imagination. You go to a Department, and you ask for payment of a claim, and you do not get it. Your acts of Congress prove the time when the debt was due, and that is the time from which interest should commence and from which it should be paid. Now, the theory failing, the practice should be set aside, and the Government should act with the same justice and equity which would be expected from individuals.

Mr. RUSK. The Senator from Virginia scarcely could have attended to the reading of the report, or he cannot be in earnest when he expresses any doubt as to the duty of the Government to pay the principal. This contract was made for the transportation of a daily mail. The Postmaster General, arbitrarily, without any authority in the law, and without any authority in the contract, reduced the service one seventh. Now he had no right whatever to violate this contract. He made the contract for carrying the mail daily over the route, and then reduced it one seventh. And for what? For the purpose of relieving himself and the Department from embarrassment. He had no right to make this reduction, either from the law, or the terms of the contract.

Mr. HUNTER. I know nothing about the terms of the contract; but I wish to ask whether there was any provision in the contract that the Postmaster General might discontinue the whole service whenever he should choose to do it?

Mr. RUSK. The route and the whole service might be discontinued, if Congress chose to discontinue the route. Or if, in the opinion of the Postmaster General, the entire route was useless, he might discontinue the entire service, but with a compensation to the contractors which he understood at the time he entered into the contract, and that was one month's extra pay. The Postmaster General could discontinue the whole service by giving one month's extra pay; and if he chose to send the mail on another route, then Congress discontinued the route. But in this instance, the Postmaster General violates the terms of the contract for the benefit of the Department. It is not pretended nor stated anywhere that such is not the fact. It is not stated that there was any less necessity for carrying a daily mail after the contract was made than at the time it was made. And it is shown that there was constantly a necessity for a daily mail, by the fact that afterwards a new contract was made for carrying the mail daily. Testimony was produced before the committee, showing that there was great inconvenience, not only with regard to the mail, but with regard to the business and the travel on that route, in consequence of the neglect to run the stages on one day in the week. Not only individuals engaged in business, but everybody in that vicinity demanded that this man should go on and comply with his contract. He did so, and Government has pocketed the benefit of the services which he rendered in strict compliance with his contract. The simple question is, has the Postmaster General, when he is authorized by no law, simply on account of the embarrassment of the Department, a right to violate a contract between him and another party? Even if it were put upon the ground that the service was not necessary, the contractor would be entitled to compensation according to the law.

Now with regard to the interest. In the case of Mr. Dwinell, which was discussed the other day, I believe the Senator from Delaware put the refusal to pay interest on the ground that he had stepped over his rights, and did not demand them; and because I could not answer a question put by the Senator from Georgia, and show that Mr. Dwinell had commenced a prosecution immediately, and had made his demand upon the Government, his interest was struck out. But the case is very different with regard to this claim. This party has made his demand for interest all the time; he came here as early as 1839 and made his claim. I do not think, under the circumstances, it can be pretended that the Postmaster General had the slightest right to violate—as he did violate—this contract. It therefore becomes a legal, just, and equitable debt against the United States, beginning in 1837, and here it has been every session of Congress. Because we have delayed the payment of the claim, is it his fault? Here is a man who performed his contract, the Government taking the benefit of his services, and yet he has been constantly asking you to pay, and has failed to obtain it on account of our delay. The interest has accrued because you have neglected to do him justice before.

Mr. BADGER. According to the terms of the contract entered into with the Postmaster General, it was agreed between the two parties that the contractor should transport a daily mail upon this route. There was a power reserved to the Postmaster General, and but one power; and that was, to make the contract cease. And in order to put an end to the contract, either for the whole distance, or for any portion of the distance, one of two things must happen: either that Congress should discontinue the post route, or that the Postmaster General should himself discontinue it, upon the ground that it had ceased to be necessary; that it had become useless. That is the state of the case. The Postmaster General had a right to make an end to the contract, but he had no right to alter the terms of the contract, to continue to enforce it as to a part, and put it out of force as to the rest. The honorable Senator from Virginia says, that if he had a right to put an end to the contract altogether, he had a right to put an end to a part. Surely that is very inconclusive reasoning. Two men may enter into a contract, and there may be terms used to give liberty to the parties to take such a position as if the contract had never been made in a certain event; but surely it would be very strange to say, that the contract shall be in force for so much, and not in force for the residue. I undertake to say there is no foundation for such a position. The Postmaster General had a right to put an end to the contract; but if it was in force at all, it was in force altogether. When he said, You shall not carry the mail seven days in a week, and shall carry it but six days in a week, his declaration was absolutely illegal; it was in violation of law, and of the contract. The Postmaster General has no more control over such a contract than one individual has over his own contract with another, except so far as some law gives him control, or some reservation in the contract has put it in his power to control it. He says to this man, I do not put an end to the contract. Not at all. But I say, you shall carry the mail six days in the week, and not seven. Now, the Senator from Virginia says, if the contractor did not like that, all he had to do was to put an end to the contract, by refusing to carry the mail at all. I deny that conclusion. If the order of the Postmaster General was illegal, then the contract stood as if he had not made the order. The contractor stood ready to perform the whole service, and he had a right to do it; and if he had a right to perform the service, he had a right to the compensation. The whole question, then, is, whether officers of the United States have a right to make contracts and violate them.

With regard to the payment of interest, I agree, to a considerable extent, with the honorable Senator from Florida, that Government should set an example of doing perfect justice, and should apply the same rules with respect to claims upon the Government that it is in the habit of enforcing in order to secure justice to itself. There is no other rule. Now if this were the case of an individual, I would be extremely glad to know upon what principle the interest should be denied on this claim for a single hour. A certain sum of money became due to this person for the discharge of his contract, and the Postmaster General refused to pay him a portion of it; he withheld and kept it. It was a sum certain then due. The party to pay knew what he had to pay, and the party to receive knew what he had to receive. I undertake to say, that under such circumstances, there is no court in the world—or, at least, no court where the common law prevails, that would fail to award to the claimant the interest on the debt. It is due on the principal, which was agreed to be paid at a certain time. If the amount is absolutely certain, and if payment is refused, it is clear that in every such case interest is due. Therefore, in such a case as this, as it is a plain rule of justice between individuals, as it is a rule which Government inflexibly enforces upon all its debtors, Government cannot maintain its integrity in its dealings without doing to others what it requires others to do to it.

I admit that if a person has a claim against the Government of the United States—a claim, as we lawyers call it, sounding in damages—if demands are made and investigation is had to ascertain what is due, Government stands with regard to that just as individuals do. If one individual has a demand against another for damages, uncertain in amount, the law itself does not give interest upon these damages. There are cases in which interest may be given as a matter of discretion, but cannot be taken as a matter of right. The same rule applies here. If a man has preferred his claim against the Government and manifested his right, and there is proof that Government has not made provision to pay, either for want of time to pass upon it in Congress or for any other reason, I say that in such a case there is a right to the interest from the time he has verified his claim. With regard to the right of this particular claimant there is no manner of doubt. If the Postmaster General had said, I will reduce the service to carrying the mail twice or three times in a week, the man might have disposed of his horses, his stages, and his drivers; but here he was required to discontinue for one day only, and of course all the expense for horses, coaches, and drivers, had to be kept up. He did not save one dollar of expense in consequence of the diminution of the service, but he was deprived of his compensation. It was unjust in the extreme, and plainly illegal, and therefore, as the Senator from Vermont has said, this man has a clear claim for principal and interest upon legal grounds, as well as upon principles of equity and justice, which I hope we shall never forget in this Hall.

Mr. HUNTER. I confess that in relation to the principal, I find I was mistaken. When I expressed an opinion a short time ago, I had had no other opportunity to examine the case, except as I got it from the hasty reading of the bill and report from the desk of the Secretary. I am now inclined to think, upon further examining it, that the Postmaster General had not authority to curtail the service as he did. But, sir, in relation to the interest, it is quite a different matter; and it seems to me that if we are going to make this a test question in relation to the subject of interest, it had better be laid over until we have a fuller Senate. It is a very important question. I am far from agreeing that the same rule should govern us in the payment of interest, which would govern a private individual. Why, a private individual may at any time make a tender and pay his debt; and a private individual in general has the protection of the statute of limitations. Here every claim is presented, no matter how old; and what an inducement, what a temptation, do we not hold out to persons to keep back their claims, and not to urge a speedy settlement, if we allow interest? Even adopting the rule laid down by the Senator from North Carolina, that interest must be paid from the time when the demand is made, how easy would it be for any man to file his petition and then to say to his friend: You need not push it at this session, nor the next session, for I am not ready, for this reason or that. And after a long lapse of time, when it would be difficult to sift and examine testimony, then he may come in and get his claim passed, and get a large sum for arrearages of interest.

If you allow interest in such a case as this, I cannot see why it should not be allowed in any case in which you admit that an individual is entitled to money and to relief from this Government. And if you do allow interest on such claims as this, there is no telling where these demands will end. I believe it is the principle of all Governments to deny interest in cases of this sort. I believe it is a principle, that the Government is presumed to be always ready to pay. Such certainly is the case with our Government, as soon as a claim is ascertained to be due. But how is that to be ascertained? Why, first, if the individual has a legal claim, he goes to the proper accounting officer and it is passed there—at least, such is the presumption. We have proper accounting officers, and we make laws for their guidance in the settlement of legal claims. If an individual has no legal claim, but chooses to appeal to the equity of the case, he comes here, and it is to be presumed that finally it will be passed, if it is just and equitable. We know, however, that this is a cumbrous and inefficient body for the examination of claims; and are we to make the United States liable for interest in every case in which this body may fail to act speedily upon claims after a demand is made, no matter how old the claim may be? If we establish such a principle as this, we shall find that the public Treasury will soon be involved in embarrassments which we little anticipate.

Besides that, if we adopt this principle we shall be holding out temptations to persons to keep back their claims until it would be difficult to controvert them, in order that they may obtain interest. I believe that when a man has a claim which is not founded on law, and which he cannot get passed at the proper Department by the accounting officers, when he comes here merely to appeal to our equity, oftener than otherwise such claims are passed from a sentiment of benevolence rather than from a sense of justice. I believe it would be exceedingly dangerous to allow interest in such a case. It would be carrying this principle of equity, this idea of generosity on which claims are based, quite too far if we were to do this.

The Senator from Florida says that this question is to be tested on this bill. If it is to be tested, it ought to be tested in a full Senate. I hope, therefore, that this bill will be laid over until we shall have more Senators present, in order that we may settle the principle on the yeas and nays.

Mr. RUSK. I hope this bill will not be laid over. The question on the amendment will not decide the principle as to whether the Government will pay interest or not in all cases. The honorable Senator from Virginia concedes that this is a just debt, and that it ought to be paid. The facts of the case establish such a conclusion beyond a doubt. I hope, then, that no apprehension, founded on the negligence of Congress in investigating this claim heretofore, will induce the Senate to postpone until to-morrow that which appeals to our sense of justice to-day. If we pass this bill to-day as it is, it does not follow that to-morrow we shall be compelled to pay interest on every other claim. Your statute-books are full of such allowances. It is a question of justice toward a creditor of the Government, and I apprehend that fifty cases like this might be found where interest has been allowed. Yet, no principle binding on Congress, no precedent is set by them. This is a solitary case. It stands on its own merits. Here we have a debt which, it is admitted on all hands, is due. Why, then, should we oppose the payment of interest on a debt admitted to be due? All admit that this debt was due to the individual in 1836. The facts of the case will not warrant any other conclusion. There has been no laches on the part of this individual. There has been no delay on his part. If the honorable Senator would examine the papers in the case, he would see that the individual was anxious to get his money as early as he could. As soon as it was due, he asked it from the Department. He then called on Congress the very year following. The simple question now is—it being admitted on all hands that this money is due—whether we will pay interest on it, or whether we will turn him off without interest? Apprehensions may be entertained in regard to the managers of claims, and whether they push them forward or not; but this man is not responsible for the fault of others. He is not responsible for those who may trump up claims against the Government, and seek to get interest. He is not, and ought not to be, by any logical deduction, made to suffer for the carelessness and delay of Congress in adjusting his claim. He performed services for the Government in 1837, for which all admit he should be paid. The Government have enjoyed for fifteen years together the profits of his services. They have all that length of time kept this money which is justly due to him. Now, the simple question is, not an establishment of a principle which is to bankrupt the Treasury, but an appeal to the discretion of Senators, whether or not interest ought not to be allowed in addition to the principal.

Mr. BAYARD. It is not my intention to contest the principal which is claimed in this case, though I by no means can admit even that that might not be contested successfully. I agree that on the terms of the contract, as stated by the honorable Senators from North Carolina and Vermont, there was no power given to the Postmaster General to curtail the contract. Be it so. But we must know the exact terms of the order he gave. He had power, under the contract, to discontinue the service altogether. It is perfectly proved that he could not, under it, give an order to the party to perform service only six or five days out of the service, or on alternate days; but suppose the order is, "I consider that the interests of the Government require that the mail should be transported only on six days in the week; if you are willing to modify your contract I will continue it; if you will not, I will discontinue it altogether." Had not the Postmaster General power to impose those terms upon the party? If the party assents to that—and that I believe was the provision which existed before new provisions were inserted in more modern contracts—of course he becomes bound by it. In this particular case, it seems that the individual chose to transport the mail on the additional day on the request of citizens in the neighborhood. Although the Postmaster General had no power which he could exercise directly in ordering the curtailing of the contract, yet it might be exercised under the general power of discontinuance by an order for its discontinuance, if the party did not assent to the curtailment. That that power has been exercised in cases of a similar character, I am well satisfied. Whether those were the terms of the order in this particular case, I have no knowledge.

I am not disposed, however, to deny the relief to the petitioner to the extent of the principal sum claimed.

On the question of interest it is more important, and I hope the Senate will postpone the further consideration of the subject, because, to my mind, it has been placed by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] and the Senator from Florida, [Mr. MALLORY,] upon grounds differing from those upon which I supposed it ought to stand. I do not feel prepared, at present, to go into the subject as extensively as I might do in case it was postponed. I will state generally, however, that the view I take in relation to this matter of interest is this: except where there is an agreement to pay interest, there is no moral obligation to pay it. All the rest is conventional. It is not a question of justice. It is purely a question of conventional law; and you may authorize that interest shall be recovered as between individuals in different States, according to the statutes or enactments. There is no question of justice about it. It is merely a conventional question and a question of expediency. Accordingly you will find in some countries, that interest is allowed at one rate, and in others at a higher rate, according to the exigencies of the country in which the law exists. And you will find that in certain classes of claims, interest is allowed in some States of the Union, and in Great Britain, but in other countries it is not allowed, because it is considered contrary to the policy or to the arbitrary laws of the country. There is no principle of morals which requires the payment of interest upon a claim, unless it is founded upon an express agreement to pay it, or unless the laws of a particular country demand that it should be so paid.

Then it is a mere question of statutory enactment. If that be so, it is not a question of justice as to whether this Government shall allow interest to an individual on a claim after it has acknowledged the claim. It is simply a question of policy and expediency as regards the action of the Government. The Senator from Florida may produce fifty cases in which interest has been allowed; but I apprehend that more than five hundred cases may be found in which, although the claims were just as meritorious as that before you, it has been denied. In other words, the principle of this Government, as I understand it—no matter how it arose—and also, I would say to the Senator from Florida, the settled principle of the British Government, as I have understood, is not to allow interest on claims against the Government. There is no injustice in that, if the law determines that the Government is not to be responsible for interest. The reason that is given is, that the Government is always supposed to be ready to pay. And so it is. It is ready to pay when it acknowledges the claim; but its policy is that it shall not be responsible for interest. I consider that this is a necessary policy for all Governments, especially for one like our own, when they allow no suit against themselves. We require a party to come before us when he has a claim which is not recoverable under our ordinary laws; if it is so recoverable, he can get it at once. We allow him no means of suing the Government, but tell him he must come before the Congress of the United States; and we decide in the particular case whether the claim is sustainable against the Government; and I am sorry to say that, so far as my observation extends, it seems to me that, instead of deciding judicially on general principles which ought to govern all classes of cases, the rule appears to be the particular partiality or particular opinions that may be entertained of the individual merits of the case, without reference to any general principle. For my own part, under these circumstances, I should say that the Government could never be safe, unless it adopted the principle of the non-payment of interest on claims where there was no express agreement to pay it. In the case of loans, there is an agreement to pay. If in the contract you agree to pay interest, and do not do it, you commit a breach of morals, but in other cases you do not. Hence it is purely a conventional question. The reason which is given is, perhaps, though technical in its character, sound in itself. It is founded upon this: the distinction between individuals and Governments. As regards individuals, the debtor is always bound to seek his creditor, and pay him wherever he may be whenever the debt is due. In the case of the Government, the creditor is bound to come and demand from the Government, and that places them in an entirely different position. There is no analogy between the cases. Besides, even as between individuals, it is not a rule of morality and justice that requires the payment of interest. It is a mere positive law of the land in which interest is claimed. Go to England, and on a judgment you cannot recover interest. I believe in most of the States of the Union, interest is not recoverable on a judgment. The rule has been more extended in this country than in England; but—

Mr. BADGER. Do I understand the Senator to say that interest cannot be recovered on a judgment?

Mr. BAYARD. In England it cannot.

Mr. BADGER. Not in an action for debt?

Mr. BAYARD. It cannot in an action of debt or on a judgment, and I presume the reason of that is, that the party having the judgment is bound to execute it at once, and it is his duty to do it, and if he does not, the law does not allow him to recover interest upon it. I do not doubt that I am right in this; but whether I am or not matters little in this case. My object is to show that this matter of interest is conventional. In one State, you find interest allowed at the rate of ten per cent., in another at seven, in another at six, and in other countries at four or five, as what is called the legal rate of interest. If an obligation of justice, independent of a positive law, would require the payment of interest, it should be the same in all cases; and here, if this principle of justice is applicable to the doctrine of interest, and if it is not a matter of policy or expediency, the result would be, that when a claim arises against the United States in a State in which the usual rate of interest was ten per cent., the Government ought to pay ten per cent., if in a State where the rate was seven per cent., it ought to pay seven per cent.; if in a State where it was six per cent., it ought to pay six per cent. But the truth is, it is purely conventional. It is the policy of the Government not to admit interest upon claims, when it has not agreed to do it, with one exception case, and that is this: When a claim under the ordinary laws of the Government would be payable out of your Treasury, and from a failure to appropriate and to acknowledge the claim, which, at the moment the appropriation is made, will be payable, then the principle on which the policy stands, that the Government is always ready to pay an acknowledged claim, is there violated. That is one case where interest should be allowed. I know of no other exception in which I would be willing to pay interest. The great objection to this rule is this: A vast number of claims may be presented here where there may be a difficulty in passing bills, sometimes from the want of a proper presentation of the claim, sometimes from the want of proper evidence to support it, and at other times possibly, though we cannot presume that, on account of the negligence or non-performance of duty by the committee to which it was referred, or there may be higher public business in the body preceding it. But there are always, independent of proper claims, a vast number of claims presented to the Government, many of which are positively bad, many of which are doubtful in their character. If, then, you adopt the principle that you will pay interest upon claims, you must do it in all cases, if you do it in any. There is nothing which distinguishes this case, that I can see, from any other case in which we admit the justice of the claim. If you admit the justice of the claim you must admit that it was just at the time the transaction took place. But under the rule we contend, that if it is right it only exists, as against the Government, from the time the Government acknowledges it; and that of course would make the party entitled to relief from the passage of the act. In cases of claims of a doubtful character, by adopting the rule to pay interest on all, you will necessarily encourage parties to hold them back until the memory of the individuals connected with the transactions has either become weakened, or the individuals themselves have passed away, and you have no means of such investigation as you would have had at the time of the transaction. The rule would therefore tend to encourage the holding back of all classes of claims, which are either of a bad or doubtful character, because if the party knows that by a general principle of the Government, he is entitled to the interest on his claim if the claim is not perfectly right, if it is one in which there may be abundant evidence to countervail that which went to sustain it, it will be held back. We know that almost all of the claims which come before us are sustained entirely by ex parte evidence, got up by the party himself, through affidavits, upon which the Government have no power of examination or investigation in any way. Under these circumstances, is it not evident that parties would always hold back claims, in doubtful cases, until the knowledge of the transaction was passed from the minds of men; until those who could perhaps best explain it have passed out of the world; and that then they would bring forward their claims to Congress, supported perhaps by affidavits taken at the time? or it may be that the claim was made but not prosecuted at the time, and suffered to lie over ten, fifteen, or twenty years, and of course be allowed as having been claimed at the time when the transaction took place. If your general law is to be that you will pay interest on claims, is it not a necessary result that it will conduce to the holding back and delaying the prosecution of claims which are of a class that would not be well sustainable? Would it not keep back doubtful claims until the memory of the transaction had passed away, or until the means of investigation had become so limited that there would be an uncertainty as to its justness, and yet the party might have his ex parte affidavits, a sufficient semblance of a claim, as strong as many which I have known passed, to justify the report of a committee and the passage of a bill by the Senate?

On the whole, though I should have wished to make some additional remarks on this subject, and should have wished to look into some questions connected with this doctrine of interest, I cannot vary from the impression which I had when I became a member of this body, which has grown up with me, as it has with many other men, in the course of my profession, that it was the settled principle, as well as the policy of Governments, that they would not pay interest unless in cases where there was an agreement to do so. I believe this rule applies to the Government of Great Britain, and also here, with exceptions though, it is true—I admit it to be so—as regards the action of Congress, the exceptionable cases are so frequent it is very often exceedingly difficult to know what the general rule is.

Mr. MALLORY. I hope, if any Senator upon this floor entertains any doubt about the propriety of paying interest upon liquidated demands due by the Government, that a little time will be devoted to inquiry in regard to the subject. I feel particularly interested in the question, standing here for the State of Florida, because at this time there is something like a million of dollars due to that State upon a claim of interest upon liquidated demands due over twenty years ago, whose payment has been stipulated for by treaty, and for the payment of which the faith of this Government is pledged to a foreign nation in the acquirement of a large territory. That claim rests on a more solid basis than any other that I know of. I, for one, am not disposed to see this question glossed over with partial arguments, leaving out of view the highest authority which can be referred to. And here I will say that I am prepared at any time to produce authorities on this subject. I am prepared at any time to combat the idea thrown out, that good faith between the Government and individuals does not require the payment of interest, and that it depends on statutory provisions. I am prepared to show that the statutory provisions merely go to show the extent of interest—the per cent. at which interest shall be paid, the value of money, and that is a matter about which nations differ. And I am prepared to show that, ever since Christianity has ruled the counsels of nations, interest has been allowed in payment of damages, if not interest eo nomine, that is, with the consent of the lender, certainly for damages against his consent.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] appealed to law writers upon this subject. I appeal to the highest law writers on record. I appeal to every law writer whose name stands in connection with the subject—to Grotius, to Puffendorf, to Vattel, to all the historians of England, to our own Justices Marshall and Story, to Chancellor Kent, and to every other man eminent as a law writer, to prove the very fact that interest should never be refused on a claim. I call to the minds of Senators the treaty of 1794, and the treaty of Ghent. When our Commissioners were negotiating the first article of the treaty of Ghent, a dispute arose, which was referred to the Emperor of Russia, who decided in this way: That the United States of America were entitled to indemnification for all the property carried off by the British forces; and upon the joint Commission which was arranged to liquidate this amount, a question was made and presented about the interest; and one of the American Commissioners has written an argument on that subject that is perfectly unanswerable. The authorities which he quotes are unanswerable. And here I will say, that in the Admiralty courts of England, from time immemorial to the present hour, in prize cases the decisions have been, that the prize should include the value of the property and interest from the time of capture. That law has been acted upon in our own courts. It has been adjudicated by Justice Story, and if authorities are needed, I can find hundreds of them. I stand here prepared to show that no Christian Government, our own among the number, has ever denied the liability of a Government to pay interest. The policy of not paying interest originated, if my memory serves me right, with Alexander Hamilton, who, in a desperate financial condition of the country, deemed it prudent to refuse to pay interest, and the owners of claims were very glad to get the principal. Since that time it has been merely a rule of the Departments. Sir, justice and not expediency should be the pillar on which we should stand. The idea that if we adopt this principle, claimants will not come forward immediately, but will withhold their claims, only goes to the expediency of the matter; it does not apply to the legality of the claim. Let the Government throw safeguards around the ascertainment of claims. There ought to be a Board of Claims. Do not keep the claimants out of their money for twenty, thirty, or fifty years, and then refuse them interest. I hope, if any doubt remains in the minds of Senators about the liability of the Government to pay interest, they will take time to consider it. I shall take great pleasure at any future day in discussing the question on its merits.

Mr. UPHAM. I wish to make a few remarks for the information of Senators. The petitioner presented his petition here at the very next session of Congress after the one seventh of his claim had been disallowed. I think that every case in regard to interest must stand on its own merits. It seems to me that if this money is due for services rendered to the Government, and it was unlawfully withheld, the petitioner should be entitled to interest from the time he presented his memorial.

Mr. HUNTER called for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

The PRESIDENT announced—yeas 12, nays 19—no quorum voting.

Mr. HALE. That is a quorum of the members elected to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT. I cannot determine that.

Mr. HALE. There is but one Senator holding a seat from Connecticut; one Senator holding a seat from California; and but one Senator from Mississippi. These are facts known to every Senator, and it seems to me that the Presiding Officer must take knowledge of them.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is very desirous that the point raised by the Senator from New Hampshire should be settled, so that he can understand if a less number than thirty-two is to constitute a quorum.

Mr. BADGER. I suppose that if we adjourn now, that question will come up to-morrow morning. I think it would be better to settle it when there is a full Senate, and not when there is a doubt as to the presence of a quorum. I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DAWSON. I hope my friend from North Carolina will withdraw that motion.

Mr. BADGER. Certainly.

Mr. DAWSON. I move that when the Senate adjourn, it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. BADGER. Less than a quorum can only adjourn from day to day.

The PRESIDENT. That motion cannot be received.

Mr. DAWSON. There is a quorum present. Some gentlemen did not vote.

The PRESIDENT. If any Senators present have not voted, it is very desirable that they should vote. The rule is imperative, that Senators present shall vote unless they are excused.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the difficulty?

The PRESIDENT. The question arises with regard to what constitutes a quorum of the Senate. The vote is twelve to nineteen, which makes thirty-one. If the whole number of Senators (sixty-two) were elected, it would require thirty-two to make a quorum. Senators have not been elected by some of the States, and the question is, whether they are to be considered as constituting a portion of the body? That question is for the Senate to decide.

Mr. BADGER. Certainly not. They are not members.

Mr. BUTLER. I differ from my friend from North Carolina. I think the Chair has no right to look as to whether a State is represented or not.

The PRESIDENT. That is my opinion.

Mr. BUTLER. You must take the Constitution as it is, and the rules of the Senate as they are. I know that a quorum is now procurable—that is, we are now in a condition to have a quorum if we choose to summon all the Senators in Washington. As to those who are absent from the city, I respectfully suggest that the Chair cannot take cognizance of their absence. Whether they are elected or not, depends upon the States and not upon the Chair.

Mr. BADGER. It is very true that whether they are elected or not, depends on the States and not on the Chair; but if they are not elected, they are not certainly members of this body.

Mr. BUTLER. How are you to know that they are not elected?

Mr. BADGER. I do not want to go into that question. I renew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. DAWSON. I made a motion that when the Senate adjourn, it be to Monday next.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair cannot receive that motion, while another subject is under consideration.

Mr. DAWSON. I move, then, to postpone the further consideration of this subject until to-morrow.

Mr. BADGER. That is to postpone the announcement of the result.

Mr. DAWSON. It has been announced that no quorum voted.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is entirely under the control of the Senate in this matter. His own impression is, that it requires thirty-two Senators to constitute a quorum.

Mr. BUTLER. Under the present rules of the Senate.

Mr. DAWSON. No doubt of that.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair is satisfied as to that point. If called upon to announce the result, he would say that no quorum voted.

Mr. HALE. I remember an instance, one or two sessions ago, when, after the result was announced, the Senate compelled members present, who had not voted, to vote in order to make a quorum.

The PRESIDENT. Certainly; and if there are any members present who have not voted, the Chair will enforce the rule.

Mr. HALE. I think my colleague [Mr. Norris] has not voted. His vote would make a quorum.

Mr. BRADBURY. I suppose if we adjourn until to-morrow, we need not then transact much business, and we can decide this point on Monday morning. I therefore renew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. BADGER. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Norris] will be called.

Mr. BRADBURY. I want this question to be decided by a full Senate. It can be decided on Monday morning.

Mr. BADGER. I hope the Senate will not now adjourn, for there is, as I understand, a Senator present who has not voted.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to—ayes 11, noes not counted.

Mr. BADGER. I hope that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. NORRIS] will now be called. He has not voted, and is now in his seat.

The PRESIDENT, (to the Secretary.) Call the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. NORRIS. I rise to a question of order. I understand that the vote has once been declared.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair did not announce it as final, but said that there was no quorum voting. The Chair thought that thirty-one members did not constitute a quorum, and therefore said that there was no quorum voting; but if there are any Senators here who have not voted, they are bound to vote when called on to do so.

Mr. NORRIS. I should have voted if I had been in my seat when called. I do not know what the question is.

Mr. MORTON. Will it be in order to move a recalling of the roll?

Several SENATORS. Oh, no.

Mr. BADGER. I should suppose that any gentleman would be willing to relieve the Senate from its present difficulty by voting.

Mr. RUSK. I move to postpone the further consideration of the subject until to-morrow.

Mr. HALE. Can we do that?

The PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. We have ascertained that there was no quorum present. Can less than a quorum postpone a subject.

The PRESIDENT. There is a quorum now present.

Mr. BADGER. In strictness I wish to ask whether any motion is in order after the commencement of the calling of the roll, except to complete the taking of the vote? whether we can go one step until we have ascertained whether we have or have not a quorum by the polling of Senators again if necessary? and whether a motion can be made to adjourn now, pending the taking of a vote upon this question? I believe a motion to adjourn is never in order when—

The PRESIDENT. It is always in order.

Mr. BADGER. It is always in order except when a vote is being taken.

Mr. HALE. I want to state, for the information of the Senate, what occurred formerly in a case somewhat similar to this. I was on a former occasion leaving the Senate when the Sergeant-at-Arms called me back to vote. I stated that I did not know what the question was, and the late Vice President (Mr. Dallas) explained what it was, and I was compelled to vote.

The PRESIDENT. Certainly; and that explanation will now be given if the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. NORRIS] desires it. It is certainly in strict conformity with the rule, that when a Senator who is present is called on to vote he must record his vote.

Mr. BADGER. I hope we shall not undertake any process of compulsion upon any member who declines voting.

The PRESIDENT. With regard to the suggestion of the honorable Senator, the Chair would remark, that when the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. NORRIS] came in he constituted a quorum, and therefore the Chair recognized a quorum as being present, subject to any other motion; and the proposition is to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

Mr. BADGER. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CASS] has just come in. I hope his name will be called and that he will vote.

Mr. MORTON. I ask that the name of the honorable Senator from Louisiana [Mr. SOULE] may be called. He did not respond when the roll was called.

The PRESIDENT. The vote of the Senator is recorded.

Mr. BADGER. I hope the name of the honorable Senator from Michigan will be called.

Mr. CASS. I have just come in and do not know what the question is precisely.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon an amendment to strike out that portion of the bill in relation to the payment of interest.

Mr. CASS. I will vote if it is necessary to make a quorum. I will vote to strike out, in accordance with my uniform principle, that portion providing for the payment of interest.

The name of Mr. CASS was then called by the Secretary, and he voted "Aye."

Mr. SOULE. I wish my name called again.

The PRESIDENT, (to the Secretary.) Call the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. SOULE was then called by the Secretary, and voted "Aye."

The PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from New Hampshire vote?

Mr. NORRIS. I am willing to do so.

The name of Mr. NORRIS was then called, and he voted "Aye."

The vote on the amendment then stood as follows.

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Borland, Bradbury, Brodhead, Cass, Dawson, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Felch, Hunter, King, Mason, Norris, Soule, Stockton, Wade, and Whitcomb—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Badger, Bell, Butler, Fish, Hale, Houston, James, McRae, Mallory, Morton, Rusk, Smith, Spruance, Underwood, and Upham—15.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RUSK. I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. NORRIS. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 30, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the unfinished business of yesterday—

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I rise to a privileged question. I merely make the motion that it may be entered upon the Journal. It is a motion to reconsider the vote by which bill No. 143, to regulate and fix the salary of the American Consul at Amsterdam, was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entered.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business of yesterday, which is the consideration of the motion made by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMART,] to lay on the table the adverse report of the Committee of Claims, on the memorial of the heirs of Daniel Landon, asking remuneration for losses sustained by Indian depredations in the late war with Great Britain.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SMART] to withdraw the motion to lay the report on the table.

Mr. SMART. I will withdraw it.

Mr. DUNHAM. I renew the motion.

Mr. STANTON. The report of the committee recommends that the petitioners have leave to withdraw the papers.

Mr. EDGERTON. I can explain this case so that the committee will understand it.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order during the pendency of a motion to lie on the table.

The question was taken, and the report was laid on the table.

Mr. DANIEL. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I would suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina, to let us have reports called for during the usual hour for reports.

Mr. DANIEL. We can proceed to that business to-morrow.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and take up the special order—the bills providing for the assignability of bounty land warrants.

Mr. DANIEL. I thought the special order was for yesterday.

The SPEAKER. It is from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. DANIEL. I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. HEBARD. What is the special order?

The SPEAKER. A bill from the Senate and a joint resolution of the House in relation to the transfer of bounty land warrants.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. If the gentleman from North Carolina will withdraw his motion, I have no objection to withdraw mine, until the reports of committees are called for during the morning hour.

Mr. DANIEL. As that seems to be the wish of gentlemen around me, I will accordingly withdraw my motion.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILCOX, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to provide for the payment of the companies of Captains Bush, Price, and Suarez, for military services in Florida; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the report accompanying, ordered to be printed.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Dr. S. R. Addison, passed assistant surgeon in the United States Navy; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the report accompanying, ordered to be printed.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to offer the resolution which I send to the desk; and upon it I wish to make a single remark.

The resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be authorized to employ a clerk at the usual compensation.

Mr. S. resumed. I wish to say a single word. I know that these resolutions have not been received with much favor by the House. I will assure the House that this resolution would not have been offered, under the circumstances, by the Naval Committee, if they did not feel it to be absolutely necessary that this favor should be granted by the House. We have about one hundred cases of private memorials before the committee, besides all those important questions which associate themselves with the public interests, as connected with the naval service; and I say it is almost impossible for the committee to perform their duties properly without the assistance of a clerk. Some gentlemen suppose—and I have heard the remark made in private conversation about the House—that these resolutions were offered for the purpose of giving favor to individuals, or giving the pay to some favorite. I assure gentlemen that such is not the object of this resolution; but it is simply for the purpose which it purports to carry out—to enable—

Mr. SWEETSER. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. STANTON,] that he append an amendment to his resolution, and include a clerk for the Post Office Committee. I opposed the resolution of my colleague, [Mr. OLDS,] yesterday, under a misapprehension of the necessity for that clerk. Since voting upon yesterday, I have learned that there is an absolute necessity for a clerk for that committee, and I intend to change my vote in reference to both of these committees. If the gentleman will accept my amendment, I will vote for it.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I presume the gentleman knows that I cannot accept an amendment, as this is a resolution offered under instruction, by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SWEETSER. I will move, therefore, that a clerk for the Post Office Committee be included in that resolution.

Mr. STANTON. If the Speaker considers that germane, I have not the slightest objection.

The SPEAKER. It is a kindred subject.

Mr. STANTON. There is only one further remark I have to make in regard to this matter, and that is this: If any gentleman in this House has any doubt about the necessity of this clerk, to assist the Naval Committee in performing its public duties. I have only to say, that I have to employ other persons to do my own private writing for me, that I may give my attention to public business; and I should think, in performing my duties for the public, it will be hardly unreasonable for me to ask for a clerk for the Naval Committee, when one is indispensable to the public service. I will not ask the previous question, after having made these remarks.

Mr. MASON. I have no disposition to thwart the views of gentlemen upon these committees to obtain aid in performing their appropriate duties. I have no doubt, from what I understand from the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, that he has need sometimes of a clerk. I have no doubt, from the representations of the chairman of the Military Committee, the Naval Committee, and other committees, that they have at times use for a clerk. I have but little doubt that there are a number of clerks in the employment of the House now, paid out of the contingent fund, who have plenty of time, to give the assistance required by all these committees. If you will look at the law allowing clerks, and other officers of the House, as I understand it, you will find that there are eight clerks and three messengers allowed by that law. If you look over the list of those who come to our committee—the Committee on Accounts—for pay every month, you will find that there are forty clerks who come for pay; and the balance, except these eight, are paid out of the contingent fund of the House, as they are clerks whose offices are not created by law. I would suggest that the whole subject be referred to some standing committee of the House, or a select committee, for the purpose of ascertaining what is necessary—legalizing the whole by an act of Congress, and thus to prevent the numerous applications, and the making of clerkships, which are daily made to give places to individuals. I take it for granted they are all useful: but the contingent fund of this House is increasing enormously, not only in the addition of officers of the House, but in other respects. The country will look to those who are in power here to regulate this matter, and to introduce more economy. I do not make any charges against any particular individual, or against officers of this House, in respect to the increase of these clerks. There are a number of clerks here for making land maps. I understand that there are some thirteen or fourteen employed upon that work, by order of the House. There are about as many more upon the index for private claims, making thus some thirty-seven or thirty-eight. All these, by resolution of the House, are paid out of the contingent fund. In addition to these, there are clerks employed by several of the committees, and here are applications for several more. I understand from the clerk, who has had charge of this land map business, now in the Pension Office, (Mr. Wilson,) that these maps are of some utility; but the Commissioner of the General Land Office himself thinks they are of no earthly use. There is a difference of opinion about them. The Commissioner told me this morning that, after the maps were made, it was only necessary to keep one clerk there, for the purpose of marking out the land as it was sold, which shows the whole land belonging to the Government unsold. The clerk blots over that which has been sold with a red pen. I asked Mr. Butterfield when these maps would be finished; and he said when the last quarter section was sold.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. Will my friend allow me to suggest, that the Committee on Naval Affairs would be willing to take one of these clerks?

Mr. MASON. Some think they are useful, and some not. I have not examined the subject to know whether they are useless. I suggest that it would be better to refer the matter to a standing or select committee, to examine into the whole subject, and inquire into the duties and business of these different clerks and apportion their labors justly. There is great complaint that their labors are apportioned unjustly. Some men get $900 a year and work pretty hard, while other men who work only an hour or two in the day, get the same identical pay. Whether those who work hard get too little, or those who do not work at all get too much, is a matter for the committee to inquire into. I move that the whole subject be referred to a select committee, with the express wish that I shall not be put upon it.

Mr. ORR. I hope the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky will be modified, so as to refer this matter to the Committee on Accounts, of which he is chairman. He knows more about it than any other member of this House, and will, I doubt not, be able to give the House more satisfaction than any select committee which can be raised, would do.

Mr. MASON. I hope that modification will not be made.

Mr. ORR. I move to refer the matter to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. TUCK. I hope this resolution will not be referred at all. There are certain things which, in the progress of legislation, it is necessary to submit to the regulation of the committees of this House; and if there is one question which, beyond all others, every committee should be competent to decide for themselves, it is whether they require a clerk.

Now, shall we, when the chairman of such an important committee as that upon Naval Affairs, comes here at the unanimous request of his committee and asks for a clerk, hesitate to give one to them—especially when that request is backed by the statement which has been made that the chairman is compelled to employ a clerk, at his own expense, to attend to his own business, in order to give him the time which it is absolutely necessary for him to bestow upon the duties of his position? This is being "penny wise and pound foolish." It is wasting the valuable time of this House to discuss such trifling matters.

I am surprised, when a request is made for the employment of a clerk, and it is shown that a clerk is needed, that the gentleman from Kentucky should rise and say that there are several clerks in the offices who have nothing to do. What has that to do with this subject? Introduce a resolution to dispense with those supernumerary clerks, and I will vote for it; but that has nothing to do with the question now before us. It is necessary that this committee should have a clerk, and I hope that the House will not refuse to allow them one.

And now, having made these few remarks, I dislike to call for the previous question; but at the request of many gentlemen around me, I demand it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, moved to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The question was then put, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 72, nays 84; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Charles Allen, Willis Allen, John Appleton, Averett, Babcock, Beale, Bragg, Albert G. Brown, George H. Brown, Buell, Chastain, Curtis, Daniel, Dawson, Dockery, Duncan, Dunham, Eastman, Evans, Faulkner, Ficklin, Gorman, Hall, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Haws, Hascall, Haven, Hebard, Hendricks, Holladay, Houston, Thomas Y. How, Hunter, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Preston King, Kuhns, Lecher, Mace, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, McDonald, McMullin, Miller, Millson, Miner, Molony, Nabers, Outlaw, Samuel W. Parker, Peaslee, John Phelps, Russell, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Smith, Stanley, Benjamin Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Strother, Sutherland, George W. Thompson, Venable, Wallace, Watkins, Addison White, Wilcox, and Yates—72.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Andrews, William Appleton, Thos. H. Bayly, Bartlett, Bell, Bibbiana, Bowie, Bowne, Brenton, Briggs, Busby, E. Carrington Cabell, Caldwell, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Caskie, Chandler, Churchill, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Conger, Cottman, Disney, Doty, Durkee, Edgerton, Fitch, Florence, Fowler, Freeman, Henry M. Fuller, Gamble, Gaylord, Giddings, Goodenow, Green, Grey, Grow, Sampson W. Harris, Howard, John W. Howe, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, George G. King, Lockhart, Mann, Mason, McNair, Meade, Henry D. Moore, Morrison, Newton, Olds, Orr, Andrew Parker, Pennington, Powell, Price, Riddle, Robbins, Robinson, Schoolcraft, Schoonmaker, Scudder, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stevens, Stratton, Stuart, Sweetser, Thurston, Townshend, Tuck, Walbridge, Walsh, Welch, and Williams—84.

So the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

The question recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I wish to offer another amendment, if it be in order.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to offer an amendment pending the call for the previous question.

Mr. STANLY. I ask the gentleman from New Hampshire to withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. TUCK. Will you renew it?

Mr. STANLY. I will.

Mr. TUCK. Then I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. COBB, (Mr. Stanley yielding the floor.) The resolution contemplates that two committees shall be allowed one clerk each. Now, I have consulted with the honorable gentlemen who preside over those committees, and I am satisfied that they ask for nothing that they do not really need, and that their object is to economize. They are willing that the resolution shall be so altered as to authorize the employment of one clerk for both committees, and I hope that amendment will be proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. STANLY. I approve of the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Alabama, and I also wish to add a proviso respecting the time for which this clerk shall be employed.

The SPEAKER stated the question to be on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEETSER] to the resolution reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ORR. I desire to inquire of the Chair if the gentleman from Kentucky did not submit a motion to refer the resolution, which will be first in order?

The SPEAKER. That is true. The gentleman from Kentucky submitted a motion to refer the resolution to a select committee, with instructions, and the gentleman from South Carolina moved that it be referred to the Committee on Accounts with the same instructions.

Mr. ORR. The gentleman from Kentucky accepted my amendment.

The CLERK then read the motion as modified; it is as follows:

That the resolution from the Committee on Naval Affairs be referred to the Committee on Accounts, with instructions to inquire into the number of clerks already employed in the service of this House, and whether the number may not be reduced without detriment to the public service; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. STANLY. I have no objection to that motion, and hope the House will agree to it, and then adopt an amendment which I want to offer, and which I suppose would not now be in order. The amendment I wish to see adopted is this: that the Committee on Naval Affairs be authorized to employ a clerk for three or four months, as they may deem expedient and proper.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman before he goes further, that I would be perfectly satisfied with that amendment, and I have no doubt that the other members of the committee would be satisfied with it. All we desire is to be able to get our work done.

Mr. STANLY. I have no objection to allowing any committee of this House a clerk to assist them in preparing their bills; but if we were to allow them one without limiting the time, I know that he would be retained during the whole session, even if we were to sit nine or ten months, as we did at the last long session. There is not a committee of this House that does not stand in need of a clerk, if gentlemen consult their own comfort and ease. The Committees of Claims, on Private Land Claims, on the Judiciary, all need clerks, and the Committee on Commerce are now wanting one and importuning the House to allow them one. We shall have to authorize every committee to employ a clerk if they think it necessary, and then what shall we see? Gentlemen want clerks who have a large mass of private business to attend to, like the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, who says he has been obliged to pay out of his own pocket for a clerk to attend to his private business. There are fifty or sixty gentlemen in the House who are in the same situation. There is not a man in the House who does not have occasionally to employ an assistant. Now, I am against this whole business. If this thing goes on, eight or ten committees will have clerks fastened upon them, and we shall have established the precedent that the committees of this House are hereafter to employ clerks. It is not the Democratic party alone; we are all men of like passions and feelings, and when we get into power we shall want to have clerks also. When a place cannot be found for a favorite elsewhere, it will be easy to make one for him here. These places are expected even now by gentlemen outside of this House. I think it necessary to put a stop to this thing at once. If the committee say that it is necessary for them to have a clerk to enable them to get on with their business, allow them to employ one, but limit the time during which he shall be employed. Do not allow them to employ a clerk in directing documents for them.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, (Mr. STANLY

NEW SERIES....No. 28.

yielding the floor.) As I suppose the gentleman intends to move the previous question, according to his promise, I wish to say a word or two upon this subject now. The resolution declares that these clerks shall be appointed with the usual pay or salary. Now, I do not know what is usual. I want the gentleman who introduced the resolution, to tell the House what he means by it.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I do not know what is usual.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. Four dollars a day.

Mr. MASON. The usual compensation for all these clerks is fifteen hundred dollars; and at the end of every session, we give them two hundred and fifty dollars extra.

Mr. STEPHENS. Then, that is what we are to understand to be the usual compensation. Now, notwithstanding the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, I do not see what these clerks can have to do; and I want the gentleman to tell me again, distinctly, what he wants with a clerk. Does he want to draw up the reports of the committee?

Mr. STANTON. What do the Ways and Means want with a clerk?

Mr. STEPHENS. I put the question distinctly, what functions are these clerks to perform? The gentleman from Tennessee answers my question, by asking what do the Ways and Means want with a clerk? The Ways and Means need a clerk, because of the immense amount of writing in drawing up the usual bills. All our appropriation bills, which make up nearly half our statutes every year, are bills drawn up strictly in pursuance of law, and a clerk can do that business just as well as any member of the committee. There is an immense deal of manual labor to be performed, and the House therefore, very properly, allows that committee to employ a clerk. Now, I ask the gentleman from Tennessee, if he wants a clerk to draw up his bills?

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I think the gentleman from Georgia is entirely mistaken in his description of the work performed by the clerk of the Ways and Means. He is not employed for the purpose of drawing up their bills, but for the purpose of carrying on correspondence with the Departments. Now, there is scarcely a case among one hundred cases before the Committee on Naval Affairs, that does not require some correspondence with the Department.

Mr. STEPHENS. Will the gentleman tell me a single case?

Mr. STANTON. I mention the case that was sent by this House back to the Committee on Naval Affairs, for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of the physician's bill, in the case of Commander Pendergrast. The House seems to have adopted the principle that committees shall not refer matters to the Departments to determine the amount that may be due on the testimony presented to them, but that the committee shall receive the testimony and determine upon it. I have given the gentleman a case.

Mr. STEPHENS. The gentleman refers to a case in which the committee had to correspond with the Department to ascertain the amount of a certain bill said to be due. Well, I say that if the party claiming an amount of money cannot tell the committee, and prove to it, what is due to him, the committee ought to reject the claim. Are we to employ clerks to hunt up proof in order to perfect the evidence of claims against this Government?

Mr. CABELL, (interposing.) Being a member of the Naval Committee, I desire to answer the question of the gentleman, what necessity we have for this clerk. For four years I have been a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, with every desire to inform myself with regard to the interests of the Navy, and we all know the reforms necessary, and the legislation necessary, in order to restore that branch of the public service. But I have found that, notwithstanding this desire, it has been utterly out of my power to give any attention to those public matters connected with the Navy, from the fact that every claim against the Government arising out of any service connected with the Navy, is referred to the committee. These claimants have their agents here, or are here themselves, and are constantly urging upon the members of the committee to examine their particular cases, and it is almost impossible to avoid yielding to these solicitations. For myself, as a member of that committee, I do not act upon these cases until I have the full information from the Department necessary to predicate my report upon. This involves upon me the necessity either of going to the Departments, and from one clerk to another, spending whole days there in getting this information, or else of a very extensive correspondence, and my whole time is thus occupied. We ask to be allowed to employ a clerk, not for the purpose of making out our reports, but for the purpose of obtaining the necessary information.

Mr. STEPHENS. Then, that comes right down to the point which I pressed upon the gentleman from Tennessee. If any persons have claims against this Government, connected with the Navy or Army Departments, let them present their own papers.

Mr. CABELL. They do it.

Mr. STEPHENS. Then is this House to constitute a court of one of its committees to decide upon claims against the Government, and then send a clerk to hunt up additional evidence against the Government? Is that the object of the clerk? If a memorial or claim is referred to the committee, the allegations in which are not sustained by evidence, let the committee report it to this House.

I am altogether opposed to the practice of committees of this House doing their business by proxy. If we grant those clerks, the operation of the system will be this: Large and voluminous papers, submitted to the committees, will not be examined by the members themselves, but the clerks will be directed to sift out the important facts, and the report of the committee will be based upon those facts. You see that by this course of proceeding much mischief will arise when the clerk comes to report the facts. He may not report them truly. He may give them a false coloring. So far as I am concerned, therefore, I am in favor of requiring every committee of this House, when it takes a subject into its hands, to give it a rigid personal examination, so that facts may not be reported to the House which have only been compiled by a clerk.

One other remark. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. McLANAHAN] chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, on yesterday made a report from that committee, of which we ordered the Committee on Printing to take into consideration the proposition to print five thousand extra copies. The object of that report is to call the attention of the country to the enormous increase in the expenses of your courts of justice. He stated that those expenses had now run up to the enormous sum of nearly $900,000. That gentleman moved the printing of those extra copies because the country ought to know what the expenses of your judiciary are. I admit that they are enormous, and I am for cutting them down. But what a view does this House present in this respect! Our contingent expenses, exclusive of the pay of members, alone will be $250,000 this year. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McLANAHAN] says that the expenses of the judiciary have increased more than twelve hundred per cent. within the last few years; and I think he is correct. But I believe the contingent expenses of this House has been increased in a much larger ratio; and I think if we desire to give the country information in relation to the extravagant waste of the public money, that we had better begin at home. And when the proposition comes up to print extra copies of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, I shall move that we also give to the country information of the enormous increase of the expenses of the contingent fund of this House. I thank the gentleman from North Carolina for yielding me the floor.

Mr. HEBARD, (the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] yielding the floor for the purpose, said, I desire, in the first place, to inquire whether the resolution as it now stands, provides for giving a clerk to each of the two committees named in it, or only one for both?

The SPEAKER. The original resolution provides for giving a clerk to the Committee on Naval Affairs. An amendment has been offered to give a clerk also to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HEBARD. I do not pretend to know very much about the interests or the wants of the Committee on Naval Affairs. But during the last Congress I was appointed a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and those who were members of that committee will probably recollect, that during that Congress there was considerable business for that committee to do. The whole subject of postage, and everything connected with the post offices of the country, were overhauled, and we were borne down with the number of petitions and memorials from every portion of the country upon that subject. The chairman of that committee did ask for a clerk. I did not see that there was much use for a clerk for that committee, and was glad when the House refused to give one. Now, if I can make any calculation upon the subject, the amount of business before the Committee of the Post Office and Post Roads for the present session cannot be half what it was for the last session. But whether it is half as much, or twice as much, if it is of the same character as then, there is very little of it which can be properly performed by a clerk. There was very little during the last Congress which I should have been willing to have reported to the House, if it had been prepared by a clerk, without being examined by the members of the committee themselves. There was one single item of labor upon which a clerk could have been profitably employed. It is usual in every session to have one general bill creating new post routes. They are generally made up from petitions and memorials, and are then embodied in one general bill. A clerk can as well do that as the members of the committee themselves. But this will not require more than two or three days, or, at most, a week, near the close of the session. For that time, it would be convenient enough for that committee to have a clerk.

A Voice. One day will do it all.

Mr. HEBARD. The gentleman says one day will do it all. I have no doubt it will; but for the sake of being liberal, I allowed a week; and I am willing that committee shall have a clerk for that time; but I am satisfied, from the experience I had then, that there is a class of men about this city, and hanging about Congress, who are anxious to get provided for. Some of them do get provided for; and I will remark, that sometimes they are provided for meritoriously, and a great many times they are not. I know that it is not very popular to talk about economy, but it does seem to me that we must begin somewhere.

I recollect during the last Congress there was an attempt made to get a clerk for the Supreme Court; not for the purpose of helping to do their general business, but a private clerk to the Judges. But there was at that time a disposition to exercise the principles of economy enough to resist it, and it was not granted.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE. I should like to know—

Mr. STANLY. I am very much gratified at these explanations; but I ask the Chair how much of my hour I have yet left?

The SPEAKER. About fifteen minutes.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I desire that the gentleman from North Carolina will allow me to make one suggestion in regard to this resolution. The question now is, I believe, to instruct the Committee on Accounts to inquire into the necessity of employing a clerk for the Committee on Naval Affairs and the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I would suggest that that committee be authorized to make a general inquiry as to whether any of the standing committees require the services of a clerk. I am very anxious that the Committee on Commerce shall have one given it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that all the standing committees are embraced in the resolution as it now stands.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I understand it as embracing only the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and the Committee on Naval Affairs. I ask that the resolution may be read.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, That the resolution from the Committee on Naval Affairs, with the amendment, be referred to the Committee on Accounts, with instructions to inquire into the number of clerks already employed in the service of the House, and whether the number cannot be reduced without detriment to the public service, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I do not see that the resolution covers any except two committees. I move that the amendment which I have indicated be inserted.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield the floor for that purpose?

Mr. STANLY. I do not care what amendment is offered.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I desire to inquire if the morning hour has not expired?

The SPEAKER. It has expired.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Several MEMBERS. You cannot do that.

The SPEAKER. According to the rules of the House, the Chair is under the impression that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] cannot arrest the business of the House to make that motion. He may move to proceed to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table, however, if he desires.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I will change my motion. I move that the House do now proceed to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. HUNTER. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman cannot take the floor from the gentleman from New York [Mr. SEYMOUR] for the purpose of submitting that motion.

The SPEAKER. By an express rule of the House the gentleman has the right to make the motion.

Mr. HUNTER. But has he the right to take the floor from another member for that purpose?

The SPEAKER. He has the right to arrest the business of the House, and can take the floor from another member.

Mr. MASON. I desire to know if this is not private bill day?

The SPEAKER. It is.

The question was then taken upon the motion to proceed to the business on the Speaker's table, and it was decided in the negative.

The question recurred on the motion to refer, with instructions to the Committee on Accounts the resolution for the appointment of a clerk to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York, moved to add to the instructions the following, viz:

And whether any of the standing committees of the House require the services of a clerk.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] to yield me the floor for a moment. It is not so much for the purpose of opposing the appointment of clerks—for upon that point I believe my opinions are well known. I will say, however, that I have served upon this Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and I never saw the necessity of a clerk while I was a member of that committee. But many of the gentlemen who support this application—

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order. I do not understand that under the rules of the House the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] can keep the floor and yield it to whom he pleases in this manner. I make the point that he has no right to retain the floor and parcel it out as he pleases.

The SPEAKER. According to universal custom he may yield it for the purpose of explanation to whatever gentleman may desire it.

Mr. JONES, (resuming.) It is known that I am opposed to the appointment of clerks to these committees, because I believe they are unnecessary, and not required. I voted for the appointment of a clerk to the Committee of Ways and Means, and being a member of that committee I am frequently met with the inquiry, Is not there a clerk in your committee? There is. And as there is also something said about the duties of that clerk, I will say here, that there is one bill from that committee—the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill—which requires the services of a clerk. When the estimates are first sent to the Committee of Ways and Means, that clerk takes them up and prepares a paper, ruled in parallel columns, and headed with the years 1840, 1841, 1842—and so on with each year to the last appropriation bill—and at the left hand thereof he enters the name of each separate item of expenditure, and opposite each item and under each of the different headings, enters the amount of expenditure for the various years embraced in his list; and also under another heading, enters the amount estimated for the year for which the appropriation is asked, in order that the committee may be able to compare the items of estimates submitted, with the corresponding appropriations in previous years.

The committee take up this bill, go through it and determine upon each item, whether they will allow it, or what corrections they will make in it, and then the clerk takes it and draws up in form the result to which the committee has arrived, and the committee report it to the House. And that is the case with every general appropriation bill that comes before that committee. The civil and diplomatic appropriation, the Army appropriation, the Navy appropriation, the pension appropriation, all these various bills, go through this process by the clerk of that committee. Then, sir, here are hundreds of items in this one solitary bill, the civil and diplomatic bill, and the committee frequently want information upon this item and upon that—they want information as to the amount, or as to the necessity of the appropriation asked for. And this information can only be obtained from the different Departments, and the clerk is charged with the duty, as the organ of the committee, of going to the different Departments and offices, to get the necessary information for the committee to base their action upon. And here I would remark, that there is more labor for a clerk, upon this one, the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, than there was for a clerk to the Post Office Committee during the whole session of the Congress, while I was a member of that committee.

Now the great labor upon the Post Office Committee when I was a member of it, was to prepare the general post route bill. But the chairman of the committee divided out the applications for post routes to the different members of the committee, dividing the whole Union into districts, and assigning to each member certain States, to examine the applications from those States for post routes; and the members severally made out reports for their districts, and the chairman put them all together and made one bill of the whole, and so reported it to the House.

Mr. STANLY. I perceive my time, which has mostly been occupied by others, has nearly expired.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman has informed me that his time is out, and I will not extend my remarks.

Mr. STANLY. I have hardly time to move the previous question. I move the previous question.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I presume that, having reported this resolution, I have the right to make a reply to what has been said.

The SPEAKER. After the previous question is seconded.

The previous question then received a second, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. STANTON. I do not intend to occupy the floor for any length of time.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. Did not the Chair decide, the other day, upon my suggestion, that the chairman who reported a resolution was not entitled to an hour to speak until a motion to refer had been voted down?

The SPEAKER. That was the decision. The gentleman is entitled to an hour when the House comes to a direct vote upon the proposition submitted, but he thinks that he has no such right upon the question of reference.

Mr. STANTON. I do not intend to detain the House long, if I have an opportunity to speak.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SEYMOUR;] which amendment was, "and also whether any of the standing committees of this House require the services of a clerk?" and it was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Is it now in order to move to lay the whole subject upon the table?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. STEPHENS. Then I make that motion.

Mr. STANTON. I insist that upon that motion I have a right to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman has no such right.

Mr. STEPHENS. I withdraw my motion to lay upon the table. I have no objection to let this subject go to the Committee on Accounts for investigation.

The question was then taken upon the motion to refer the resolution, with the instructions, to the Committee on Accounts; and it was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was referred to the Committee on Accounts, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DANIEL. I move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I renew my motion, that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union upon the special orders.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Illinois. I rise to a privileged motion. I move that when this House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next at twelve o'clock.

[Cries of "That's right!" "That's right!"]

Mr. GOODENOW demanded the yeas and nays upon the motion; which were not ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was agreed to.

Mr. FLORENCE. I suppose reports from the Committee on Naval Affairs are still in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DANIEL] moves, that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina, the chairman of the Committee of Claims, in reference to his motion, that the members of the House have not been provided this morning with the usual calendar of business.

VOICES. "Yes they have." "Here they are."

Mr. SEYMOUR. They have been laid upon the tables of some of the members, but not of a great majority; and I have been informed that the supply furnished by the printer has been distributed, but there is not enough for more than one third of the members. I hope the gentleman will, under the circumstances, withdraw his motion, and let us go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen will recollect that the proposition is not debatable.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I only want to say to the gentleman from New York, that here is the Calendar, and I was wonderfully struck with the superior paper upon which it has been printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must arrest this conversation. It is out of order.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. What is the order of business if the rules are not suspended?

The SPEAKER. The call for reports from committees will be continued until finished.

Mr. CABELL. If it is in order, I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee of Claims [Mr. DANIEL] to the—

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be compelled to arrest this conversation.

The question was then taken upon the motion of Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole upon the special orders; and it was disagreed to.

The question recurring upon the motion of Mr. DANIEL, that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole upon the Private Calendar, it was put and disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. Reports are still in order from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. FLORENCE, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of A. Saunders, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GOODENOW, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time by their titles, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the reports accompanying, ordered to be printed, viz:

A bill for the relief of Jacob J. Storer; and

A bill for the relief of James A. Fawns.

Mr. G. also from the same committee, reported a bill to modify the pay of certain warrant officers of the Navy; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the report accompanying, ordered to be printed.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Monmouth B. Hart, Joel Kelly, and William Close, securities of the late Benjamin F. Hart, a purser in the United States Navy; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of John H. Wesche, of the firm of Wesche & Co., of Puebla, Mexico, praying indemnity for losses sustained by said firm in consequence of the annulling of a contract made with the agent of the United States, for supplying the army with certain articles; and it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion by Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of Samuel Adams, and others, citizens of Castine, in Maine, praying Congress to take measures to have international disputes settled by umpirage rather than by any appeal to the sword, and that nations will war no more; and that the memorial do lie on the table.

On motion by Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of C. W. Jay, and others, asking Congress to pass a law fixing the residences of foreign ministers of the Despotic Governments at least one hundred miles from the seat of Government; and that the memorial do lie on the table.

On motion by Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying that a law may be passed to prevent the immigration of foreign convicts, felons, and paupers, into the United States; and that said petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion by Mr. SCUDDER, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Territories be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the Legislative Assembly of New Mexico, praying for appropriations for the completing of a road from Santa Fé to Taos, and that it be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. STUART, from the same committee, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the third week in April next be set apart for the consideration of territorial business, and that during that week such business shall take precedence over other business, and be regarded as the special order.

Mr. STUART. I was told by the chairman of the committee, who was expected to make this report, that such was the arrangement at the last Congress, that certain days were set apart for that purpose.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I rise to a question of order. The House never instructed this committee to take into consideration the time at which territorial business should be taken up, and hence they can submit no report upon the subject. They can report only upon matters committed to them. It is not competent for a committee to ask the suspension of the rules for the purpose of introducing a resolution, except on Monday of each week.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain a motion to suspend the rules of the House, at any time, except on Monday of every week. The Chair overrules the point of order of the gentleman from Georgia in this, that he thinks it competent for the committee to consider and report upon the time proper to take up territorial business; but the committee has no more right than an individual member of the House to submit a resolution to make a special order, which would, if objected to, require a suspension of the rules—motions for which purpose being in order only on Mondays.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Has not this been the uniform practice of the House?

The SPEAKER. It has been customary to set apart days for the consideration of territorial business, but not in the manner proposed.

Mr. HALL. It can be done only by the suspension of the rules, which motion is not in order to-day.

Mr. STUART. I will withdraw the motion, intending to submit it on Monday, as I do not wish to consume the time of the House upon points of order.

Mr. GIDDINGS, from the Committee on Territories, reported "A bill authorizing the Governor of the Territory of New Mexico to call an extra session of the Legislative Assembly of the said Territory, if the same be deemed necessary and expedient;" which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the report accompanying, ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. MILLSON, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of the heirs of Daniel Starr, asking seven years half pay for his services as a lieutenant in the Navy; and it was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion by Mr. MILLSON, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Rachel Moorey, of Clinton county, New York, praying for a pension on account of the services of her late husband, and that it do lie on the table.

Mr. MILLSON, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, made adverse reports in the following cases; which were severally ordered to lie on the table and be printed, viz:

The petition of James S. Mitchell, praying for an allowance under the bounty land law of 1850; and

The petition of the heirs of certain revolutionary soldiers residing in Chenango county, New York, asking for grants of bounty land.

Mr. TUCK, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, made an adverse report on the petition of John King, of New York, praying arrears of pensions from 1818 to 1824, at the rate of $8 per month; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of Isaac Cobb; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. TOWNSHEND, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of William K. Blair for additional compensation for services rendered in the State of Tennessee, from 1836 to 1847; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BOCK, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of David Myerly; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the report accompanying, ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDGERTON. With the consent of the House I will make a report from the Committee of Claims, being absent from the Hall when that committee was called.

Mr. MARTIN. I object.

Mr. ALLEN, of Illinois, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, made an adverse report on the petition of David Berry and others, and the resolution of the State of Ohio in favor of a pension for Henry Johnson; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time by their titles, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed, together with the accompanying reports, viz:

A bill for the relief of Catharine Clark;

A bill for the relief of Jacob Shade; and

A bill for the relief of Thomas P. Dudley.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, said he had been instructed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to ask that said committee be discharged from the further consideration of the following petitions, and that they be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, viz:

The petition of John Duncan for an invalid pension in consequence of a disability received in the naval service of the United States;

The petition of Mary Woodward, of Connecticut, the widow of Lieutenant Woodward, who lost his life in the service of the United States, asking for a pension; and

The petition of Lot Davis for a pension in consideration of a disability incurred in the United States service in the war with Great Britain.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. I ask respectfully what is the purport of all these applications from which the Naval Committee asked to be discharged? They all ask, I believe, pensions for naval service.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. They are memorials for the allowance of pensions for injuries sustained in the naval service of the country. The examination I have given the subject has convinced me, that heretofore that class of cases has been considered and reported upon by the Committee on Naval Affairs. The committee of which I am a member, instructed me to ask that these cases be referred to that committee.

Mr. CABELL. The Committee on Naval Affairs have unanimously passed a resolution, that they will report back cases of this kind to the House, with a recommendation that they be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. It is no argument, as a reason for the reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs, that the pension arose from services connected with the Navy—no more than that pensions growing out of military operations should be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. As a member of the Naval Committee, I shall object to the reference.

Mr. HARRIS. I will state, as a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, that these cases belong to the Naval Committee. The committee are willing to discharge the duty, but after an examination of that class of cases, and from the precedents heretofore established, the committee think that they appropriately belong to the other committee. I desire to get the sense of the House as to which is the appropriate committee for the consideration of that class of cases.

Mr. CABELL. I will merely state, that the chief ground upon which the Committee on Naval Affairs applied for a clerk was, that their time was very much engaged with private claims. Here is a committee appointed specially for the consideration of these particular cases, and I beg the House will refer these memorials to the appropriate committee, and not refer them to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I concur with the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CABELL] in regard to the disposition which ought to be made of these memorials. If I understand them correctly, they concern pensions, and, therefore, ought to go to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I stated this morning, and it is very proper to say it here, that the Committee on Naval Affairs have more of these cases than it is possible for them to attend to. So far as I am individually concerned, I do not care a farthing whether the House give a clerk to that committee or not. I do not ask a clerk for them, upon my own account. I believe no one will charge me with neglect of duty, as head of that committee, so far as I have capacity to do it. No one will charge me with want of industry, at least as much industry as ought to be applied to public business under these circumstances. I say to the House, that it is impossible for us to do the business of that committee, as things now are. I shall, however, do as much as I can, and the balance I shall leave undone. I think it is wholly unnecessary to send this memorial to the Committee on Naval Affairs, when another committee can more appropriately dispose of it. I say further, that, if it goes there, it cannot probably receive the attention of the committee.

Mr. HALL. I move that these memorials be recommended to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. BOCK. The question raised by the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions is, whether these subjects come legitimately before the Committee on Invalid Pensions, or the Committee on Naval Affairs. I believe the practice of this House has been both ways. Very many of these petitions have been referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; and many of them, also, have been referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The appropriate duties of these committees, it seems to me, can be ascertained by referring to the rules establishing the committees, and defining their duties. Now, upon reference to the rules in relation to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I find "that it shall be the duty of the Committee on Invalid Pensions to take into consideration, all such matters respecting invalid pensions as shall be referred to them by the House."

The rule does not say, invalid pensions arising from service in the military establishments of the country, but it says, "all such matters respecting invalid pensions as shall be referred to them by the House."

When I refer to the other rule defining the duties of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I find it provides that "it shall be the duty of the Committee on Naval Affairs to take into consideration all matters which concern the naval establishment, and which shall be referred to them by the House, and to report their opinion thereupon; and also to report, from time to time, such measures as may contribute to economy and accountability in the said establishment."

It seems to me perfectly clear, under this definition of the duties of the Committee on Naval Affairs, that those petitions relating to invalid pensions do not go before the committee on Naval Affairs, but to the committee on Invalid Pensions, according to the express terms of the rule defining the duties of that committee.

Mr. KUHNS demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, which was upon recommending the memorials to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The question was then taken, and it was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made an adverse report on the petition of Mary Perrigo, of New York, for arrears of pensions due to her late husband; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HAVEN. I desire to inquire if there is a report accompanying the paper? If so, I ask that it be printed. I think the rule should be adopted in all cases to print adverse reports.

Mr. HARRIS moved that the report lie upon the table and be printed.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made an adverse report on the memorial of Nathaniel A. Willis, praying for arrearages of pensions from 1839 to 1850; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. EASTMAN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time by their titles, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the reports accompanying, ordered to be printed, viz:

A bill for the relief of the late George Cassady; A bill for the relief of John Haven; and A bill for the relief of William Dwellys.

Mr. EASTMAN, from the same committee, made adverse reports in the following cases, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed, viz:

The petition of Fielding G. Brown, asking for an invalid pension for injuries in the service of the United States; and

The petition of John O. Hodge, of Cleveland, Ohio, now receiving a pension for disability, asking for an increase of pension.

Mr. CLINGMAN entered a motion for the reconsideration of the case of Fielding G. Brown.

On motion by Mr. EASTMAN, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Robert Gibson for a pension, as an invalid in the war of 1812; and it was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MARTIN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time by their titles, referred to a Committee of the Whole, and made the order of the day for to-morrow, and with the reports accompanying, ordered to be printed, viz:

A bill for the relief of Anthony Walter Bayard; and

A bill for the relief of David Murphy, of Ohio.

Mr. MARTIN, from the same committee, made adverse reports in the following cases; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed, viz:

The petition of Clemens Eaton, for arrears of pension;

The petition of Henry and Robert Blow, of Tennessee, for arrears of pension for services in the war with Great Britain in 1812;

The petition of Daniel Hager, jr., of Schoharie county, New York, for arrears of pension;

The petition of John Davenport, of Missouri, for arrearages of pension from 1824 to 1844;

The petition of the heirs of Robert H. Dysen, of Tennessee, on account of services during the war with Great Britain, and the more recent wars with the Indians;

The petition of Hall Hutson, for a pension on account of disability in the war of 1812; and

The petition of Brooksey Bell, of Washington county, Tennessee, asking for an increase of pension to $8 per month.

The petition of Lucy Morrison, of Kentucky, the widow of Archibald Morrison, for a pension on account of the death of her husband from disease contracted in the service of the United States;

The petition of David Troxell, of Tennessee, asking for an invalid pension; and

The petition of Thomas Russell, a disabled mechanic, of the National Armory at Harper's Ferry, asking to be placed on the pension roll.

Mr. MARTIN said the latter was a case of great hardship, but could not be admitted without forming a new class of cases.

Mr. KUHNS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time by their titles, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the reports accompanying, ordered to be printed, viz:

A bill for the relief of Elizabeth E. V. Fields, the widow of Captain G. P. Fields, of the United States Army;

A bill for the relief of Henry Miller, a soldier in the war of 1812; and

A bill for the relief William Lynch, a soldier in the late war with Great Britain.

Mr. KUHNS, from the same committee, made an adverse report in the case of Moses Olmstead, of New York, for a pension; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Ohio, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made an adverse report on the petition of David Montgomery, for arrears of his invalid pension for disability incurred in the war of 1812; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

On motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of Ohio,

Ordered, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Sam Sick, of Bedford, Pennsylvania, asking for a pension for services rendered by his father in the revolutionary war, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. PRICE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time by their titles, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed, together with the accompanying reports, viz:

A bill for the relief of Jonas D. Platt, of New York; and

A bill for an increase of pension to Henry Click, of Cocke county, Tennessee.

Mr. JONES, of New York, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time by their titles, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the reports accompanying, ordered to be printed, viz:

A bill for the relief of Charles Staple; and

A bill for the relief of Aaron Stafford, a soldier of the late war with Great Britain.

Mr. JONES, of New York, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back Senate bill for the relief of Margaret L. Worth, widow of the late General Worth, of the United States Army, without amendment, and moved its reference to a Committee of the Whole House, that it be made the order of the day for to-morrow, and be printed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Tennessee. I ask the gentleman from New York to withdraw his motion for a moment, to enable me to offer an amendment to that bill to go with it to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. JONES, withdrew his motion.

Mr. HARRIS then moved to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is, hereby directed to place the name of Mrs. Margaret L. Worth, widow of the late General Worth, upon the pension roll at the rate of thirty dollars per month, to commence on the — day of —, and to continue for five years: Provided, That in case of the death or marriage of the said Mrs. Margaret L. Worth before the expiration of the said five years, the pension, for the remainder of the time, shall be paid to the children of the said General Worth, if there be any under the age of sixteen years, and if there be no children under the age of sixteen years, said pension shall cease.

On motion by Mr. JONES, of New York, the bill, with the amendment thereto, was then referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of New York, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made adverse reports on the following cases; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed, viz:

The petition of Moses Cremer, for arrearages of invalid pension, on account of disability incurred in the military service of the United States;

The petition of Samuel Smith, of Maine, for arrearages of pension;

The petition of John Pearl, of Maine, for arrearages of pension;

The petition of Peter Frost, for arrearages of pension;

The petition of Abraham Pettingill, for an invalid pension;

The petition of Joshua Lewis, a disabled mechanic in the armory at Harper's Ferry;

The petition of John Harrington, for a back pension;

The petition of Shebal Adams, for a pension on account of disability from exposure in the service of the United States;

The petition of Cornelius Zielie, for a back pension;

The petition of Lewis Robert, for a pension on account of disability incurred in the war of 1812; and

The petition of John English, for a pension for a disability incurred in the service of the United States in the late war with Great Britain.

Mr. MOLONY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time by their titles, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed, together with the accompanying reports, viz:

A bill for the relief of B. B. Bennett; and

A bill for the relief of Maurice Simons.

Mr. MOLONY asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill, of which previous notice had been given.

Mr. SACKETT objected.

Mr. MOLONY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made adverse reports in the following cases; which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed, viz:

The petition of Catharine Clark, the administratrix of Joseph Clark, for a pension;

The petition of Robert Trevitt, for arrearages of pension; and

The petition of Aaron Adams, of Grant county, Kentucky, asking for the increase of his invalid pension.

Mr. MOLONY moved that the Committee on Invalid Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Asa Leach, for a pension on account of wounds received in the naval service, and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CABELL moved that the petition be re-committed to the Committee on Invalid Pensions; which motion was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. MOLONY, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Phoebe Thompson, the widow of John Thompson, for a pension, and that it do lie on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported a bill to set apart and sell to Asa Whitney, of New York, a portion of the public lands to enable him to construct a railroad from Lake Michigan or the Mississippi river to the Pacific ocean; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. R. moved to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it be printed.

Mr. DUNHAM moved to refer it to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HALL. I hope that this bill will not be referred to the Committee on Public Lands. It has been considered thoroughly by one of the committees of this House, which is certainly as competent to consider it as is the Committee on Public Lands, and the result of their labors is before the House. I can see no reason why it should be referred to the Committee on Public Lands. That committee has already as much business as it can attend to.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Did not the bill come from the Committee on Roads and Canals?

Mr. ROBINSON. It did; and that committee have had it before them ever since it has been in Congress.

The question was first taken upon Mr. ROBINSON's motion, and the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the same committee, reported back a bill for the improvement of Rock Island and De Moines Rapids in the Mississippi river, with an amendment; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. R. also, from the same committee, reported the following bills; which were read severally a first and second time by their titles, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed, viz:

A bill for the construction of military roads in the Territory of Oregon;

A bill for the improvement of the navigation of the Arkansas river;

A bill for the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio river, between Pittsburg and the falls at Louisville;

A bill for the improvement of the navigation of the Ohio river below the falls at Louisville, and of the Mississippi river; and

A bill for the improvement of the navigation of the Missouri river.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported back, without amendment, House bill No. 68, being a bill to provide for the survey of sites for certain artificial reservoirs to be constructed at the main affluence of the Ohio river, in accordance with the plans heretofore submitted by Charles Ellet, jr., and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported back, with an amendment, House bill to provide for the construction of a ship canal around the falls of the Ste. Marie river, at the mouth of Lake Superior; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Public Buildings, made an adverse report on the memorial of certain laborers on the public buildings, asking for an increase of wages; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. S., from the same committee, reported a bill to authorize the Secretary of War to purchase of Mr. William H. Winder, the building now in the occupancy of the Government, situated on the corner of Seventeenth and F streets, in the city of Washington; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. THURSTON, from the Committee on Patents, reported a bill for the relief of Hiram Moore and John Hascal, for the renewal of a patent on a reaping and thrashing machine; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. T. moved to put the bill on its passage.

[Cries of "Read the bill!"]

The bill was then read through by the Clerk.

Mr. THURSTON. That is an important invention. The patent expired in 1850, and is of no benefit to the inventor at all. He can only use it himself. He has expended about $30,000 in perfecting the machine. I hope it will be the pleasure of the House to pass the bill.

Mr. SACKETT. I move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it be printed.

Mr. CARTTER. Do I understand the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. THURSTON], to move to put that bill on its passage?

Mr. THURSTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARTTER. I desire to make a few remarks with reference to the propriety of passing this bill now, if the committee will listen to me. I wish to say to the House, in the first place, that this bill—

Mr. DUNHAM. I rise to a question of order. I ask whether the vote has not been taken on referring this bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It has not been taken.

Mr. CARTTER. I do not wish to detain the House five minutes. The bill proposes to renew the patent rights of Hascal & Moore, in their harvesting machine—not a common thrasher, or separator, or a reaper, but a combination of the whole, and in conflict with none of them—a machine that has just been perfected under fourteen years of labor, and from which the inventors have never drawn a farthing. It is a machine that cannot come in conflict with any existing machine. It is one that augments the agricultural facilities, for reaping, cleaning, and gathering grain. The inventors have been made poor in the process of perfecting their invention, which process has covered the entire period for which the patent was granted; and if it is to be of any service to them, the patent ought to be granted to them now, for they have not the ability to wait upon the legislation of this House, and resort to the ordinary appliances made use of for that purpose. This is a brief history of that matter. It is a machine that can only be perfected upon the prairies of the United States. It is not adapted to the smaller farming operations of the East, or to the woody portions of the United States. I regard it as an act of naked justice to the genius, labor, and perseverance of those gentlemen, that the grant should be made, for they have never yet derived a dollar from it. There are but two perfect machines that have ever been built, and those machines have cost them fourteen years of trial and labor, and all the money they and their friends could procure, to the amount of $20,000 or $30,000. I hope the House will pass it as an act of justice.

Mr. SACKETT. I am entirely unacquainted with the character of this case. I only know it is an application for a renewal of a patent. But I suppose there has been no renewal under the general law, authorizing renewals by the Commissioner of Patents; but I know such a case is one, in my judgment, which should not be passed without the deliberation of this House. It is asking quite too much, for the Committee on Patents to come into this House and say that it is a case which comes in conflict with no other patent that is now in existence. Sir, that is covering quite too much ground. That is a question which may belong to a court, which may belong to the consideration of many other patentees, interested in this question.

Whether the case is one that ought to pass at all or not, is not now a proper subject of consideration. It is, to say the least, one of a class of cases which demand the attention of this House, and should not be acted upon precipitately. I therefore renew the motion to refer it to the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. STUART. I feel confident, sir, that if the gentleman from New York [Mr. SACKETT] was aware of all the facts in regard to this bill, he would not press his motion to refer it to the Committee of the Whole House.

In addition to what has been said by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Patents, [Mr. CARTTER,] I will state, that a similar bill for the relief of these inventors passed this House at the last Congress, was referred to the Committee on Patents of the Senate, and by it reported back favorably, but was lost in the Senate for want of time to reach it. This bill has now been unanimously reported to this House by the present committee, and they unanimously ask that it shall be put upon its passage, that it may not be again lost for want of time. As the honorable member who reported this bill [Mr. THURSTON] has said, this machine can be used only during the harvesting season, about one month in each year. So that the whole use of it under the original patent has been only fourteen months.

Most inventions can be used every day and can be tried and tested in secret, while every experiment with this one must be made openly and before the whole community.

I reside, Mr. Speaker, in the same county with these inventors, and their invention has been perfected under my own eye. They have expended the whole lifetime of the former patent and more than thirty thousand dollars in perfecting their machine, and have not derived one dollar of profit from their invention.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE. I desire to ask if the patent has ever been renewed under the existing patent laws?

Mr. STUART. No, sir.

Mr. SACKETT. The gentleman does not understand the question. They have had a renewal by the Commissioner for seven years.

Mr. STUART. No, sir. The gentleman from New York is entirely mistaken. It has not been renewed at all.

Mr. DUNHAM. Then I have only to say, they have no business here. They must go to the Patent Office.

Mr. STUART. The gentleman from Indiana is equally mistaken. Their former patent has expired, and Congress alone possesses the power to extend it. They applied here in time, but their bill of the last session was lost, as I have stated.

Mr. Speaker, I know all about this question; and I do not hesitate to say, unqualifiedly, that a more meritorious application cannot be presented to the consideration of Congress, nor one, the granting of which, would be more beneficial to the agricultural community. The passage of this bill cannot interfere with the rights of any other persons. The bill simply proposes to give to these inventors what they have invented, and they are required by it to establish their inventions by proof before the Commissioner of Patents, who will embrace in their specifications such inventions only as they can so establish. And certainly all that they have invented, they are entitled to, upon every principle of justice. All that this bill proposes, is to do them justice; and I am not willing further to detain the House, or hazard the success of the bill by talking about it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. As I am not opposed to the renewal of the patent, if it is proper to do so, and wishing some time to look into and consider it, I would move that the House do now adjourn, and then this question will come up when we next call for reports of committees. I only suggest such a motion.

Mr. STUART. I am so satisfied that this thing is right, and it having received the indorsement of the Committees of both Houses, I move the previous question.

Mr. DUNHAM. I ask for the reading of the bill. It gives fourteen years' extension—

Mr. ORR. I rise to a privileged motion. I move the House adjourn.

Mr. ROBBINS. I hope not; there is so much business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. ORR. I demand tellers.

Mr. POLK demanded the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

Tellers were then ordered, and Messrs. ORR and MEACHAM appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 54, nays 73.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. HAVEN. Before the vote is taken, I desire to learn from the chairman of the Committee on Patents, [Mr. CARTTER,] whether there was any evidence before that committee in reference to the assignment by these patentees of their right?

Mr. CARTTER. I recollect of none. I will state to the gentleman from New York—

The SPEAKER. This conversation is not in order, and can only be allowed by unanimous consent.

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTTER. The machine has never been perfected so as to make it the subject of merchandise during the whole life of the patent.

Mr. HAVEN. If there be such assignments, cautious legislation is demanded at our hands.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would suggest the propriety of clearing the Speaker's table.

A VOICE. It will take a whole day.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If the Speaker asks for the unanimous consent for that purpose before my motion is put, I will readily agree to it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

The question was then taken upon the adjournment, and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 72, noes 58.

So the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 2, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. L. F. MORGAN.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tem. laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, accompanied by the annual reports of the Surveyors General of Illinois, Missouri, and Oregon Territory, which were not received in time to accompany the last annual report; which was read and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PETITIONS.

Mr. BERRIEN presented the memorial of Catharine Proctor Hayden, daughter and heir to Colonel John White, deceased, praying the reimbursement of advances made by her late father, and payment of the seven years half pay due for his military services in the revolutionary war; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. MILLER. I desire, Mr. President, to present the memorial of silk manufacturers, dyers, and other persons interested in the silk trade of the United States, praying that Congress may repeal that part of the tariff law of 1846 which imposes fifteen per cent. duty upon raw silk. As the facts and considerations stated in the petition are important with regard to the interests of the parties represented, and as it expresses so clearly the distinctions and unjust operation of the tariff of 1846 in reference to its not making a proper discrimination between the raw material and the manufactured article, I hope the memorial will be read.

The memorial was accordingly read, and referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of Martha L. Downs, widow of Lieutenant Downs, commander of the United States schooner Grampus at the time she was lost, praying that the same allowance of pay may be made to the widows and orphans of persons belonging to that vessel, as has been made in similar cases; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BADGER presented the memorial of J. H. Williams, the memorials of E. D. Austin, D. Hurdle, William H. Hood, Carlton Hall, James M. Waddill, N. McCrummer, W. H. Marshall, T. H. Tomlinson, John B. Golet, Brian Hellen, M. D. King, and John A. Selby, assistant marshals for taking the Seventh Census in North Carolina, praying additional compensation; which were referred to the Committee of Claims.

NEW JERSEY ON NON-INTERVENTION.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, I hold in my hands a series of resolutions passed by the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, and by their authority transmitted to me. I ask that they may be read and printed.

The CLERK read the resolutions, as follows:

Joint Resolutions in relation to Governor Kossuth and the doctrine of national non-intervention.

Whereas Louis Kossuth, Governor of Hungary, exiled from his country because he made a gallant but unsuccessful struggle for his country's rights, has come to the United States, an invited guest of the nation—

1. Be it resolved by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey, That Louis Kossuth be invited to visit this Legislature at its present session, that we may extend to him the hospitality of the State and assure him of our sympathy.

2. Be it resolved, That in Louis Kossuth we recognize a true patriot, and the able and eloquent expounder of constitutional rights and liberties; that we sympathize with him and his countrymen in the calamities which have befallen their fatherland; that we deeply deplore that the recent glorious struggle for the freedom of Hungary was rendered unsuccessful by the treason of their general, and the armed intervention of Russia, contrary to the principles of justice and international law; and that we trust, by the blessing of Divine Providence, that all his future efforts in the cause of his country may be crowned with success, and that the people of Hungary, now dispersed or down-trodden, may be restored to freedom and happiness, under the protecting care of a constitutional government erected by themselves.

3. And be it resolved, That every nation has a right to alter, modify, abolish, or adopt its own form of government, and regulate its own internal affairs, and that an armed intervention of any other nation to control or destroy this right is an infraction of international law.

4. And be it resolved, That the supremacy of the non-intervention law, acknowledged by all nations, would tend to maintain national rights, prevent national wars, and give a lasting peace to the world.

5. And be it resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to obtain the passage of a resolution by Congress, instructing the representatives of the United States to the Governments of Europe to urge upon those Governments a declaration that the forcible intervention of one nation to regulate the internal affairs, or to alter, modify, abolish, or prescribe the form of government of another nation, is an infraction of the law of nations.

6. And be it resolved, That the Governor be requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions to the President of the United States, to Louis Kossuth, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. STOCKTON. Mr. President, no one need doubt my regard for the old Democratic principle, that the representative is bound by the will of his constituents. No one need doubt the profound respect which any expression of opinion by the Legislature of New Jersey will command from me. I know no higher honor than faithfully to represent my native State. I can enjoy no higher satisfaction than to feel that I merit her approval. My ambition in the discharge of my duties here, is to promote her interests. In doing that, I know that I shall promote the welfare of our whole country.

Sir, I execrate the oppressors of poor Hungary, and cordially sympathize with the Legislature and people of New Jersey in her sufferings. I am as desirous for her independence and the extension of human liberty as any of my fellow-citizens. Nevertheless, I am constrained to say, that while I agree to every sentiment of freedom and love of liberty contained in the resolutions which you have just heard read, I do not entirely concur in the principles of public law by which the object they have in view is sought to be obtained. I will, therefore, with the Senate's leave, proceed to state, in a few brief remarks, the grounds of my opinion—what, in my judgment, are the responsibilities of this Government, and the course we ought to take in regard to our foreign relations. The course suggested by the resolutions is not precisely the one preferred by me. They do not avow the principles which this Government ought to assert and maintain—which the United States always has asserted, and which I hope she will continue to assert as long as there is a single despotic Government existing whose people rise to demand the blessings of liberty.

Sir, when we cast our eyes over the world—everywhere—with the exception of America—we see the surface of the whole earth appropriated by absolute monarchs. The only country which enjoys republican Government, and whose people adequately appreciate free institutions, is the United States. Those free institutions comprehend all that survives of free principles and political liberty. In them is concentrated all that is valuable of what man has ever achieved in qualifying himself for self-government.

The Mosaic Republic—Rome and her Empire—the transitory Commonwealths of Italy and Germany, which heralded the revival of learning—all stand as beacon-lights to warn and instruct us. All that is of value in the institutions of the Great Alfred or modern Britain is ours—improved, perfected, and divested of every element which can interfere with, or enfeeble the sovereignty of the people. We are, in truth, the residuary legatees of all that the blood and treasure of mankind expended for four thousand years have accomplished in the cause of human freedom. In our hands alone is the precious deposit. Before God and the world, we are responsible for this legacy. Not for our own benefit only, but for the benefit and happiness of the whole family of man. What course, then, shall this Government take to perpetuate our liberties and to diffuse our free institutions over the world?

1st. We must guard our constitutional grant of delegated power from infraction. We must abide within the limits prescribed by the States to the General Government. We must discreetly exercise the powers actually granted, and abstain from the exercise of all powers not granted.

2d. We must so direct the foreign affairs of this Government, that the progress of liberty shall be promoted and not retarded. This progress may not be promoted by war except under peculiar circumstances. Peace, as I said upon a former occasion, is the true policy of this Republic. "Peace is the animating genius of our institutions;" and, indeed, ought to be of those of all nations.

But the whole world, wherever you look, with the exception of a portion of this continent, being under monarchical governments, I desire to know how the oppressed and fettered nations of the earth are to break their chains, and maintain themselves against the armies of despotism, if the law of nations reads that there shall be no intervention in their behalf?

I cannot give my consent to any proclamation of principles, which may be construed to abridge the right and sacred duty which belongs to this Government, to do whatever it may choose to do in aid of any people who are striving to throw off the yoke of despotism.

But, Mr. President, there are, in my judgment, two extremes, which should be avoided in the conduct of our foreign relations. 1st. We should not recklessly interfere with the affairs of foreign nations. We should count the cost, weigh well the duty and necessity, and be sure that our objects are practicable and attainable, consistent with the principles of our Government and promotive of human liberty and happiness. Washington, and the master spirits of that age of great men, knew well, that in the infancy of this Government, we were not able to cope with the European belligerents who had given us such just cause of offence. But he foresaw the period when this Republic would be able, not only to protect itself, but to stand forth as one of the greatest Powers of the earth. He foresaw, likewise, that our mission was not compatible with any entangling alliances with other nations. He therefore admonished us to avoid all such connection. Notwithstanding, sir, the able and ingenious manner in which the invitation has been given, that we should entangle ourselves in a coalition with Great Britain to dictate this new law of non-intervention to all nations, I am, so far as it respects this overture, for abiding by the advice of Washington—I want no entangling alliances.

2d. The other extreme which we should avoid, and into which so many are desirous that we should rush headlong, without a glance to the future, is, that forgetting all our obligations and duties to the cause of humanity, and to the principles of universal freedom, we should, from unworthy fears or false conservatism, hastily decide that we have no concern in the condition of the world beyond our own boundaries; and precipitately resolve, that in no event and under no circumstances shall we interfere in behalf of oppressed nations.

I cannot consent to yield and abandon this natural right, which all nations from time immemorial have exercised. Sir, I say that intervention, not for the purpose of helping an odious tyrant to put down liberty—because that is against the laws of God and man—but in behalf of "an oppressed people who implore assistance," is not only in conformity with the universal practice of nations, but it is sustained and inculcated by the best authorities on public law.

Vattel says:

"But if the prince attacking the fundamental laws, gives his subjects a legal right to resist him—if tyranny becoming insupportable, obliges the nation to rise in their defence, every foreign power has a right to succor an oppressed people who implore their assistance."

Again, the same author says:

"For when a people from good reasons take up arms against an oppressor, justice and generosity require that brave men should be assisted in defence of their liberties. Whenever, therefore, a civil war is kindled in a State, foreign powers may assist that party which appears to them to have justice on its side. He who assists an odious tyrant—he who declares for an unjust and rebellious people, offends against his duty."

So much for the law; now as to the practice.

Mr. Wheaton says, in his history of the "Modern Law of Nations":

"The first war of the French Revolution originated in the application, by the allied Powers, of the principle of armed intervention to the internal affairs of France, for the purpose of checking the progress of her revolutionary principles and the extension of her military power. That this was the avowed motive of the Powers allied in the Continental war of 1792 will be apparent from the examination of historical documents."

He says again:

"That the measures adopted by Austria, Russia, and Prussia, at the Congress of Troppau and of Laybach, in respect to the Neapolitan revolution of 1820, were founded on principles adapted to give the great Powers of the European continent a perpetual pretext for interfering in the internal concerns of its different States."

Mr. Wheaton, speaking of that period of time between the peace of Westphalia (1648) and that of Utrecht, of 1713, says:

"Whatever disputes might arise as to [its] [intervention] application, the principle itself was acknowledged on all hands."

Sir, I well know that the opponents of intervention are in the habit of relying on isolated passages from writers on the law of nations in support of this doctrine. But it will be found, on a thorough examination of those writers, that all they mean to say is, that no nation has a right to interfere with the domestic concerns or the municipal institutions of foreign countries, or to stir up to rebellion their citizens or subjects. But they all agree to the right to intervene when a people have actually risen and are striving to throw off intolerable oppression.

It is my deliberate opinion, sir, that we not only have the right, but that it would be our duty, under some circumstances, in our own good time, when the occasion is proper, and it may be practicable, to assist any people who rise to achieve their liberties and to establish a republican government. Sir, it has been practiced by all nations from time immemorial; and all the paper promulgations which will ever be made will never stop this practice among nations. The only way in which it can be arrested, is by appealing to their interest and safety—by boldly declaring that we will interfere whenever it suits us. Sir, what law will they or do they consult except the law of their own will? You cannot chain up the great Powers of the earth by paper declarations of the law of nations. The law of nations in modern times, as well as of old, is the law of the strongest. This we experienced to our loss and sorrow for many years, during which our commerce was plundered by Great Britain and France, and for which redress has been vainly sought up to this time by our suffering fellow-citizens.

It is true, indeed, that nations have generally exercised this right for the purposes of oppression and injustice, and in hostility to the rights of mankind. But a better time is coming, the time when the United States may interpose against the oppressor and in favor of the oppressed.

Therefore, I am unwilling, after tyranny has so long had sway, and lorded it over the destinies of mankind, now to avow a principle which leaves to its tender mercies the happiness of the whole human race.

Sir, an avowal by us of the principle of non-intervention would raise a wall up, around this Republic, as high as heaven, and would shut in the light of liberty from surrounding nations. The avowal of such a principle at this time would be received with one universal shout of joy by all the potentates of Europe, and with one universal wail of lamentation and woe by all true lovers of freedom on earth. I am unwilling to gratify the despots of the world by any such proclamation. What hope would remain to the oppressed after such a declaration? The radiant light which, emanating from this Republic, has so long cheered and animated their hearts would shine no longer—all would look black and cheerless, and despair would settle darkly on their prospects.

Besides, would not the establishment of the principle of non-intervention as the law of nations, be in direct opposition to the principles declared by Mr. Monroe in relation to this continent? Does any one doubt, that if this country felt itself bound, under no circumstances and at no time, to interfere with the affairs of Europe, that before many years monarchical governments would be established in the whole Southern portion of this continent? Does any one doubt that, before many years, the Island of Cuba would be a dependency of Great Britain? It does, then, seem to me palpable that while peace is the policy of this country, and while we should always bear in mind the admonition of Washington against entangling alliances, that it would be suicidal to the honor, to the interests and prospective power of this Government, if the United States should incur any obligation by which they would forever be forbidden from interfering in the affairs of other nations whenever circumstances in any case might render it necessary, just, and expedient. Therefore it seems to me that this principle of non-intervention would be in direct violation of all the rights and duties of a free and independent republic.

Now, sir, in the practical application of these principles to the important topic of the day, I will take hold of that idea which others seem to have handled with such significant delicacy. I am not afraid to express my opinions on this subject, or, indeed, on any other, although the press (which, God knows, is brave enough) seems to shrink from touching it; and I say, for one, that I am not prepared to go to war with Russia on account of Hungary, partly because Russia is our old, and true, and faithful friend, and partly because Hungarian liberty, through the instrumentality of the United States, is at present an idea Utopian and impracticable. This proposition is self-evident, and requires no demonstration; it is an impossible thing, and what is impossible can't happen, never come to pass. But, Mr. President, though I am not prepared, nor willing to go to war with Russia, or to disturb the present state of things in Hungary, about which we have so little satisfactory information, I will once more repeat, and declare it in the face of the world, as my opinion, that this Government has an indisputable and perfect right to interfere whenever, by such interference, she can promote her own interests and advance the cause of liberty—whenever, by such interference, she may successfully rescue from the grasp of tyranny an oppressed nation, whom she may see fit to assist and to place among the independent nations of the world. This is a principle which we cannot, we dare not, we never will relinquish. It is an inherent principle of nationality, under no pretence whatever to be surrendered.

Sir, if tyrants have used it heretofore to enthrall mankind, this growing Republic will some of these days use it for their freedom. In peace let it be maintained with unfaltering tenacity; in war let it be asserted by all the power of arms; and when the great contest begins, as before 1900 it must, between free principles and the right of self government and despotic power, then let it be inscribed upon all our banners—everywhere—wherever they float, on every sea, and land, and ocean and continent, where the warfare rages, let it herald the advent of freedom and national independence, and the discomfiture of tyranny and oppression.

I move that the resolution be laid upon the table and printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. MILLER. I have also received a copy of the resolutions just presented by my colleague; but as the subject-matter to which they relate is now before the Senate, in the resolutions presented by the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. CLARKE,] I will not, at this time, during the morning hour trespass upon the Senate with any remarks of mine, but will at an early day take occasion to respond to these resolutions, and express my views fully upon the important matter there embraced.

And although I do not acknowledge the doctrine of instruction in any of its forms, yet the expressed opinion of the Legislature of New Jersey will always receive from me the most profound consideration and the highest respect.

The motion was then agreed to.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petition of Adam Hays, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill for the relief of Philip Miller, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SHIELDS, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Washington Gas Light Company," approved July 8, 1848, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the memorial of the Rector of St. John's Church, Washington, reported a bill for the relief of St. John's Church, in the city of Washington; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill to provide for the removal of obstructions in the river Savannah, in the State of Georgia, and for the improvement of the same, reported it without amendment.

Mr. DOWNS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the petition of Joseph H. D. Bowmar, reported a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading.

CUBAN PRISONERS IN SPAIN.

Mr. DOUGLAS, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the bill for the relief of American citizens lately imprisoned and pardoned by the Queen of Spain, reported it without amendment. He also asked the unanimous consent of the Senate to have the bill taken up and disposed of, as it was of urgent necessity.

The Senate accordingly proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate, was ordered to a third reading, and was read a third time and passed.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. MALLORY gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to be entitled "A bill relating to the sale of public lands in certain cases."

MEXICAN INDEMNITY.

On the motion of Mr. HUNTER, the Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to provide for carrying into execution, in further part, the twelfth article of the treaty with Mexico, concluded at Guadalupe Hidalgo; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate, was ordered to a third reading, and was read a third time and passed.

FLORIDA SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. BERRIEN. Being compelled to leave the city to-morrow, and being uncertain as to the time when I may be enabled to return, I feel it to be my duty to ask to be relieved from serving on the select committee raised on the memorial of honorable D. L. Yulee, and that some other Senator may be appointed in my place.

The honorable Senator was excused from further service on the committee.

The PRESIDENT. It will be necessary for the Senate to select a member of the select committee, in the place of the honorable Senator from Georgia, who has been excused.

Mr. PEARCE. I hope that by unanimous consent the Chair will be allowed to appoint.

The PRESIDENT. The committee was selected in the first place by the Senate. The Chair, therefore, prefers that the Senate itself shall fill the vacancy. It is an important committee, raised to determine the rights of persons claiming seats in the Senate. The Chair does not, therefore, wish to take the responsibility of filling the vacancy. He trusts, then, if such is the pleasure of the Senate, that Senators will now prepare their ballots for another member of the committee. Or the balloting can be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. WALKER. I move to postpone it until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT. It will lie over until to-morrow, and the Chair will then request Senators to prepare their ballots for a member of the select committee.

DISCIPLINE IN THE NAVY.

Mr. BADGER. The Senate will recollect that I reported some time ago, from the Naval Committee, a bill to enforce discipline and promote good conduct in the naval service, by which it was intended to provide a substitute for corporal punishment. That bill was reported by the committee, in the same form in which it passed the Senate, with great unanimity, at the last session of Congress. It is very desirable that that bill should be acted on speedily. We have squadrons now about going to sea, in distant ports of the United States, and it is important that the officers of the Navy should have some system to enforce discipline. I should ask the Senate to take up the bill to which I have referred this morning, but for the fear that it might interfere with the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. McRAE], who is entitled to the floor on another subject. I wish merely to say at this time, that I believe the bill will not occupy much time. It is a case of emergency that it should be passed at once, and I give notice that I will ask the Senate to-morrow morning to take up the bill and dispose of it.

THE COMPROMISE MEASURES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution declaring the compromise measures a definite settlement of all questions growing out of the institution of slavery.

Mr. McRAE resumed and finished the speech which he commenced on Thursday last against the resolution. At his request its publication is deferred. It will be published in the Appendix.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, I think the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. McRAE], who has delivered a speech, which will certainly not soon be forgotten in this body, as well for its substance as for his admirable manner, has, nevertheless, fallen into an error as to the character and purpose of the resolution now under the consideration of the Senate, submitted by his late colleague in this body; and I wish, for a few moments, to call the attention of the Senate to what is the true character of that resolution.

The honorable Senator set out with the declaration, that it involved the merits of the several acts of Congress referred to in it, and which form the adjustment or compromise which was adopted at the first session of the last Congress; that this resolution requires in every one who votes in its favor, an approval of each and every one of those measures; and, therefore, cannot properly receive the support of any member of this body who denies or doubts the propriety of any one of those measures.

Now this to me is totally and absolutely a misapprehension of what the resolution contains. The resolution, if I am able to understand the meaning of the plain English words in which it is drawn up, says nothing about the merits of any one of the particular acts referred to. It affirms nothing as to the excellence or propriety of the particular provisions contained in any one of those acts. It proposes no approval, on the part of this body, of the provisions contained in any one of those acts. It declares nothing respecting them, except as a whole. It declares nothing respecting them, except that those acts do, as a whole, in their mutual connection and dependence upon each other, constitute an adjustment—constitute a settlement—and constituting a settlement, that they ought not to be touched by the legislation of Congress until experience shall demonstrate that further legislation is necessary. That is what the resolution declares, and that is all that the resolution declares. As it is very brief, allow me to read it to the Senate:

Be it resolved, That the series of measures embraced in the acts entitled "An act proposing to the State of Texas the establishment of her northern and western boundaries, the relinquishment, by the said State, of all territory claimed by her exterior to said boundaries, and of all her claims upon the United States, and to establish a territorial government for New Mexico," approved September 9, 1850; "An act for the admission of the State of California into the Union," approved September 9, 1850; "An act to establish a territorial government for Utah," approved September 9, 1850; "An act to amend and supplement to an act entitled 'An act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters,' approved February 19, 1793," approved September 18, 1850; and "An act to suppress the slave trade in the District of Columbia," approved September 20, 1850, commonly known as the "Compromise Acts," are, in the judgment of this body, a settlement in principle and substance—a final settlement of the dangerous and exciting subjects which they embrace, and ought to be adhered to by Congress until time and experience shall demonstrate the necessity of further legislation to guard against evasion or abuse.

Now, I appeal to every gentleman who is a member of this body, if anything can be clearer than that the resolution affirms nothing but this: that these measures constitute a settlement of the questions to which they referred and which they embraced. Why, it is there in plain and unmistakable language. There is not one word, letter, or syllable in the resolution that says any one of those measures was in itself the wisest or the best; or that it was even wise or good, considered by itself. The affirmation is, that these measures constitute a settlement; and from that is deduced a further assertion, that, constituting a settlement, they ought to be tried, they ought to be allowed to rest, they should not be interfered with until by time and experience the necessity of change shall be demonstrated. Is not that clear? Why, in the very ordinary transactions of life, if half a dozen individuals who had been engaged in a partnership transaction, or any other mutual business, come to a settlement of pending difficulties between them, and that settlement should be made by mutual grants and releases among them, might it not be—would it not be affirmed, that those mutual acts of grant and release constituted a settlement, and ought to be adhered to? But surely it never would be, it never could be understood, that each and every one of the parties entering into this mutual arrangement with regard to their difficulties, approved of each and everything that was done in the whole series of measures that constituted the adjustment. Certainly not. Therefore, as far as I am able to understand the meaning of the language in which this resolution is couched, there is not in it a single word, letter, or syllable which affirms anything about any one of these measures, or does anything but declare that, together, they constitute a settlement. A settlement how? In principle and substance. It does not declare that the principles of each and every separate measure were right principles; but that the whole together constituted, in principle and substance, a settlement. Why in principle and substance? Because these measures were separate and distinct acts of legislation, and do not, in form, appear to be a settlement. Each one, on its face, stands as an independent exercise of the legislative power. Therefore, they do not constitute, in form, a settlement. But the language of the resolution is, that they constitute a settlement in principle and substance. This means, that although they were all separately passed, they were all designed—they were all understood—they were all voted upon by those who passed them, with the understanding that there was a mutual connection and dependence between them; and that after they were all passed, they were, and were entitled to be, considered a settlement of the questions embraced in them. I shall vote very cheerfully for this resolution; but I shall not consider myself, in so voting, as expressing, in the remotest degree, the opinion that I approve of all, or any one of these separate measures by itself considered. It is true I do approve of most of these measures. I approved of them at the time. But in voting for this resolution I shall express no such sentiment; I shall merely express this: that these measures constituted a settlement; and that, irrespective of my opinion with regard to the merits of the particular measure which entered into and formed that settlement, the settlement ought to be adhered to; it ought to be tried until it shall be ascertained by experience, that it is necessary that Congress should enter into further acts of legislation upon the subject. That is what I understand by it.

A word now in regard to the form which the resolution has assumed in consequence of the amendment which I had the honor to submit to the Senate. If I understood the honorable Senator from Mississippi, he said he considered the resolution better in its original shape—liable to less objection—one for which he could vote—while he would not feel himself at liberty to vote for the resolution in its present form. Let us see what the original resolution in this respect declares; and how it stands in its amended form; and let us see if there is anything in it, in its present form, that can be considered objectionable, which did not exist in a higher degree in the form in which it was originally proposed. The original resolution says that these measures "are, in the judgment of this body, entitled to be recognized as a definitive adjustment and settlement of the distracting questions growing out of the system of domestic slavery—and as such said measures should be acquiesced in and faithfully observed by all good citizens."

In what sense is an approval of the particular measures referred to—of the merits of the several acts of Congress composing that series of measures—how is an opinion expressed upon the merits of these particular measures, more in the amended form than in the original form of the resolution? The original form declares that they are entitled to be recognized as a definitive adjustment and settlement of the distracting questions growing out of the system of domestic slavery; while the amended resolution declares that they are a settlement in principle and substance—a final settlement of the dangerous and exciting subjects which they embrace. If approval is implied in the one case, I pray you to tell me if the ingenuity of man can show that the same approval is not implied in the other? It cannot be shown. Gentlemen may assume that it is so: gentlemen, if they take that view of it, will, of course, act upon the supposition that it is so. But I maintain, that upon a just exposition of this language, the idea of approval of the particular measures constituting the adjustment, is no more expressed in the one case than in the other. It was not, therefore, on that ground, that I submitted the amendment which the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. Foote,] who offered the resolution, felt willing to accept, and which he, not having control of the resolution, in the judgment of the Chair, was, on a division, adopted by the Senate: but it was for another purpose. The resolution as originally framed, declared these measures were to be acquiesced in indefinitely, under all circumstances, without any limitation. I suggested then, in substance—I do not remember the particular phraseology which I used—that there was at least a plausible objection to the resolution in undertaking to give an unalterable character to these measures. I did not esteem that objection as just; still it was entertained; and I wished to remove from the resolution every objection, not only real but plausible; and therefore suggested the amendment by which it is declared with regard to these measures that they ought to be maintained untouched, until we see what will be the result upon them of time and experience.

Then, in the second place, I thought that the original form of the resolution was subject to a real objection, which was, that the Senate, instead of declaring what ought to be the action of this body, would declare by it what should be the duty of the citizens of the country. It seems to me unnecessary to declare that the citizens of the country ought to obey the laws of the country; and at the same time I thought the resolution insufficient, because it ought to declare our own views and our own purpose with regard to the maintenance of those laws—the legislative power over that subject being in this body and in the other House. It was upon that ground that this amendment was offered by me, and it was adopted by the Senate. And I must say, that if there is anything in the original resolution which has merits which commend it to the favor of the Senate, no part of those merits have been removed by the amendment which I had the honor to submit.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As the usual hour for adjournment has arrived, if the honorable Senator will give way I will move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BADGER assented.

And then, on motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 2, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. Mr. MORGAN.

The Journal of Friday last was read. Mr. GIDDINGS said that he discovered that the Journal of Friday last states that he had reported, without amendment, from the Committee on Territories the bill authorizing the Governor of the Territory of New Mexico to call an extra session of the Legislative Assembly of said Territory. He reported the bill with an amendment, and desired the Journal to be so corrected.

It was ordered, and the Journal was then approved.

Mr. SIBLEY asked the unanimous consent of the House to allow him to introduce a resolution.

MOORE AND HASCALL.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the unfinished business of Friday last, which is the consideration of bill No. 193, for the relief of Hiram Moore and John Hascall, upon which the previous question was ordered to be put; which main question is upon the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole, and the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CARTTER called for the order of business.

Mr. SIBLEY again asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of devoting the proceeds of the Fort Snelling military reserve, when sold, to the benefit of the University of Minnesota, in lieu of a like number of acres of land already granted by Congress for that purpose, and that the said committee report by bill or otherwise.

There being no objection, the resolution was introduced.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MOLONY. I have a favor to ask of the House—one which I rarely ask, but always vote to grant. It is simply the introduction of a bill, of which previous notice has been given, which I desire may be referred to a committee.

It was then read for information, as follows:

A bill granting to the State of Illinois and Indiana the right of way for, and a portion of the public lands to aid in, the construction of a railroad from Lafayette, Indiana, across the Grand Prairie, via Middleport, to La Salle county, Illinois.

Mr. SKELTON objected.

Mr. FOWLER asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution.

Mr. SKELTON called for the orders of the day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already stated that the unfinished business of the House is the consideration of bill No. 193, being a bill for the relief of Hiram Moore and John Hascall. A motion was made to commit the said bill to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day, and printed, upon which the previous question was moved and seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and upon this question the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CARTTER. I submit whether the previous question was not called upon the motion to pass it?

The SPEAKER. That will be the effect if the House vote down the proposition to refer. If the House refuse to refer the bill, it will, under the operation of the previous question, be brought to a vote upon the engrossment of the bill.

Mr. SACKETT. I ask, if the House refuse to refer the bill, whether it will be then open to amendment?

The SPEAKER. It will not—the previous question having been ordered.

Mr. SACKETT. I only wish to say to the House, that the bill grants a patent for fourteen years—

Mr. CARTTER. I object to any remarks.

The SPEAKER. All discussion is out of order.

Mr. TAYLOR. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair. If the House refuse to refer this bill, will not the question then come up upon its engrossment?

The SPEAKER. It will, under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. SACKETT. I ask that the bill be read.

Mr. CARTTER. I object.

Mr. SACKETT. Do we understand the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CARTTER,] the chairman of the committee, as objecting to the bill being read?

Mr. CARTTER. The gentleman understands that the bill has been already read by sections.

Mr. SACKETT. Last week; and I ask that it be read again.

The question was then taken on the motion to refer the bill; and there were—yeas 39, nays 137, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abernethy, Averett, Bragg, Caskie, Churchwell, Clingman, Curtis, Daniel, Dawson, Dunham, Evans, Faulkner, Ficklin, Floyd, Gamble, Isham G. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Abram P. Stevens, Stone, St. Martin, Stratton, Strother, Stuart, Sweetser, Taylor, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Townsend, Tuck, Venable, Walbridge, Walsh, Ward, Watkins, Welch, Wells, Addison White, Wildrick, Williams, and Woodward—137.

So the bill was not committed.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. Speaker, is the previous question exhausted?

The SPEAKER. It is not exhausted.

Mr. CARTTER. Is it in order to move a reconsideration of the last vote, and to lay that motion upon the table?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. CARTTER. I make that motion to reconsider.

Mr. SACKETT. I believe I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman made no proposition.

Mr. SACKETT. I inquired if the previous question was exhausted, with the intention of moving a reconsideration.

The SPEAKER. It is not a debatable proposition at all events.

Mr. SACKETT. I wished to make a statement in regard to this bill. I desire to move a reconsideration.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York [Mr. SACKETT] claim the floor?

Mr. SACKETT. For the purpose of moving a reconsideration.

Mr. CARTTER. I had anticipated that motion already, for the benefit of the gentleman, under the recognition of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SACKETT] claimed, and was upon the floor, and the Chair thinks he was entitled to it.

Mr. SACKETT. Is it in order to make an explanation to the House, of the object of my motion?

Mr. CARTTER. I will inquire, if the gentleman having voted against the proposition, can now make a motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot make such a motion.

Mr. ROBBINS moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which motion was agreed to.

The question then being, Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was taken and agreed to.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill will receive its third reading now.

Mr. EVANS. I ask if the bill is actually engrossed?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the bill has not been engrossed.

Mr. EVANS. I then object to its third reading now.

The SPEAKER. The bill takes its place on the Calendar.

Mr. THURSTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and to lay that motion upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. DISNEY, it was ordered that the papers of Boyce Purcell be withdrawn from the files of the House and referred to the Committee of Claims.

ALLOWANCE OF CLAIMS.

Mr. FOWLER asked the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to transmit to this House a statement exhibiting the amount of claims, if any, including principal and interest, and designating each separately, which have been allowed and paid by the several Departments, or any of the Bureaus thereof, from the 4th day of March, 1845, until the 4th day of March, 1849, which had been previously presented and suspended, or disallowed in whole or in part, and specifying the character of such claims, and also the name of each person who at any time acted as agent or solicitor for such claims; together with the names of the persons to whom the same or any part thereof was paid, specifying, if practicable, the several amounts paid to such agents or solicitors as fees for their services in prosecuting said claims.

Mr. GAYLORD objected.

Mr. FOWLER moved to suspend the rules, and on that motion asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. ASHE. I call for the reading of the resolution. We have not been able to hear a word of it in this part of the Hall.

The SPEAKER. The resolution has been read once, but it will be read again unless objected to.

Mr. ANDREWS objected.

Mr. ASHE. Then I must ask to be excused from voting, for I do not know what the resolution is.

The question was put, and it was decided in the negative.

So the House refused to excuse Mr. ASHE from voting.

Mr. FITCH. I appeal to the gentleman from Maine to withdraw his objection. We have none of us heard the resolution in this part of the Hall, and cannot vote in the dark.

Mr. ANDREWS withdrew his objection.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I object to that resolution. I voted against a similar one last Monday and shall vote against all of them.

The SPEAKER. The proposition is to read the resolution.

Mr. STEPHENS. Oh, I have no objection to its being read.

The SPEAKER. That is the proposition.

The Clerk then read the resolution.

Mr. FICKLIN. Is the resolution amendable at this time?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The resolution is not now before the House. The question is on suspending the rules to enable the gentleman from Massachusetts to offer the resolution.

The question was then put, and there were yeas 164, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abernethie, Chas. Allen, Willis Allen, Allison, Andrews, John Appleton, Ashe, Averett, Babcock, Barrere, Bell, Bibbhausa, Bocock, Bowne, Bragg, Breckenridge, Brenton, Briggs, Brooks, Albert G. Brown, George H. Brown, Buell, Burrows, E. Carrington Cabell, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Caskey, Chandler, Chastain, Churchwell, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Conger, Curtis, Daniel, George T. NAYS—Messrs. Busby, Caldwell, Floyd, Gaylord, Henn, Outlaw, Robbins, Alexander H. Stephens, and Williams—9.

So (two thirds voting in the affirmative) the rules were suspended.

The question recurring on the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. FOWLER demanded the previous question.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the previous question will not be sustained. There is a very essential amendment that ought to be made to that resolution.

Mr. FOWLER. I think not. The resolution is precisely the same as that passed last week, except that it is addressed to the President instead of the Secretaries.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. HOUSTON. The resolution ought to be amended so as to show the additional proof presented before the Departments to justify the allowance of the claims.

The House then divided on seconding the demand for the previous question, and

The SPEAKER announced that there were yeas 84, noes 80.

Mr. CARTTER demanded tellers.

Mr. CABELL. I object to tellers. The call was made too late. The Chair had announced the result of the division.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the objection. Tellers were demanded whilst the Chair was in the act of announcing the result.

Mr. CABELL. I raised the objection, in order that we may have some principle decided. I called for tellers the other day and the Chair decided that I was too late, although I addressed the Chair before the result of the division was announced.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. CABELL. No. I am indifferent about the matter. I merely want to have the question settled.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. FULLER of Maine and CHANDLER appointed.

The question was then put, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 84, noes 85.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. LOCKHART. I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution.

Mr. FOWLER. Do I not still retain the floor? I have not yielded it yet.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman effected his object by calling the previous question.

Mr. FOWLER. The question is whether I do not still hold the floor for further remarks?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was not understood as claiming the floor until another gentleman had been recognized by the Chair.

Mr. FOWLER. I claimed the floor as soon as the result was announced.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman did not claim the floor in time.

Mr. LOCKHART moved to amend the resolution by adding thereto the following:

And the additional evidence, if any, upon which such claims were allowed.

Mr. LOCKHART then demanded the previous question.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. I wish to ask the gentleman from Indiana to modify his amendment so as to call for information in relation to the additional testimony that was furnished upon claims since 1849. My purpose is, that all the facts in relation to the allowances of claims may be brought out, and that the country may understand whether this or that party is to blame.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana agree to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. LOCKHART. I do not.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Ah! Then only one side is wanted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must enforce the rule. Discussion is not in order.

Mr. CARTTER. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw the demand for the previous question, to allow me to offer this additional amendment, that any of the officers incumbent during the period embraced in the resolution shall have the privilege of going into the offices and vindicating their action during the investigation.

Mr. LOCKHART. I cannot withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LOCKHART.] If the gentleman will so alter his amendment as to extend it down to the present time, I will accept it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. As the resolution which was adopted on Monday last now stands, the Department can report the new proof upon which the claims were allowed. There is nothing in the resolution which precludes it; and they will, no doubt, take this resolution as a precedent to govern their action under the former resolution.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to say—

The SPEAKER. This discussion is entirely out of order.

Mr. FOWLER. I do not propose to discuss the matter; but I desire to say again to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LOCKHART,] that I will accept his amendment if he will extend it down to the present time.

Mr. LOCKHART. I am satisfied with it as it now stands.

The question now being upon seconding the demand for the previous question, upon a division there were—yeas 99.

Mr. WILLIAMS demanded tellers, which were ordered; and Messrs. FULLER of Maine and CHANDLER were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—yeas 79, noes 50.

So the previous question received a second.

The main question was then ordered to be put, which was first on agreeing to Mr. LOCKHART's amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the resolution as amended, and being taken, it was carried in the affirmative.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. STANLY moved that the vote just taken, by which the resolution was adopted, be reconsidered, and to lay that motion on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

INSTRUCTIONS IN RELATION TO CUBA.

Mr. FAULKNER, by unanimous consent of the House, introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, all instructions from the Department of State to the diplomatic agents of the United States abroad, and all dispatches from them not heretofore communicated to Congress, declaratory of, or relating to the policy of the Government of the United States in relation to the Island of Cuba.

The question was taken, and the resolution was adopted.

RENTS PAID FOR PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. DANIEL, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings be instructed to ascertain and report to this House what buildings, or parts of buildings, in the District of Columbia, other than those belonging to the United States, have been used by the Government between the first day of January, 1840, and the first day of February, 1852, and the amount paid for rent, or contracted to be paid, in every instance, and their security and fitness as depositories of the public records. And that said committee inquire into the expediency of purchasing or erecting such additional buildings as may be deemed necessary. And that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The question was taken, and the resolution was adopted.

OCEAN STEAMERS—MAIL CARRIERS.

Mr. MEADE asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs inquire into the expediency of providing by law that every steamer suitable to war purposes regularly running from any port in the United States to any foreign port shall be a mail carrier, under proper conditions, and entitled to receive, as compensation for such services, the postage arising from letters or other matter transported by such steamer.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, objected.

Mr. MEADE. I move to suspend the rules, to enable me to introduce the resolution.

Mr. JONES demanded the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and the House refused to suspend the rules—ayes 54, noes not counted.

THE PERCENTAGE ACCOUNTS.

Mr. DISNEY asked the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law, so that the accounting officers, in computing the amount due to the respective States on account of the percentage to which they are entitled upon the proceeds of the sales of the public lands within their limits, shall embrace, as sales, all public lands granted on account of military services.

Mr. TOOMBS objected.

Mr. DISNEY moved that the rules be suspended.

The question was taken, and, upon a division, 44 rose in the affirmative.

Mr. DISNEY demanded tellers; but they were not ordered.

So the rules were not suspended.

MAIL SERVICE ON THE OHIO AND MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, asked the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution; which was read for the information of the House, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the means of organizing an efficient system of mail service on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I object.

Mr. STANTON. I move that the rules be suspended, to enable me to introduce the resolution.

The question was put, and upon a division there were—ayes 53, noes not counted.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

SPIRIT RATION IN THE NAVY.

Mr. GOODENOW asked the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution; which was read for information, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the spirit ration in the Navy, and of increasing the pay of all classes of enlisted men in that service.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I object.

Mr. GOODENOW. I move to suspend the rules, to enable me to introduce the resolution; and upon that question I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. FOWLER. I call for tellers upon the yeas and nays. Tellers were not ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion to suspend the rules; and there were upon a division—ayes 54, noes not counted.

So the House refused to suspend the rules, and the resolution was not introduced.

NON-INTERVENTION.

Mr. BRAGG. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to present certain resolutions, adopted by the Legislature of Alabama, upon the subject of intervention. I do not desire to have them read even. I move they be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. CARTTER. I object.

Mr. BRAGG. Then I move a suspension of the rules.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I call for the reading of the resolutions.

The CHAIRMAN. If gentlemen will come to order, the resolutions will be read for information.

The resolutions were then read as follows:

Joint Resolutions expressive of the sense of the General Assembly of Alabama in relation to the policy to be pursued by our Government in its intercourse with foreign nations.

Whereas, from many indications of popular feeling in some of the States of this Government, and from the speeches and acts of many public men high in the confidence of their own constituents, and in that of the people of the United States, we are led to the belief that a spirit of interference in the political affairs of the European continent prevails to so great an extent as to induce the fear that for the want of calm reflection, we may be involved in all the troubles and difficulties of the political affairs of nations and people far removed from us:

Be it therefore resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Alabama in General Assembly convened, That we hold it to be the duty of the Government and the people of the United States to cultivate relations of amity and good will with all the nations of the earth; in peace to treat all as friends, in war enemies; and to have entangling alliances with none; and to practice literally the doctrine of non-intervention.

Resolved, That the Governor be requested to forward these resolutions to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, with a request to lay the same before their respective bodies.

JOHN D. RATHER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

CHARLES McLEMORE,
Speaker of the Senate.

Approved, January 9th, 1852.

H. W. COLLIER.

The question was then taken, and the rules were suspended.

Mr. BRAGG. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and be printed; which motion was agreed to.

INTERVENTION.

Mr. SKELTON. I move that the rules of the House be suspended, for the purpose of introducing a series of resolutions passed by the Legislature of the State of New Jersey upon the subject of intervention.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I object.

[Cries of "Read!" "Read!"]

The resolutions were then read for information. [They will be found in the proceedings of the Senate of to-day.]

The question was then taken, and the rules were suspended.

Mr. SKELTON. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and be printed; which motion was agreed to.

SUSPENDED AND DISALLOWED CLAIMS.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was adopted, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to transmit to this House, in addition to the information called for by the resolution which passed this House on the 26th of January, 1852, relative to suspended and disallowed claims, a statement, specifying the claims which have been allowed upon additional testimony furnished to the Departments since the 4th of March, 1849.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for the introduction of the following joint resolution, proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, viz:

Resolved, &c., That the following amendments to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution:

That, hereafter, the President and Vice President of the United States shall be chosen by the people of the respective States, in the manner following: Each State shall be divided, by the Legislature thereof, into districts, equal in number to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which such State may be entitled in the Congress of the United States; the said districts to be composed of contiguous territory, and to contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of persons entitled to be represented under the Constitution, and to be laid off, for the first time, immediately after the ratification of this amendment, and afterwards, at the session of the Legislature next ensuing the apportionment of representatives by the Congress of the United States; that, on the first Thursday in August, in the year eighteen hundred and fifty-six, and on the same day every fourth year thereafter, the citizens of each State who possess the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures, shall meet within their respective districts, and vote for a President and Vice President of the United States, one of whom at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves; and the person receiving the greatest number of votes for President, and the one receiving the greatest number of votes for Vice President in each district, shall be holden to have received one vote; which fact shall be immediately certified by the Governor of the State, to each of the Senators in Congress from such State, and to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The Congress of the United States shall be in session on the second Monday in October, in the year eighteen hundred and fifty-six, and on the same day on every fourth year thereafter; and the President of the Senate, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, shall open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes for President, shall be President, if such number be equal to a majority of the whole number of votes given; but if no person have such majority, then a second election shall be held on the first Thursday in the month of December then next ensuing, between the persons having the two highest numbers for the office of President; which second election shall be conducted, the result certified, and the votes counted, in the same manner as in the first; and the person having the greatest number of votes for President, shall be President. But if two or more persons shall have received the greatest, and an equal number of votes, at the second election, then the person who shall have received the greatest number of votes in the greatest number of States, shall be President. The person having the greatest number of votes for Vice President, at the first election; shall be Vice President, if such number be equal to a majority of the whole number of votes given; and if no person have such majority, then a second election shall take place between the persons having the two highest numbers, on the same day that the second election is held for President; and the person having the highest number of the votes for Vice President, shall be Vice President. But if there should happen to be an equality of votes between the persons so voted for at the second election, then the person having the greatest number of votes in the greatest number of States, shall be Vice President. But when a second election shall be necessary in the case of Vice President, and not necessary in the case of President, then the Senate shall choose a Vice President from the persons having the two highest numbers in the first election, as is now prescribed in the Constitution.

Sec. 2. And be it further resolved, That article one, section three, be amended by striking out the word "Legislature," and inserting in lieu thereof, the following words, viz: "persons qualified to vote for members of the most numerous branch of the Legislature," so as to make the third section of said article when ratified by three fourths of the States, read as follows, to wit:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the persons qualified to vote for the members of the most numerous branch of the Legislature thereof, for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote.

Sec. 4. And be it further resolved, That article three, section one, be amended by striking out the words "good behavior," and inserting the following words, viz: "the term of twelve years." And further, that said article and section be amended by adding the following thereto, viz: "and it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, within twelve months after the ratification of this amendment by three fourths of all the States as provided by the Constitution of the United States, to divide the whole number of judges as near as may be practicable, into three classes. The seats of the judges of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the fourth year from such classification; of the second class, at the expiration of the eighth year; and of the third class, at the expiration of the twelfth year, so that one third may be chosen every fourth year thereafter."

The article as amended, will read as follows:

ARTICLE III.

SECTION 1. The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress from time to time may ordain and establish. The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during the term of twelve years, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office. And it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, within twelve months after the ratification of this amendment by three fourths of all the States as provided by the Constitution of the United States, to divide the whole number of judges, as near as may be practicable, into three classes. The seats of the judges of the first class, shall be vacated at the expiration of the fourth year from such classification; of the second class, at the expiration of the eighth year; and of the third class, at the expiration of the twelfth year, so that one third may be chosen every fourth year thereafter.

Objection was made to its introduction.

Mr. JOHNSON moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose indicated by him; which motion, upon a division, was agreed to—ayes 89, noes 33.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

COAST SURVEY MAPS.

Mr. RIDDLE, from the Committee on Engraving, reported the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee on Engraving be and they are hereby authorized to contract for engraving or lithographing seven thousand-five hundred and twenty sets of maps accompanying the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, provided that the cost shall not exceed $6,000.

Mr. GOODENOW. I rise to a privileged question. I move the House adjourn.
